Mr. VOLSTEAD. Where a person obtains property legally, it is necessary to show a demand before he can be held for converting it, unless it can be shown that he has actually converted it.

Mr. GARD. I do not think we should limit the question of the responsibility of the clerk in that way.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I do not think this does. I think it simply reenacts the common law as it exists in every State I have no objection to the amendment for that reason.

Mr. GARD. But I do have an objection to the amendment. I do not see why, if a man is guilty of embezzlement, you should have to call on him to restore the property before he is guilty of larceny.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. It must be shown that he is guilty of embezzlement.

Mr. GARD. If the record shows that he is keeping that money, then he is guilty of larceny.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. The law gives him the right to keep that money. Before you can hold him liable criminally you must either show an actual conversion or that he is withholding it illegally. You do not need to make a demand if proof of conversion can be made. Read the second amendment.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, that is the State law in every State that I know of—that if an accounting officer comes in you must make a demand on him and demand an accounting. Unless you can show that there is an absolute conversion of the funds, you can not hold him as guilty of larceny.

Mr. GARD. This does not do that; the point I make is that it requires a demand under any circumstances. I believe the law ought to be such that if proof is extrinsic and can be made to show that he did embezzle the money there would be no necessity for making the demand.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. If the gentleman will read the rest of the amendment, he will see that if you can show actual conversion he is liable without a demand. But in cases where you can not show that there is a conversion you are required by the common law, and I think you ought to be under the statute, to make a demand.

Mr. GARD. I do not so read the amendment as having the alternative which the gentleman speaks of.

Mr. VOLSTEAD. I think by reading the whole sentence the gentleman can not escape the conclusion that if a conversion can be established a demand would not have to be made.

Mr. GARD. This is the amendment: Page 1, line 6, after the word "shall," insert "after demand by the party entitled thereto"——

Mr. VOLSTEAD. Or——

Mr. GARD (continuing). "Or who shall convert to his own use or to the use of another any moneys received or on hand," and so forth. Does the gentleman think that would control the case of a clerk who without demand having been made upon him, other evidence showing that he had embezzled money—does the gentleman think this law would cover it?

Mr. VOLSTEAD. There is no question in my mind but that would cover it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote agreeing to the Senate amendments was laid on the table.

ENROLLED BILL PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that on May 18 they had presented to the President of the United States for his approval the following bill:

H. R. 13555. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

THE KLAMATH TRIBE OF INDIANS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table H. R. 5163 and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 5163. An act authorizing the Klamath Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The Senate amendment was read.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, the Senate eliminated the interest that the Indians would have been entitled to under the House bill—3 per cent per annum for any lands the court might find they had lost. The Senate eliminated that.

Mr. GARD. What is the tribe of Indians?

Mr. SINNOTT. The Oregon Klamath Tribe.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

CESSION OF NATIONAL PARKS BY THE STATE OF CALIFORNIA.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12044, accepting the cession by the State of California of jurisdiction of certain national parks and agree to the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12044) to accept the cession by the State of California of exclusive jurisdiction of the lands embraced within the Yosemite National Park, Sequoia National Park, and General Grant National Park, respectively, and for other purposes.

The Senate amendments were read.

The Senate amendments were agreed to.

On motion of Mr. SINNOTT, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the Senate amendments were agreed to was laid on the table.

ARMY REORGANIZATION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report on the Army reorganization bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order that no quorum is present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that no quorum is present. Evidently there is no quorum here.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The SPEAKER. Two hundred and ninety-eight Members have answered to their names, a quorum.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California withdrew the motion that he made last night.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I now call up the conference report upon the Army reorganization bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California calls up the conference report upon the bill H. R. 12775, the Army reorganization bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read the conference report.

[For conference report and statement see proceedings of May 18, 1920, pp. 7265–7267.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House further disagree to the amendment of the Senate and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I desire now to ask for instructions to the House conferees in respect to the matter that is now pending between the Senate conferees and the House conferees. It involves the organization of our National Guard. The House conferees have insisted upon the provisions of the House bill as it passed the House; that is, the organization of the National Guard under the militia clause of the Constitution. The Senate is insisting upon the Senate provisions as carried in the amendment to the House bill, which provides for the organization of the National Guard under the Army clauses of the Constitution.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. The conference report having been disposed of, there is nothing at present before the House.

The SPEAKER. Technically there is not. The gentleman from California, the Chair takes it, proposes to move to instruct the conferees.

Mr. CRAMTON. If we had that motion before us, we would know more about where we are at.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan raises the point of order that there is nothing before the House.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the conferees of the House be instructed to recede from their disagreement to the National Guard sections of the Senate amendment and agree to the same with some amendments which are incorporated in the statement which was read last evening and which are printed in the RECORD this morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California submits a motion, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan reserves the point of order.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, would it not be better practice if the gentleman would refer to the sections by number instead of in the indefinite way in which the motion was put?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is no number, as the Senate amendment is one single amendment.

Mr. KAHN. The Senate amendment is one amendment. Of course, the gentleman can find those sections under the National Guard provision of the Senate amendment, which, I think, begins at section 60 of the Senate bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Would it be in order to offer an amendment to the motion of the gentleman from California to instruct the conferees to not agree to section 69 of the Senate bill?

The SPEAKER. Is that one of these same sections?

Mr. McKEOWN. No; that is a section on another matter, respecting the liability for military service.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, that is not one of the sections that is in controversy between the conferees.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order now, until this amendment has been reported. Then the Chair will decide the matter. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KAHN moves to instruct the conferees to recede from their disagreement to the National Guard section of the Senate amendment and concur with an amendment which has already been reported.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. I think that is a very vague proposition to put before the House. I have a point of order which I desire ultimately to make to the motion, but I think we should first have the motion made by the gentleman from California properly reported.

The SPEAKER. Of course, if anyone desires it—I take it, the gentleman means what was read last night—he can insist upon that being read again.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, it is already printed in the RECORD this morning. I stated that at the time that I made the motion.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I suggest to the gentleman from California, instead of having the motion made as read by the Clerk that the conferees recede, which they can not do to a particular part of the amendment, that he submit the motion that the managers on the part of the House be instructed to concur, in substance, to the following provisions.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the motion that the gentleman from California makes is so indefinite that nobody has any idea of what he is trying to do.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Why does not the gentleman state to the House what it is. No one knows.

Mr. KAHN. I intend to state very fully to the House what the purpose is, but I can not state it in the motion.

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands it, the purpose of the gentleman is to move that the House conferees be instructed to agree to the substance of the amendment which he offered last evening, which was then reported, and which is printed in the RECORD this morning. Of course, if anyone desires it, he can insist upon that being read again this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask that it be again read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California offers a motion, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. DENT. I make this suggestion to the gentleman from California: Would not this whole proposition be put fairly and squarely to the House if the gentleman from California will move that the managers on the part of the House be instructed to recede from the House provisions and accept the compromise measure by which the National Guard is to be organized under the Army clauses rather than the militia provision of the Constitution?

Mr. KAHN. That is practically the substance of the motion that I have made.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, we can not instruct the conferees to recede and concur in the Senate amendment in part. We can instruct them that they shall concur to certain provisions in conference.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Alabama has stated this proposition as if the compromise were to organize the National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution. The compromise, as he will remember, is that the States shall have the option whether they shall organize under the Army clause or the militia clause.

Mr. DENT. I meant, of course, each State under the compromise plan.

Mr. KAHN. I think the Clerk has the motion.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from California.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KAHN moves that the managers on the part of the House be instructed to agree in conference in substance to the following provisions as amendments to the Senate amendment, section 59 to 69 of the Senate amendment, inclusive, as follows:

"SEC. —. Strength of the National Guard of the United States: The maximum strength of the National Guard of the United States, as established under the provisions of this act, and that may be organized in any State in time of peace shall be equal to 800 officers and enlisted men for each Senator and Representative in Congress and a number, to be determined by the President, for each Territory and the District of Columbia: Provided, That in States which have but one Representative in Congress the maximum strength of the National Guard of the United States therein organized shall be determined by the President: Provided further, That the word Territory, as used in this act relative to the National Guard of the United States, shall include and apply to Hawaii, Alaska, Porto Rico, and the Canal Zone. Except as otherwise specifically prescribed herein, the organization of the National Guard of the United States, including the composition of all units thereof, the location of such units, and the assignment of such units to the brigades, divisions, and corps of the Army of the United States, shall be as provided in sections — and — of this act.

"SEC. —. Enlistment in the National Guard of the United States: Whenever any State or Territory shall have provided by law for enlistment in the troops of such State or Territory of all persons resident in such State or Territory who enlist in the National Guard of the United States, and shall have otherwise complied with the conditions of this act for the keeping of State or Territorial troops, any person resident in such State or Territory, and liable for military service in time of war, except enlisted men of the Regular Army and the enlisted Reserve Corps, may, within the limits as to number provided by section — of this act, be voluntarily enlisted in the National Guard of the United States, and while serving therein shall be exempted from other military service: Provided, That such person shall at the same time and by the same enlistment contract enlist in the troops of the State or Territory of his residence: Provided further, That the period for which such person enlists in the troops of the State or Territory shall be such that his State or Territory enlistment will terminate concurrently with his Federal enlistment. Such enlistment in the National Guard of the United States shall be for a period of three years, except as specifically provided for in section — of this act, with the privilege of reenlisting for additional periods of not less than one nor more than three years. The qualifications for enlistment in the National Guard of the United States shall be the same as those prescribed for enlistment in the Regular Army, subject to such modifications as the President may direct. Enlisted men in the National Guard of the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia shall, with their consent, be recognized as members of the National Guard of the United States under the provisions of this act for the unexpired portion of their present enlistment contracts. All persons enlisting for service in the National Guard of the United States shall sign an enlistment contract and take and subscribe to an oath in the following form:

"'I do hereby acknowledge to have voluntarily enlisted this —— day of ———, 19—, as a soldier in the National Guard of the United States and in the troops of the (State) (Territory) of ——— for the period of three years under conditions prescribed by law, unless sooner discharged by proper authority, and I do solemnly swear that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America, and that I will serve them honestly and faithfully against all their enemies whomsoever, and that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States and of the officers appointed over me according to law and the rules and Articles of War. And I do solemnly swear to bear true faith and allegiance to the (State) (Territory) of ——— and to obey the orders of the governor thereof subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States.'

"An enlisted man discharged from service in the National Guard of the United States shall receive a discharge in writing, in such form and with such classification as is, or shall be, prescribed for enlisted men of the Regular Army. In time of peace discharges may be given prior to the expiration of terms of enlistment under such regulations as the President may prescribe.

"SEC. —. Officers of the National Guard of the United States: The Secretary of War may detail or assign officers of the Regular Army to duty with the National Guard of the United States according to the requirements of the service, and in time of peace shall assign officers of the reserve personnel, with their consent, to duty with organizations of the National Guard of the United States in each State or Territory upon the recommendation of the governor of the State or Territory concerned, and upon the grant to such officers of State or Territorial commission in their respective grades by the governor of such State or Territory, when such State or Territory shall by law have duly authorized such action upon the part of the governor thereof and shall have otherwise complied with the conditions of this act for the keeping of State or Territorial troops. In the District of Columbia such officers shall be assigned upon the recommendation of the commanding general of the National Guard of the United States in said District: Provided, That no officer of the Regular Army shall be assigned to the command of any organization of the National Guard of the United States, entirely comprised within the limits of any State except with the approval of the governor thereof. The commanding officers and staffs of organizations of the National Guard of the United States composed of troops from two or more States shall be assigned from the Regular Army or reserve personnel of the Army under regulations prepared as prescribed in section — of this act. Officers so detailed or assigned may accept such State or Territorial commissions, with the permission of the President and terminable in his discretion, without vacating their commissions in the Regular Army or Officers' Reserve Corps or being prejudiced in their relative or lineal standing therein. No person shall be commissioned as an officer of the National Guard of the United States unless such person holds a commission in the Regular Army or Officers' Reserve Corps. All persons hereafter to be commissioned as officers in the National Guard of the United States shall, upon being commissioned under the provisions of this act, take and subscribe to the following oath:

"'I, ——— ———, having been appointed a ——— in the National Guard of the United States, do solemnly swear that I will support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that I will bear true faith and allegiance to the United States of America; that I will obey the orders of the President of the United States; that I take this obligation freely, without any mental reservation or purpose of evasion; and that I will well and faithfully discharge the duties of the office of ——— in the National Guard of the United States upon which I am about to enter. I do further solemnly swear to bear true faith and allegiance to the State of ——— and to obey the orders of the governor thereof, subject to the Constitution and laws of the United States, so help me God.'

"SEC. —. Discipline and training of the National Guard of the United States: The discipline and training of the National Guard of the United States shall conform to the system which is now or may hereafter be prescribed for the Regular Army. Each company, troop, battery, and detachment in the National Guard of the United States shall assemble for drill and instruction, including indoor target practice, not less than 48 times each year, and shall, in addition thereto, participate in encampments, maneuvers, or other exercises, including outdoor target practice, at least 15 days in training each year, including target practice, unless such company, troop, battery, or detachment shall have been excused from participation in any part thereof by the Secretary of War, or shall at the time prescribed therefor be under the orders of the governor of the State or Territory as provided for in section — of this act.

"All officers and employees of the United States and of the District of Columbia who shall be members of the National Guard of the United States shall be entitled to leave of absence from their respective duties, without loss of pay, time, or efficiency rating, on all days during which they shall be engaged in field or coast-defense training ordered or authorized under the provisions of this act.

"SEC. —. Liability of the National Guard of the United States for service: When Congress shall have authorized the use of the land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations as he may prescribe, call into active service for the period of the emergency, unless sooner relieved, the whole or any part of the National Guard of the United States: Provided, That when necessary in order to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, or to repel invasions, the President may, in his discretion and under the same conditions as permit the calling out of the National Guard of the several States or Territories, call into active service the whole or any part of the National Guard of the United States to serve solely within the United States, for such period as he may direct. Officers and enlisted men called into active service under the terms of this section shall have the same pay and allowances as officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army of the same grades and same prior service.

"SEC. —. Maintenance of other troops by the States: The consent of Congress is hereby given to each of the States to maintain troops in time of peace: Provided, That the State concerned shall first make provision therefor by legislative enactment in no respect contrary to, and in all respects in harmony with, the provisions of this act: Provided further, That no troops shall be thus maintained except such as belong to the units of the National Guard of the United States comprised within the limits of such State: Provided further, That the States and Territories in time of peace, and subject to such regulations as to expense and property accountability as may be prescribed by the President, shall be entitled to use as State or Territorial troops under the direct orders of the governor of the State or Territory, and for such purpose as State or Territorial militia might legally be used, so much of the National Guard of the United States within their respective borders as has been enlisted in the troops of the State or Territory and commissioned by the governor thereof in accordance with the terms of this act and as is not at the time in active service under a call by the President: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent the organization and maintenance by the States and Territories of State or Territorial militia, State police, or State constabulary.

"SEC. —. Pay for the National Guard of the United States: Captains and lieutenants belonging to organizations of the National Guard of the United States shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the monthly base pay prescribed for officers of the Regular Army of their grades, for each regular drill or other period of instruction authorized by the Secretary of War, not exceeding five in any one calendar month at which they shall have been officially present for the required period, and at which not less than 50 per cent of the commissioned strength and at least 60 per cent of the enlisted strength attend and participate for at least one and one-half hours. Captains commanding organizations shall receive $240 per annum in addition to the drill pay herein prescribed. Officers above the grade of captain shall receive not more than $500 per annum, and officers below the grade of major, not belonging to organizations, shall receive not more than four-thirtieths of the monthly base pay of their grades, for satisfactory performance of their appropriate duties, under such regulations as the Secretary of War may prescribe.

"Each enlisted man belonging to an organization of the National Guard of the United States shall receive compensation at the rate of one-thirtieth of the initial monthly pay of his grade in the Regular Army for each drill ordered for his organization at which he is officially present, and in which he participates for not less than one and one-half hours, not exceeding five in any one calendar month; but no enlisted man shall receive any pay under the provisions of this section for any month in which he shall have attended less than 60 per cent of the drills or other exercises prescribed for his organization. Periods of actual military duty equivalent to the drills herein prescribed may be accepted in lieu of such drills when so provided by the Secretary of War. Pay under the provisions of this section shall not accrue to any person during a period when he shall be lawfully entitled to the same pay as a member of the Regular Army of corresponding grade.

"SEC. —. The National Guard of the United States subject to laws governing the Regular Army: The National Guard of the United States, except when on duty as State troops pursuant to orders from competent State authority, shall be subject to the laws and regulations governing the Regular Army, so far as such laws and regulations are applicable to officers and enlisted men whose permanent retention in active military service is not contemplated by existing law."

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order upon the motion. First, due to the fact that the House has just adopted a motion disagreeing further to the Senate amendments, a motion now would not be in order directly contravening that action.

Mr. KAHN. Oh——

Mr. CRAMTON. If the gentleman will permit. The amendment of the Senate is only one amendment, having stricken out everything after the enacting clause and substituted a new bill. There is but one Senate amendment, hence the motion just adopted by the House, if it has any effect at all, is a motion instructing the conferees further to insist upon the House provisions and not to accept the Senate amendment. Furthermore, the motion which is before us now is a motion requesting the conferees to substitute for certain sections of the Senate amendment certain language which does not appear either in the Senate bill or in the House bill. The single Senate amendment to which we have just instructed them to disagree does not have this language. Now we have a motion before us instructing the conferees to take up certain language that is not in either bill and place it in the Senate bill, and after we have done that we are still in the dark then as to our further action upon the balance of the bill. If sections 59, 60, and so forth, were before the House in disagreement the motion might be in order, but inasmuch as the disagreement between the Houses goes to the entire substitute by the Senate, I submit that the present motion is not in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the further point of order that the only opportunity further to instruct the conferees to be in order should come after the conference is asked for and granted and before the conferees are appointed, and this is in fact a motion to instruct the conferees at a time when it is not in order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman wish to favor or contest the point or order?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I just want to call attention to the fact that the gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order on the ground that the House has disagreed to the Senate amendment, and the gentleman from Texas makes the point of order on the ground that the House has not disagreed to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas, of course, is mistaken as to the fact.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Illinois state if he agrees with either one of us?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is ready to rule. The gentleman from Texas is mistaken as to the fact. The House has already disagreed and asked for a conference. That is the proper stage at which a motion to instruct should be made, and the Chair had occasion——

Mr. BLANTON. I thought merely that the House had disagreed to the Senate amendment. I was not aware of the fact that the House had already agreed to the conference.

The SPEAKER. It has.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, of course, it is in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair had occasion to rule on this question the other day, and ruled that at this stage it was proper to instruct the conferees. Now, as to the point that the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] makes that the House can not instruct the conferees as to a portion of the Senate amendment because it would be inconsistent with its action of disagreement, it seems to the Chair that the House can instruct its conferees in any way it pleases, and inasmuch as the House has disagreed to the Senate amendment any instruction, except to insist upon that disagreement, would be in some measure inconsistent with its disagreement; but if the House can instruct—and the Chair believes there is no doubt about that—the Chair thinks the House can instruct as to part of the Senate amendment. That would leave the House and the Senate still in disagreement, and the conferees would still have jurisdiction to decide as they pleased about the rest. Of course, that ruling leaves full freedom to the House to instruct or not to instruct, and the Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate on the motion be limited to two hours, one hour to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] and one hour to be utilized by myself.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I will say there are a number of gentlemen on this side of the House opposed to the motion made by the chairman of the committee who would like some time. I want to ask, Where will gentlemen on this side of the House who want time get that time who are opposed to the motion of the gentleman?

Mr. KAHN. I presume they will get it from the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I am perfectly willing to divide whatever time I have over here with the gentleman from Kansas, who agrees with me on this proposition.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that debate be limited to two hours, one-half to be controlled by himself and one-half by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. Is there objection?

Mr. KAHN. And the previous question to be considered as ordered at the end of that time.

The SPEAKER. And the previous question to be considered as ordered at the termination of the two hours. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, as this is a very important matter——

Mr. KAHN. There is only one matter——

Mr. BLANTON. But that one matter is of such importance that we find the distinguished gentlemen from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] disagreeing with him on it, and there are other authorities disagreeing on it. Should we not have three hours' debate on this matter? We can not finish anything else to-day and it will give us a little more time. Will not the gentleman give us three hours' debate on it? I think it is not out of proportion to the importance of the subject.

Mr. KAHN. The request for time that I have would indicate that we can finish after an hour's debate on this side, and I understood from the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] that he could probably finish in one hour.

Mr. BLANTON. My colleague over here could not give us any assurance now of any definite time. We are going to him and asking him for time, and he can not assure us of it.

Mr. DENT. I will state to the gentleman that I have had more requests for time than these two hours would allow. I think we ought to establish some limit.

Mr. BLANTON. I think the gentleman would save time by giving us three hours of debate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will this debate be limited to this bill and the question involved in this motion?

Mr. KAHN. Exactly. Mr. Speaker, I will modify that request and make it an hour and 15 minutes on a side.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time be limited to an hour and 15 minutes on a side, half to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]. Is there objection?

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let me ask the gentleman from California if any opportunity will be afforded in the discussion of this matter for anyone to whom time has not been yielded by either the gentleman from California or the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. BEE. It will have to come within the time agreed upon?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I have a motion to instruct to offer. Will this motion on the previous question cut off my right to offer a motion to instruct?

Mr. KAHN. I think it would.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want an opportunity to offer a motion to instruct the conferees on another section, the one I mentioned to the Speaker a while ago.

Mr. KAHN. I do not see how the gentleman's proposition would be affected by the discussion under general debate.

Mr. McKEOWN. Your request incorporates the previous question on this.

Mr. KAHN. But that is another section. That is not involved in my motion, and if the gentleman will offer his motion after my motion is disposed of, I presume it can be settled.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have no objection to limiting the time if I have opportunity to offer my motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN]?

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will it be in order after the disposition of the motion of the gentleman from California to offer to instruct the conferees on another section of the bill?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is disposed to think if the previous question is ordered——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Oklahoma has the right to offer another motion to instruct after we beat this one, I do not see that the previous question being ordered on this would have anything to do with the motion of the gentleman from Oklahoma.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Well, Mr. Speaker, I do not think more than one motion to instruct will be in order.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Because that is the end of it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a prediction that might not be true.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman can offer an amendment.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. An amendment for what?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. An amendment to this motion.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know; but the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] gave an ex cathedra opinion there a minute ago; if his motion for the previous question was agreed to he could not offer a motion to amend this thing.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course he could not. If the previous question is ordered, you can not amend it.

Mr. McKEOWN. I directed that parliamentary inquiry to the Speaker, and he held it would not be in order to offer a motion to amend.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion. If the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] modifies his unanimous-consent request by withdrawing the request for the ordering of the previous question at the end of the two hours' discussion, the gentleman can then offer his amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The managers on the part of the House have reported no disagreement on the section that the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN] proposes now to amend or to instruct about. How would that, then, be in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not know what the gentleman's motion is.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. CRAMTON. As a matter of fact, the managers have reported a disagreement on the entire Senate amendment. Further, as to the nature of the amendment proposed by the gentleman from California, it has nothing to do with the disagreement as a whole. It only relates to certain specified sections, and, as the Speaker has just ruled, when that is disposed of it will be in order to provide further instructions as to the balance of the amendment if the House so desires.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would be disposed to think so.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California for an hour and a quarter on each side? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized for 1 hour and 15 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, there is only one question involved in this matter. That question is, Shall the State organize its National Guard under the Army clauses of the Constitution, or shall the State organize its National Guard under the militia clauses? Every State under this compromise will have the absolute right to determine how it will organize its National Guard, and whether it organize that guard under the militia clauses or under the Army clauses, it will receive the same support from the Federal Government. As a matter of fact, in the 111 years of the existence of this Republic there has been a great deal of controversy about the organization of the National Guard. For upward of a hundred years we have organized under the militia clauses. There are National Guard men and National Guard officers who contend that the guard would be a much better organization if it could be organized under the Army clauses. In fact, the provision of the Senate bill on the National Guard was largely drawn by National Guard officers who commanded National Guard troops in the World War. Those officers were Col. Foreman, of the National Guard of Illinois, and Col. Galbraith, of Ohio, of the National Guard of that State. And they were supported by Gen. O'Ryan, who commanded the Twenty-seventh Division of New York troops, a National Guard organization, during the World War. These gentlemen urged that in the future the Army clauses of the Constitution be invoked for the organization of the National Guard. This matter was later taken up by the American Legion, composed of soldiers of the World War; the American Legion approved the proposition, and sent another committee to the Senate committee, composed, in part, of Col. Hough, of Illinois, who was a commander of a regiment in the Rainbow Division; Col. Donovan, of New York, who was also a commander of a regiment of the Rainbow Division; and Lieut. Col. Opie, of Virginia, who commanded a battalion in the Twenty-ninth Division, so that these National Guard officers, with actual experience as officers in the World War, recommended the proposition which the Senate adopted.

Now, the House conferees did not feel justified in following the Senate as far as the Senate wanted to go. Finally the Senate conferees agreed that they would accept a compromise, and leave it optional with every State in the Union to organize its National Guard either under the Army clauses of the Constitution or under the militia clauses of the Constitution. My motion simply proposes to allow such language to be written in the law as will give the individual State the right to organize its National Guard in the way in which it deems best.

Mr. BEE. Would it interrupt the gentleman if I were to ask him a question right in that connection?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. BEE. I was thinking of this feature of it with reference to the man who enlisted: Suppose a man enlists in the National Guard and his State afterwards does not accept under the militia clause. That man would then be subject to the Regular Army duty under the war clause of the Constitution, would he not?

Mr. KAHN. If he enlisted under the militia clause——

Mr. BEE. When would his option be exercised by the enlisted man?

Mr. KAHN. The enlisted man would have no option in the matter, because his State legislature would determine for him under which clause the State National Guard would be organized.

Mr. BEE. After he had rendered himself liable to duty by enlistment. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. KAHN. The States will still determine how they want to organize their guards.

Mr. BEE. Before the enlistment of the men takes place?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly. And then, if the State elect through its legislature to enlist or organize its National Guard under the Army clauses, it would be governed by the compromise language which is included in my motion. If, on the other hand, the State should elect to organize under the militia clauses, the guardsman would be enlisted under the terms of the House bill as passed by the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If Congress should agree to this double plan, and one State were to organize under the Army clause and another under the militia clause, is it not absolutely certain that the War Department would be forever discriminating against the National Guard that was organized under the militia clause?

Mr. KAHN. I do not think so.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman say that in the World War, the last war, the National Guard was not manhandled?

Mr. KAHN. Let me tell the gentleman that a great deal of the difficulty arose because the National Guard was organized under the militia clauses. That was the very difficulty that we encountered in this war, because none of the officers——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. What difficulty was there about that?

Mr. KAHN. I am going to explain.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. All right.

Mr. KAHN. Because every National Guard officer had his commission from the governor of his State. When the National Guard was called out he had to be recommissioned by the President of the United States, and the men had to be sworn in under the Federal law.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The War Department and everybody connected with it are against the National Guard, are they not?

Mr. KAHN. Far from it.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Did they not manhandle them during the war?

Mr. KAHN. Some of them.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Most of them.

Mr. KAHN. Evidently these National Guard officers—Col. Foreman, who commanded a regiment of Illinois Infantry, was not manhandled, and——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, they could not manhandle all of them.

Mr. KAHN. And Col. Galbraith, of the Ohio Infantry, was not manhandled.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, the gentleman can only pick out two or three.

Mr. KAHN. No; I have mentioned them as types of the men who believe in the Army provisions in the Constitution. But the gentleman from Missouri proposes to support and continue the system under which, so he says, they were manhandled.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman how the National Guards which were organized under the militia clause could be manhandled any more by the War Department simply because other National Guards saw fit to seek organization under the Army clause?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. They can discriminate against them about the movements and commands and everything of the kind, just as they did in this last war.

Mr. KAHN. I feel that in any event the States ought to be given the right to try out either system they want.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KAHN. Not just now. I want to make this statement: You are going to have a controversy as to the proper organization of the Army as long as this Government exists unless we settle these mooted questions and settle them right. These gentlemen who believe in the organization of the National Guard under the Army clauses of the Constitution feel that the State should have the right to organize, if it so desires, under the Army clauses. You will have this condition, in my opinion: You will have some States organizing under the Army clauses, you will have some of the States organizing under the militia clauses. There will be no difficulty about that, and in 6 or 8 years from now, or possibly 10 years, Congress itself will be able to judge which character of National Guard is the better for the defense of this country. I feel that there will be no difficulty ultimately in having the people of the entire country determine whether the Army clauses are best or whether the militia clauses are best.

Mr. LAYTON rose.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Delaware. He was on his feet.

Mr. LAYTON. Then the fact of the matter is this: No matter how they are organized, whether under the Army clause or under the militia clause in time of peace, they will all be subject to the national authority and the commissions of the President of the United States in time of war.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly, with this further suggestion, however, that in organizing under the Army clause, the officer will get his commission originally from the President of the United States, and a regiment so organized will not be "manhandled," as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] suggested, but will go immediately to the place it is ordered, without having a lot of officers going through additional examinations as to their health, their competency, and so on.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman further.

Mr. LAYTON. Then the gentleman logically admits that if this becomes a law for the purpose of escaping any manhandling it would be a very wise procedure to organize under the Army clauses?

Mr. KAHN. That is my view of the subject absolutely.

Mr. CRAMTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. CRAMTON. The option is given the State to organize the National Guard under the Army clause or the militia clause. If organized under the Army clause there is aid given to the State by Federal appropriation for officers and men. What provision is made for Federal aid in that same direction if organized under the militia clause?

Mr. KAHN. Identically the same.

Mr. CRAMTON. By what authority?

Mr. KAHN. By the same authority in the national-defense act.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Senate bill repeals practically all of the Hay bill. Does it leave in these provisions?

Mr. KAHN. It repeals most of the sections regarding the National Guard provisions of the national-defense act, but this compromise law will allow all of those provisions to stand in the law because they are contained in the House bill, and those provisions provide for paying the National Guard.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Federal aid would be the same in each case?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of the National Guard officers receiving commissions from the governor and having to be resworn.

Mr. KAHN. In case they are called into the Federal service.

Mr. BLANTON. Why have you provided for two different kinds of oaths in the amendment which you have offered? In other words, the officers take an oath that they will defend the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic. Then when you get to the enlisted man in taking the oath, he does not swear that he will defend the Government against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

Mr. KAHN. If the gentleman will look at the national-defense act, that is exactly the way the National Guard is authorized now.

Mr. BLANTON. The same oath ought to be applicable to both.

Mr. KAHN. It is. The National Guard provision of the national-defense act provides for a dual oath for every enlisted man and every officer.

Mr. BLANTON. It is not in the gentleman's amendment; there are two kinds of oath in the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Because this amendment only provides for allowing the National Guard to be organized under the Army clauses. Where they are organized under the militia clauses is all found in the national-defense act, and it would apply to both kinds of organizations.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. I want to ask the gentleman a question. I understood the gentleman to say that they would be commissioned by the President in case of war. That means that they will be appointed by the President?

Mr. KAHN. Upon recommendation of the governor.

Mr. BEE. Would it be absolutely incumbent on the President to follow the recommendation of the governor, or would it be optional with him?

Mr. KAHN. I presume that if the officer were considered unfit the President would refuse to appoint him; but the President could not appoint another officer who was not recommended by the governor.

Mr. BEE. Let me ask the gentleman a further question. There are National Guard organizations now in existence, and if this amendment be adopted and a compromise agreed to, what becomes of those organizations of the National Guard already in existence? Are they continued without further action of the State?

Mr. KAHN. No; they are now organized under the militia clauses of the Constitution.

Mr. BEE. And they will remain so until the States decide.

Mr. KAHN. If the State were to change the organization, the legislature would undoubtedly make provision for the absorption of the present organization into the new organization. But that is a matter entirely for the State.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. If the State should turn over its militia organization to the Government, and after a period of time discovered that it had made a mistake, what provision is there for the State to regain control?

Mr. KAHN. There is no doubt that the State legislature has the option to determine that matter at any time.

Mr. KNUTSON. When they shall cease to have their National Guard under Federal control.

Mr. KAHN. Exactly so.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Who is to pay the expenses for the armories?

Mr. KAHN. That is one of the matters that will have to be thrashed out in conference. That is a very important matter. Many of the States have expended a great deal of money on their armories. Of course, the State is entitled to that armory; but that is not involved in the question as to whether you want to adopt the Army clauses for the organization of your National Guard or the militia clauses, because, after all, the State legislature determines that, and the matter of the armories is one that is outside of that altogether.

Mr. HULL of Iowa. Would it not be involved if you decided that the State would have to pay the armory expenses, as they do to-day? In a great many States it is unconstitutional to appropriate money for something that the State does not control.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, as I say to the gentleman, that is not involved in this motion. There is a great deal of money or property involved in the various States—New York, Pennsylvania, Iowa, and other States—that have expended large sums for armories. But that has no connection with the questions that we are now considering. The ownership of these armories will remain the same, and they will be used by the National Guard, no matter whether they are organized under the militia clauses or under the Army clauses.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. In my State the legislature, which was in session up to two months ago, appropriated a large sum of money for the National Guard. When this bill came up I immediately conferred with some people who are interested in my State, and they say that upon investigation, if this conference report is adopted, the money that was appropriated by my State may not be used for this purpose until the legislature convenes again. In that event my State will be without a National Guard.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think the gentleman understands the situation thoroughly, or somebody is trying to mislead him. As a matter of fact, the Federal Government now gives aid to the National Guard organizations of the different States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I appreciate and understand that.

Mr. KAHN. The State in turn meets that appropriation. Some States have given very liberally, as is evidenced by the statement of the gentleman from Mississippi. Other States have given smaller amounts.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Who pays the National Guard under the Federal organization?

Mr. KAHN. The Government of the United States.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Altogether?

Mr. KAHN. No; just in proportion as they have been paying heretofore. There will be no difference in the appropriation given by the Federal Government to the various States, no matter whether they organize under the Army clauses or under the militia clauses.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I want to ask the gentleman a question for information, because I want to know the proper course to pursue. What benefit is there to be derived by taking the organization out from under the militia clause and putting it under the Army clause? I am asking the question for information.

Mr. KAHN. Let me cite the gentleman some of the conditions that now exist. New York State has a population that enables it to organize a division by itself. Pennsylvania could probably do the same, as well as Illinois and possibly Ohio. The other States will probably never, in our lifetime at least, be able to organize divisions. This war developed the fact beyond dispute that the proper military unit for defending or attacking is the division, which is composed of 27,000 fighting men. I call the attention of the gentleman to the situation in New England, for instance. There we have quite a number of States that are really very much in favor of National Guard organizations, but there is no one of the States that has enough national guardsmen to form a division. Under the Constitution and the militia clauses, as affecting the National Guard, you could not appoint a commander of a division who happened to live in Massachusetts over the troops in Rhode Island or Connecticut or New Hampshire or Vermont or Maine. He could only be the commander of the troops in his own State.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Let me ask the gentleman a question on that.

Mr. KAHN. That is as far as he could go. It is essential that the National Guard of the Union be so organized in peace times that they can function as a full division if we are to get the effect from such a number of men as we desire to get in case the country is attacked.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Could not two or three of the States group and have a division?

Mr. KAHN. No; not under the militia clauses of the Constitution. They absolutely could not.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. I am speaking now about the Army clauses.

Mr. KAHN. Yes; under the Army clauses they could.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. That is what I wanted to ask the gentleman. In my State, of course, we would not have enough national guardsmen to form a division. Then the troops from Mississippi would be placed under a man from another State, if several States grouped to form a division. That is true, is it not?

Mr. KAHN. Yes; but that man, under the proposed compromise, would have to be a reserve officer.

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], the distinguished ex-Speaker, intimated in his questions that if this compromise plan was adopted the National Guards organized under the militia clauses of the Constitution would suffer a discrimination which could not be practiced against them if we remain under the present plan and all of the National Guards were organized under the National Guard clauses. Does the gentleman think there is any justification for such a belief?

Mr. KAHN. I do not.

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. HARRELD. You provide here for dual enlistments. The bill specifically provides that the same dual enlistment shall be signed——

Mr. KAHN. That is existing law.

Mr. HARRELD. That does not apply to existing troops.

Mr. KAHN. It applies to everybody in the National Guard who enlisted under the national-defense act.

Mr. HARRELD. In several States, like my own, they have not signed this dual enlistment.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, yes, they have, if they were organized under the national-defense act.

Mr. HARRELD. They were not.

Mr. KAHN. Then they do not get any Federal aid.

Mr. CALDWELL. If they are not organized under the national-defense act, when they wear the uniform they are committing a crime. I think the gentleman must be mistaken.

Mr. REED of West Virginia. If the State organized under the national provision, does it in any way or under any circumstance forfeit its right to control its officers from that State?

Mr. KAHN. Absolutely not. The governor of that State calls out the National Guard, and the guard is exactly in the same position as it is now. The President commissions the officers in the guard if organized under the Army clauses, but solely on recommendation of the governor.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further, briefly, on the same point I was speaking about before?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. The Senate bill in section 84 repeals 113 out of 128 sections of the Hay national-defense act.

Mr. KAHN. If this compromise is adopted, of course all of that goes out of the Senate bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. Is there anything in the motion proposed now by the gentleman from California that deals in any way with the aid or regulations affecting the National Guard if raised under the militia section?

Mr. KAHN. Of course, the House provisions of the reorganization bill continue the sections of the national-defense act. They will become a part of the law in conjunction with this.

Mr. CRAMTON. If agreed to by the conferees.

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CRAMTON. But there is nothing in the compromise proposition now made that covers that proposition at all, and we must follow the gentleman blindly on that. That is the situation.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say to the gentleman from Michigan that if the House adopts this matter, the gentleman has very able colleagues on the conference who will undoubtedly support him very strongly in seeing that those provisions of the Senate bill are stricken out.

Mr. CRAMTON. But if we accept this part of the compromise and yield on that, then we take our chances as to whether the Senate will yield on the other part. The compromise is only partial.

Mr. KAHN. I can say to the gentleman that I have the assurance of the Senate conferees that they will not insist on those sections of the Senate bill as it now stands respecting the National Guard, and they will recede.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE. In connection with the matter suggested by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON] I think it would be fair to state that the House bill was prepared as a series of amendments to the national-defense act, including those sections affecting the National Guard. The Senate bill was an original bill, drawn without any relation to the national-defense act whatsoever.

We have said to them that if we accept this compromise it shall be an amendment to the national-defense act attached to the section caring for the National Guard under the national-defense act, and that is the understanding, so the gentleman need have no fear.

Mr. CRAMTON. Of course, the understanding of the House is that the amendment before us is to be added to the Senate bill.

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no; it is to take the place of the Senate bill.

Mr. CRAMTON. I am very glad to get definite information.

Mr. JEFFERIS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. JEFFERIS. This may have been asked, but I would like to inquire what would be the authority of the governor of a State over the State militia if the legislature had permitted it to be organized under the Army clause?

Mr. KAHN. He would have absolute authority under this legislation to call out the militia in case of insurrection or invasion, or to enforce the law, just as he has the authority under the militia clause.

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. YATES. Could that governor commission an officer?

Mr. KAHN. Under the militia clause he could.

Mr. YATES. Up to what grade?

Mr. KAHN. All of them. But in the Army clause the governor could only recommend for commission and the commission would come from the President of the United States. Mr. Speaker, I have consumed considerable time. I submit again that the only thing involved in this proposition is, Are you willing to let the State legislature determine how the National Guard of that State is to be organized or are you going to refuse the States the right to determine the question——

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not yield; I have not the time.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman made a statement a moment ago that this bill left the governors of the States in the same attitude that the law now is in reference to domestic concerns?

Mr. KAHN. I does.

Mr. SISSON. Well, I want to ask the gentleman if he believes that this is true when I read from the bill:

No State shall maintain troops in time of peace other than those authorized in accordance with the provisions of this act——

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SISSON. That is limitation No. 1.

Provided, That the States and Territories——

Mr. KAHN. That is a limitation of the Constitution.

Mr. SISSON (reading):

Provided, That the States and Territories, in time of peace, and subject to such regulations as to expense, property accountability, and other matters as may be prescribed by the President—

And so forth.

Therefore the governor is not left as he is now. That is a limitation upon the governor's right——

Mr. KAHN. There is no limitation upon it. The gentleman is evidently reading from the Senate amendment. That language is altered in the proposed compromise. The governor is authorized under the compromise to call out his troops in case of insurrection or invasion or to enforce the laws.

Mr. SISSON. One of two things is true: Either the language of this law means nothing or the gentleman himself has totally misconstrued it, because the language of this bill specifically provides that they can only be called out upon regulations made by the President of the United States.

Mr. KAHN. There is a provision in this proposed compromise which authorizes the governor to call out troops for the purposes I have indicated, and in the case of a national emergency the President calls them out.

Mr. SISSON. I do not think the gentleman intends to mislead the House, but that language is specific and positive that the President of the United States should have the right.

Mr. KAHN. Well, I have consumed too much time, but I will look up the exact language. I can not put my finger on it now, although I have read the matter a number of times. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. OLNEY. Before the gentleman closes, the gentleman will recall the Pullman car strike in the late nineties?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. If at that time the National Guard of Illinois had been organized under the Army clause would it not have been possible for the War Department to have ordered out the National Guard to quell the existing conditions?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. OLNEY. In other words, the United States could only interfere when the mails were tampered with, and then Regular troops were called out?

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is absolutely correct. Mr. Speaker, this is the language in the proposed compromise provision as to the authority of the governor over the National Guard when organized under the Army clause of the Constitution:

Provided further, That the States and Territories, in time of peace, and subject to such regulations as to expense and property accountability as may be prescribed by the President, shall be entitled to use as State or Territorial troops, under the direct orders of the governor of the State or Territory, and for such purpose as State or Territorial militia might legally be used, so much of the National Guard of the United States within their respective borders as has been enlisted in the troops of the State or Territory and commissioned by the governor thereof in accordance with the terms of this act and as is not at the time in active service under a call by the President: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent the organization and maintenance by the States and Territories of State or Territorial militia, State police, or State constabulary.

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for an hour and 15 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON].

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, of course you can not discuss this bill and conference report in five minutes. I want to make this statement that I think is borne out by the history of this bill from the time it was taken up to be prepared up to this good moment: First, every man who believes in universal military training will and should support this bill, because that is what it means in its last analysis. [Applause.] This is an entering wedge and a step to universal compulsory military training. [Applause.] That is proposition No. 1. Second, every man who believes in the destruction of the National Guard system will and should vote for this bill. Those of you who believe in the National Guard, do not fool yourselves. This bill has been drawn by officers of the Regular Army. This bill was not prepared either by the Senate or by the House committee. They may have changed a few syllables here and a few letters there, but it is a Regular Army bill, and do not fool yourselves and do not go back home in the November election with a camouflage about it. This bill is the forerunner of universal military training in America. It is the next to the last blow to do what the Regular Army officers have been wanting to do for some time. It is next to the last blow to destroy the State Militia. It is next to the last blow to destroy State rights of having an organization of their own State constabulary as provided under the Federal Constitution. There is a clause in this bill that provides that where the States shall organize a State militia not in accordance with this act they are guilty of a crime.

Mr. YATES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. I will.

Mr. YATES. I would like to have the gentleman's authority for that statement. I do not mean to be disrespectful, but I would like to have his authority for the statement that this bill is not presented by the committee but by the Army.

Mr. SISSON. I make that statement that this bill in every single step of it has been prepared and dictated largely by the Army officers. [Applause.] Now, I have not time to yield further; I have only five minutes.

Mr. YATES. And I understand the Army opposes this bill?

Mr. SISSON. The Army; oh, yes——

Mr. YATES. This proposition.

Mr. SISSON. Oh, yes; they got up this compromise. That compromise was made, written, and prepared by Army officers, because they realized this House would not agree totally to destroy the National Guard at one blow, and they seek in this way to do it.

Do not fool yourselves, gentlemen. I want to say right now that every time a Democrat votes in favor of this proposition he is, whether he wills it or not, doing all in his power to destroy the National Guard. The Democrats have always believed in the National Guard under the Federal Constitution. They could not get rid of that proposition because it is in the Constitution, and therefore have got to kill it in this way.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SISSON. If I can get more time.

Mr. KAHN. I wanted to answer the question the gentleman propounded.

Mr. SISSON. The gentleman has ample time in which to answer. I have only five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. SISSON. All right. I am going to be fair, and if the gentleman wants to be fair let him yield to me the time. I have only five minutes. I want to state that those of you who go before the country should be fair with them and say to them that this is the entering wedge to compulsory universal military training, because they provide here for universal voluntary military training. It will provide what the Regular Army intended to do at the beginning of the war. War was declared between the National Guard and the Regular Army officers when the bill passed for the organization of these soldiers during the war. They have almost destroyed the organization as it is. Everybody knows, if he has consulted these soldier boys, these units from the various neighborhoods were broken up and sent broadcast over the country. No one is betraying the secret of the General Staff of the Army when I tell you that they are opposed to the National Guard. The argument made by the gentleman who is chairman of this committee, when he said you could not get the National Guard to make a national unit of the Army, is the same argument that has been used by the Army officers. Do not fool yourselves, gentlemen. This means universal military training and the destruction of the National Guard. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY]. [Applause.]

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. Speaker, as one of the conferees on the part of the House, I am unable to support the legislation desired by the Senate, which will authorize the organization of the National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution. Under the compromise language which is suggested, it will permit the States to exercise the option whether they will organize their troops as they have been organized ever since the foundation of the Government, under the militia clause or under the Army clause. I think that dual proposition will result in disorganization and confusion to the National Guard. [Applause.]

There is just one State that I know of that wants to impose this handicap upon the National Guard of the United States. The State of New York is asking for this right to organize under the Army clause. All the pressure and all the demand for the legislation comes from the National Guard of that State, and it is not unanimous there. I want to say to the House that it is the almost unanimous judgment of the National Guard officers of every State, practically, in the Union, and of all the adjutants general, that the Congress should not take this action, and that the organization of the National Guard should be permitted to stay where the law now provides.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. I yield.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman be good enough in extending his remarks to give us the result of the activities he has made to get that very accurate information about the personnel of the National Guard?

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the gentleman refer to the State of Vermont?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I do not have to do so. She speaks for this through bigger men than I am.

Mr. ANTHONY. The State the gentleman represents is so small that I forgot to put Vermont in.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Put your census in the RECORD. You made the general statement that almost all the National Guard officers were for this thing.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did make that statement. I will read a telegram which was received by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT] from the president of the National Guard Association of the United States, Col. Bennett Clark, well known in this House. [Applause.] It says:

As president of the National Guard Association of the United States, I desire to thank you and Mr. ANTHONY for your splendid efforts to preserve the National Guard against the effort being made to kill it.

I want to say to the House that it is my candid judgment that this legislation is the culmination of three years' conspiracy on the part of some members of the General Staff and of an element of the Regular Army of the United States to swallow the National Guard. It is the reincarnation of the old proposition which was defeated in this House four or five years ago to create the so-called "continental" army. It is nothing else when reduced to its simple elements than the changing of the National Guard into an absolute Federal force, practically an integral part of the Regular Army.

The Regular Army officers who favor this, in my opinion, do it because they highly value the military capacity of the National Guard. They realize that in time of war in this country the great mass of the soldiers must come from the ranks of the people and not from the Regular Army.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. In a moment—and the National Guard has demonstrated whenever it has been called upon that it furnishes more men than the Regular Army men who are trained for the service of the Government. Over one hundred thousand came to the call of the President on the border a few years ago. Three hundred and sixty-seven thousand National Guardsmen came to the call of the President at the beginning of the World War—as good troops as any which took part in that great struggle. I have seen regiments of the National Guard that have been organized and trained in the last four or five years from a dozen of different States of the Union, and I want to say that I have seen representative regiments of Germany, and France, and of England, and of the Regular Army of the United States, and these National Guard regiments, so far as the real soldier material in their enlisted men is concerned, compare favorably with any others that I have seen in any army. It would be a mistake to permit the organization of the National Guard under the Army clause, for the very reason that the constitutions of half of the States, I am told, would have to be changed in order to permit them to comply with this law if they chose to exercise the option. Under their present constitutions many of them would be unable to vote a dollar for the maintenance of a Federal military force. That would lead to great confusion and an interminable length of time would elapse before the plan could possibly be worked out. Now, the national defense act provides, in my opinion, absolutely perfect provisions for the building up of the National Guard.

Mr. HUSTED. I would like to ask the gentleman from Kansas why he objects to allowing the State of New York to organize its National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution if it wants to do so, as long as it does not interfere with the action of any other State?

Mr. ANTHONY. Let me say to the gentleman from New York that if you have any citizens who want to enlist in the Regular Army of the United States, let them do so. [Applause.] We are trying to create in the National Guard a force of citizen soldiery who will be trained under the supervision and discipline of the Army of the United States, so that they can be relied upon to defend the country when called upon in time of need. We are not trying to enlarge the Regular Army further than the limits we set forth in the Army reorganization bill, the 299,000 Regular soldiers therein provided, in my judgment, being ample.

Mr. HUSTED. I do not think the gentleman's answer was quite responsive to my question. I asked the gentleman why he objected to permitting the State of New York to organize its National Guard under the Army clause of the Constitution, not to enlist in the Regular Army but to organize the National Guard under the Army clause, if they thought that was the more efficient way to do it and if they wanted to do it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I do not think it would be wise to have two brands or breeds of National Guard in this country. [Applause.] If we permitted the National Guard to be organized in some States under the Army clause of the Constitution and to be organized in other States under the militia clause of the Constitution, we would have a set of "white sheep" and a set of "black sheep," and those that were organized under the Army clause would be invariably commended in every Regular Army report, and those organized under the militia clause would be invariably condemned and harassed in every report that was made by an inspector general from the Regular Establishment. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Is not that a very unfair assumption of an unfair attitude on the part of the officers of the Regular Army?

Mr. ANTHONY. No; not if we consider the previous unfair treatment accorded the National Guard. At the conclusion of the World War there was no question but that it was determined down in the War Department to do away with the National Guard at one fell swoop. They decided that they would muster out every returning National Guard organization that returned from Europe, and they did so and discharged every man, not only from the United States service but as well from the National Guard of the several States, and National Guard organizations almost ceased to exist.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANTHONY. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Does not the gentleman agree that, under the terms of the Hay bill, it was specifically provided that when the National Guard was drafted into the service for the war when they were returned they were absolutely discharged back to civil life?

Mr. ANTHONY. No. They were to be discharged back to their previous status.

Mr. CALDWELL. Oh, no.

Mr. ANTHONY. Well, that is a difference of opinion. Let me tell you what the Militia Bureau in the War Department, administered by a Regular Army officer, has done. Since they attempted the wholesale discharge and destruction of the National Guard they imposed requirements in the organization of new National Guard companies which the Regular Army itself has found to be impossible to comply with. They demanded that before they would recognize a new company of the National Guard that it should consist of 105 men. And, gentlemen, there is hardly in the Regular Army to-day a company of Infantry of over 35 or 40 men. The Regular Army can not maintain its own organization up to the standard they are requiring of the National Guard.

I hope the House will vote down the motion of the gentleman from California and permit the conferees to represent what I believe are the views of the people of the country and the views of the Members of this House with respect to the continuance of the organization of the National Guard. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I yield back the remainder of my time.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 37 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. How much time has the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. DENT]?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Sixty minutes.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

Mr. DENT. The Chair does not mean to say that I have used 60 minutes?

Mr. KAHN. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 60 minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CALDWELL].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, in response to my question of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY], whether it was not a fact that the national defense act provided that when the National Guard was drafted into the United States Army its members could not be discharged back into the National Guard, he differed with me on that subject. I call his attention to section 111 of the national defense act. I will read from that act now. It says:

All persons so drafted—

Meaning the drafting of the National Guard—

shall from the date of draft stand discharged from the militia, and from said date shall be subject to such laws and regulations for the government of the Army of the United States as may be applicable to the members of the Volunteer Army.

So that when the National Guard was drafted into the service of the United States under the national defense act it was necessary on the discharge of those men to send them back to a civil status; and one of the reasons why I am compelled to support this proposition offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is the fact that when we had the Regular Army reorganization bill before this House the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE] offered an amendment changing that method of discharge of the National Guard, so that they would go back to the National Guard organization of which they were members, and you will remember that here on this floor I called attention to the fact that that would be unconstitutional and that we would destroy the National Guard.

You will have no National Guard if you undertake to carry out that provision in the law, because the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress shall only have authority in the matter of prescribing regulations for the organization, and that the several States shall have the appointment of the officers, and that the militia can only be used for limited purposes. When drafted they cease to be militia. When discharged they cease to be soldiers. Now, the Constitution of the United States has three provisions that affect the power of the Congress in the matter of organizing a Federal force and a State force. The first provision I cite is Article I, section 8, subdivision 16, which says that Congress shall have authority—

To provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress.

Now, it was under that section of the Federal Constitution that the national defense act organized the National Guard of this country.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. In those States where the State constitution provides that the governor of the State shall be the commander in chief of the National Guard of that State, would it be necessary, if this proposition were enacted into law, to amend the constitution of those States?

Mr. CALDWELL. I will answer the gentleman if he will just follow me for a moment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. There is no constitution of any State in the Union unless it is one of the more recently adopted constitutions that has anything to say about the National Guard, because there was no National Guard at the time when most of the State constitutions were framed; there was no National Guard then in existence. The old State constitutions speak of the "militia," but the National Guard and the militia are two different things.

Mr. LANGLEY. The Kentucky constitution covers both.

Mr. CALDWELL. The next provision of the Constitution which I will cite as affecting the action of the Congress in the matter of organizing a Federal force or State force is Article I, section 8, subdivision 12 It provides that—

> The Congress of the United States shall have power to raise and support armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years.

It is under that provision of the Constitution of the United States that the Regular Army is organized and disciplined.

The third section which I call attention to is contained in Article I, section 10, of the Constitution of the United States, which reads:

> No State shall, without the consent of Congress * * * keep troops * * * in time of peace.

That is a section of the Constitution under which it is sought here to organize this Federal force. It will be a new force; we have never had a force of that kind. The distinction will be made between the militia and the troops that belong to the State as contemplated by the Constitution. Now then, if the State can not keep troops without the consent of Congress, it follows as night follows day that Congress can specify the terms under which the State can keep those troops.

In this bill we say to the States you may keep troops provided you will conform to the terms we lay down in this bill. That is all that there is to the constitutional question except the distinction between the word "troops" and the word "militia."

What is militia? The dictionary says, and the Supreme Court of the United States has said, that militia is all of the able-bodied men in the country between reasonable ages, who are citizens of the country, capable of bearing arms for its defense. And in some decisions they have gone on to say that members of the Regular Army and Navy are not militia because they are soldiers in the service of the United States. At no time have they undertaken to describe what would be troops under this provision of the Constitution, because since we have had a Government no State has had an armed force organized under that section of the law.

Now, we know that during the Revolutionary period, when we had Federal soldiers operating in conjunction with militia, that when the Commander in Chief of the Army sent the Federal force outside of the country and obtained a temporary victory, and called upon the militia to come and aid in maintaining that victory, the militia refused to go, on the ground that he had no authority to direct them to proceed outside of the State in which they were serving; that the operation was not to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, nor to enforce the law, which were the only things the militia could be used for by the National Government.

We know that these men were citizens of the United States and of the State, that they were in uniform and bore arms; and so, if we say that troops are citizens of the United States who are armed and trained for the defense of the country, we do not correctly describe what is meant by troops, because that description would have fitted the militia in the service of the country and was recognized as militia, notwithstanding it was a trained and equipped organization.

Then what are troops? We know what soldiers are; we know what an army is under the terms of the Constitution, for the Supreme Court has told us; we know what the militia is under the terms of the Constitution, for the same reason; but the courts have never told us what troops are, and one guess is as good as another until the Supreme Court of the United States makes the last guess as to what that section of the Constitution means.

There is no question but that every country has the inherent power to defend itself. The United States is being called upon to create an armed force under the control of the Constitution, and if the Congress says that the force here authorized are to be State troops, why would it not be justified in expecting the Supreme Court of the United States to take its judgment on that subject?

There is one other question I want to answer. It has been charged by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SISSON] that this bill originated with the General Staff of the United States Army. It so happens that I hail from the great State of New York, and it also happens that in the great State of New York during the World War we had a great division, known as the Twenty-seventh Division, composed from National Guard organizations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. KAHN. I yield the gentleman two minutes more.

Mr. CALDWELL. When that division went across the seas they acquitted themselves with honor and with credit to the great State they represented, and they were under Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan, of the National Guard of New York, and recommissioned as such in the United States Army for the purposes of the war upon the draft of the National Guard. When he returned he started this bill on the way through the Congress of the United States, and it was Maj. Gen. John F. O'Ryan who was here lobbying in behalf of this bill. I do not know of any member of the General Staff who has ever advocated it until Maj. Gen. O'Ryan had taken it up.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CALDWELL. Yes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to say that the gentleman from New York has not yet answered my question. Section 75 of the constitution of the Commonwealth of Kentucky reads as follows:

> He (the governor) shall be commander in chief of the Army and Navy of this Commonwealth and of the militia thereof, except when they shall be called into the service of the United States; but he shall not command personally in the field unless advised so to do by a resolution of the general assembly.

Mr. CALDWELL. As I understand it, there are to be State troops and your governor will be commander in chief of the State troops. But the constitution of Kentucky is not above the Federal Constitution of the United States, and when these troops are called into the service of the United States the President becomes Commander in Chief.

Mr. LANGLEY. Would it not be necessary to amend the constitution of the State of Kentucky if this proposition becomes a law, as it conflicts with the constitution of that State?

Mr. CALDWELL. No; I do not think so.

Mr. LANGLEY. As I construe the language, it is in conflict with our State constitution, and I prefer that our governor shall remain the commander in chief according to the language of the section I have read.

Mr. CALDWELL. Let me say, first, it is our duty to provide the best organization for the manhood of America in order that the country may be properly defended. If the national-defense act and this provision are allowed to operate side by side, that which is best will survive. The proponents of this proposition have no fear of the outcome; the opponents have. This I hold to be a confession of weakness. Second, the McKenzie provision and several other sections of the national-defense act as amended in this bill are clearly unconstitutional, so it becomes our duty to provide something other than the terms of the House bill; and, third, the nearer legislation for a Federal force we have the nearer to an Army we will have—when we need one.

The militia provisions were written when people held a different idea of what our Government was. We are now writing a law after the Civil War had settled the permanence of the Union. We must now look to the defense of the Union, not the States.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, this is another demonstration that a house divided against itself can not stand. The very purpose of this compromise resolution is to divide the National Guard against itself. More than three-quarters of the adjutants general of the United States are absolutely opposed not only to the bill as proposed by the Senate but likewise opposed to this compromise proposition, for it is to accomplish the same end, and it will accomplish the same end if adopted.

Suppose this compromise resolution is adopted and some of the States elect to organize under the Army clauses and others elect to organize under the militia clauses, what is going to be the result? The same result that obtained during the World War—the absolute destruction of the militia units. No wonder the gentleman from New York—and I think he is the only one advocating the adoption of this proposition—no wonder the gentleman from New York is satisfied, because his units were kept intact and went over. What happened to the units of Indiana? What happened to the units of Missouri and Illinois and every other State in the Union? We had three regiments down on the Mexican border serving there for nearly a year. They came back seasoned men at the outbreak of the World War. Did they send them over and keep the units intact? No. They shot them all to pieces, even dividing up the companies so that there were scarcely half a dozen of original units permitted to go on the other side together. If you adopt this compromise, those coming in under the Army clauses will be the pets of the Regular organization of the United States, and the others will receive but slight consideration. [Applause.]

Those who pride themselves in belonging to the militia of the State of Indiana or the State of Missouri will receive very poor support; in fact, they will be starved to death. That is the purpose, and, as stated by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], within 10 years they will find that the only way that they can maintain an organization at all is by getting in through the process they are now trying to inaugurate. No one should be fooled by this proposition. It is a mere cloud to blind us for the time being into thinking it is fair to submit a proposition of this kind, when its whole purpose is the destruction of the State militia that has been of such great force from the beginning of this Government. Suppose you adopt this plan and come in under the Army organization. Here is a man who is the captain or a colonel of the State militia. He is a business man. He is a soldier in time of war, but he is a business man as well as a soldier in time of peace.

The President of the United States or the gentlemen who are operating the war machinery down here in Washington can take that man and jerk him away from his business and send him anywhere. That is what they are proposing to do. They are trying to Prussianize the military system of the United States. When they came back from Europe it was their intention then, fully developed by the first bill they introduced into this Congress. It had it written on every page. There was not a dozen men in this House here who would support it or who dared to support it. There are not 50 men in this House to-day who would support this bill as it came from the Senate, yet you might as well support it in its original form; in fact it would be better to do it than to make a farce of this whole business and destroy the integrity of the National Guard which must ever be the strong arm of the defense of the United States Government by the proposed subterfuge.

I say to you, think long before you ever consent to this compromise proposition. Send it back over on the other side with our disapproval, and let us maintain the militia system that is wanted by the men who were in the militia in this country. I have a letter from the adjutant general of the State of Indiana who has been in the militia for 25 years and who knows something of those who are connected with it. He says that there are not three adjutants general and not 5 per cent of the militia of the United States who want this system. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.

Mr. EVANS of Nevada. Mr. Speaker, what great national emergency do you fear? We were safe with Europe strong, well fed, and well armed. Now they are bankrupt, without arms, and without armies, facing food problems with all energy to avert starvation. Austria sending her little emaciated children by the tens of thousands into Italy to obtain nutrition which Austria can not supply, while with haunting sense of fear they turn from war's horrors with sober knowledge that our country's policy has never menaced another's peaceful intent toward us. Now they look with uneasy wondering at our expending colossal sums training mere boys into the discredited art of murder.

The United States of America never made a war of conquest; our example for 150 years was peace on earth and good will to men, confident that now in times of destitution, with all the world prostrate, America will continue to lead in peace; that we will not compel and conscript the million one hundred thousand young boys who annually become of military age, taking and weaning them away from home, to which they will never return to console the lonesome old age of tender-hearted parents; away from a better plan of physical and mental growth, gained under the watchful care of teachers and neighbors where they will form habits of industry and self-reliance, growing into strong citizens, able and willing to defend our institutions, conservative to anger and assault, but earnest and eager to maintain their homes and country.

Against whom are we to uniform, to train, to arm, and march those boys? Surely not against our nearest neighbor Mexico? A Republic as we are, who have paid us the sincere compliment of founding their own beloved Nation upon our policies of free expression and right thinking. Will they not feel the veiled threat in this departure from our proven source of security? For us to plan war against another Republic is delirium. Can it be Canada, whose interests and aims are parallel to our own? Speaking our own language, we are proud to trace our consanguinity with them for a thousand years. There are none menacing our safe position to which we arrived without training in compulsion and force. That master mind of Shakespeare which could delineate man's character 350 years into the future could not conceive a government by the people; themselves their own rulers. A form of government which has produced all the inventions—steam engines, sewing machines, cotton gin, electricity, Atlantic cable, phonograph, telephone, flying machine, submarine, development of the automobile—wherein our form of free government has produced citizens who invented and built them all. This supreme question is too big for politics. There is in my mind no wish for political advantage, but the safe, sound, and proven way of national security. We are today debating a course new to ourselves, but well-known and well-tried by Europe, a system which has been weighed in the balance by every king and found wanting. The glory of militarism has departed. War was always preceded by a declaration of high and holy purpose, finishing upon blasted hopes and misery.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON].

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, this proposed amendment, in my opinion, is an effort to destroy the militia as it was provided for in the Constitution of the United States. It is an effort to increase the Regular Army by destroying the militia provided by the fathers, and the one dangerous element that I see in it is not only the camouflage of increasing the Regular Army but it takes away from the State the right to control its own militia. In other words, the State militia, or call it the National Guard if you will, can not be called out by the President of the United States for the use of the United States except to repel invasion, suppress insurrection, and so forth; but if they can get a division from Illinois and one from New York that has its place regularly in the Regular Army, they take the oath and they may be called upon and will be called upon to obey the orders of the President of the United States whenever, in his discretion, an emergency exists. To-day we have 17,000 men in Germany. The treaty has failed, but to-day the President can not call the militia or the National Guard from Illinois to go to Silesia to run an election; he could not call the militia from Illinois to send them to Siberia nor to become policemen in Germany; but pass this law and fix it so that the State militia abandons its constitutional standing and becomes a part of the Regular Army, and this President or his successor may order them wherever he sees fit, as a part of the Regular Army. That is one reason I am opposed to this proposition.

The second reason is perfectly apparent—a house divided against itself. One national guardsman from New York, for instance, has the honor of being a part of the Regular Army and one from Illinois has not. You need not tell me or any other man who has had experience with the Regular Army or the General Staff that the man who is known as a national guardsman stands more than half a chance. You and I know that, and what is the use of discussing it. We know boys who came back from France recommended two or three times for promotion by reason of bravery in action; they did not get their commissions, because the General Staff had a different view, and men who had shed their blood and who had stood in the trenches all through the western front, who came back expecting a little promotion, failed to get it, while men in the Regular Army recommended by the General Staff were given the commissions of those boys who had fought and earned the commissions and they were turned over to men who never smelled gunpowder on this side of the Atlantic or on the other. Let us stand fair. If you want to make your Regular Army larger, do it. I believe in a fair Regular Army, but this is a move in the direction of doing away with the old constitutional militia, that militia that was framed by the fathers of the Constitution, the men who gave the first thought that they should swear defense to their own State and their own home but who finally in the constitutional convention consented that they might be taken by the President of the United States or by the Congress of the United States and called into action to repel an invasion or to suppress an insurrection. This takes away that protection from the National Guard. This is a step along the line of Prussianizing the people of this country. It is a step toward the militarism that we fought against over there in France, and to-day the Regular Army is starting in step by step to do the very thing in this country that we fought against in Germany. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN].

Mr. QUIN. Mr. Speaker, not only this provision of this bill is obnoxious to the masses of the American people but the entire bill that the Senate enacted by striking out the House bill is totally out of harmony with the spirit of this Republic and the best interests of our people. [Applause.] Not only ought this House to stamp under its feet this contemptible compromise that our conferees have brought in here but the entire bill should be defeated. The only thing that this Congress ought to do, in my opinion, is to kill this entire silly bill and, whenever we shall have peace declared, go back to the national-defense act, for which you made the appropriation for 175,000 men, and let it go into full force and effect.

The measure that our conferees have brought back here as a substitute compromise strikes me as being an insult to the National Guard of the various States of this Union. I hold in my hand a letter from the adjutant general of the State of Mississippi, and I ask unanimous consent to have it put in the RECORD. This proposition that confronts us now means in the next year or two that all of the States will be forced to come under this Federalization system. It means that the constitutional system will be abolished and abandoned, and then our National Guard will be under the General Staff, and that august body will continue to Prussianize the United States until we will finally have an Army system a duplicate and replica of that horrible system of the Kaiser. [Applause.] There is no doubt about it but what the gentleman who brought this conference report here understands it. The Senate understands it thoroughly. The big interests of the United States understand it thoroughly. They think they are going to fool us, the Representatives of the people. That is what they intend to do; and when the gentleman from California endeavored to bring that striped ox over the House the other afternoon without letting this report be printed, it is part of the methods of the gang that is behind this scheme. Whether you be Republicans or Democrats, if you want to vote for the best interests of the great mass of the American people, you want to vote to kill the motion of the gentleman from California.

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. QUIN. I can not yield. You want to kill not only the original but this compromise that brings its smell—its stink—along with it. [Laughter.] You do not have to go down and study to understand it. It is as plain as the noonday sun. My friends on the Republican side, this Government has run 133 years with a constitutional militia system. Why is it in this age of Christian development of our Government it is necessary to abolish that system and put up a centralized, organized staff guard for all of the States of the Union? Whenever you vote to put this thing in effect you are, in effect, voting to abolish the entire system of the National Guard of the United States as it stands to-day, and the gentlemen who are behind this compromise realize that and know it. We know what they are endeavoring to do, but they think we are ignorant, and think we will let them put off on us this compromise, saying that we will let the State keep its National Guard if it wants to and let the others go under the Federal Army system. Here is the great State of New York, surrounded by Wall Street and the great billionaire class of this country, coming up as being an exponent of this nice compromise that the gentleman from California has brought out here. Vote it down and kill it, and, in the name of justice, before we let this House adjourn or let it recess let us stand here until this Chamber rots down before we let the people be run over and deceived in this manner. [Applause.]

The letter referred to is as follows:

STATE OF MISSISSIPPI,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Jackson, Miss., May 14, 1920.

Hon. PERCY QUIN, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. QUIN: I certainly hope that you can see your way clear to urge and insist on the House conferees committee on Army reorganization bill standing by House bill 12775, recently passed by the House, authorizing the reorganization of the National Guard. If the National Guard is required to reorganize under the Wadsworth bill, which is drawn under the Army clause, it will positively disrupt, tear up, and smash to pieces the entire National Guard machinery of the United States.

The Legislature of Mississippi has at last passed what is believed to be adequate National Guard legislation, and has provided the National Guard with the largest appropriation in the history of the guard. I am advised by several prominent lawyers that they are of the opinion that if the National Guard is required to reorganize under the Wadsworth bill, or Army clause, that the appropriation from State funds can not be used and that it will be necessary to present to the legislature a new set of National Guard laws. From the information at hand, I would infer that Mr. Wadsworth; Gen. O'Ryan, of New York; and the New York National Guard would prefer to dictate the military policy of the United States, and to satisfy their desire are willing to sacrifice the balance of the guard of the United States. The National Guard of Mississippi is not in sympathy with the Wadsworth plan, and I am confident that the young men of Mississippi are not willing to reenter the guard under the Wadsworth plan. It is believed that if you and the balance of the Mississippi delegation in Congress will inform the House conferees to stand by the House bill that they will win out in this fight. The guard of Mississippi would rather see no legislation for reorganization than the plan of Mr. Wadsworth.

This matter is of vital importance to your State, and it is believed that you will exert every influence to have the conferees accept a favorable plan for National Guard reorganization.

Wishing you continued success, I beg to remain,

Yours, sincerely,

ERIE C. SCALES,
Brigadier General N. G. M., the Adjutant General.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, how much time has been consumed?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Twenty-five minutes remain to the gentleman from California.

Mr. KAHN. And how much to the gentleman from Alabama?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Forty-five minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I hope the gentleman will use some more of his time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, the motion of the gentleman from California involves the ultimate destruction of the National Guard as it has heretofore existed. To that I am opposed. Allow me to call the attention of the House to the fact that the claim will be made, if not audibly, at least in the minds of the gentlemen who favor the motion of the gentleman from California, that the National Guard is not as efficient as the Regular Army, and that for uniformity's sake the whole National Guard should be incorporated into the Regular Army system, because that is the result this proposition seeks to accomplish.

Without making any comparison between the National Guard units and those of the Regular Army, it may be stated that the Twenty-sixth, Thirty-second, Thirty-fifth, Thirty-sixth, Forty-second, and other National Guard divisions rendered brave and distinguished service in the World War. But omitting discussion of that matter we must bear in mind that we are now legislating for peace times and not for war times. We are considering an establishment for domestic use, and it seems to me that in view of the fact that the maintenance of order and of law in the several States is a function of the States and the duty of the several States, each State ought to have its own National Guard controlled and directed by the State and subject to call to the aid of the civil authorities in the execution of the laws and in suppressing riots and disorders in the respective States. If the entire National Guard is incorporated into the Regular Army system we destroy the right of the States for all practical purposes to maintain any kind of national guard or militia system. Each State should have its own National Guard to aid its civil authorities. It ought not to be dependent upon the Federal Government for troops for purely State uses. To subordinate the States to the caprice or whim of the Secretary of War or the President for the enforcement of State laws violates the fundamental theories of the Federal system of union. Within its own boundaries, in the enforcement of its own laws, in the preservation of order, in the maintenance of its own institutions, the State is supreme, and it should have at its command the agencies and instruments necessary for the proper exercise of its function free from the supervision of any superior authority. All of you know or ought to know that the proposition of the gentleman from California to leave it optional to each State to come in or to stay out of the Federal system will amount to an absolute requirement that the State guards either come into the Federal system or that they dry up or die of anæmia, because the Federal Government and the Federal militia system will not encourage the maintenance of separate State guard systems and conditions will be imposed that will make it almost imperative that they come in or else perish.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman knows that Congress alone can provide the appropriations so that Congress can keep the guards alive under the militia clause, too.

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, I realize the gentleman from California is correct technically in that statement, but we all know also that the Military Affairs Committee of this House and the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] always hear with more distinct sound and more attentive ears the call of the War Department and the General Staff than they can hear the distant cry of the various States. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. The proposition of the Committee on Military Affairs does not bear out the gentleman's statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am talking about what will transpire if this proposition of the gentleman from California is adopted and goes into effect. I want to say to the gentleman that we are legislating for peace times now, and it is not to the best interests of this Nation that we have one military system in which all the National Guards of all the States shall constitute a part of the Regular Army. We are not legislating for war——

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. In a moment. Whenever war comes we shall not be willing to rely alone upon the Regular Army or the National Guard, but whenever war comes this Nation will have to again invoke the draft, will again call to the colors the entire man power of this Nation, but in peace time let us observe the terms of the Constitution providing for the militia system, and let us have separate National Guards in the various State organized and drilled on the Regular Army system, but subject to the control of the States. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DENT. I hope the gentleman will use some more time.

Mr. KAHN. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE].

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that a question involving so many constitutional issues and that partakes so vitally of the general policy of military training and national defense can not be discussed very intelligently in five minutes. One can only touch the high spots, and simply by suggestion at that.

I am amazed to hear so many of our good friends who are so profoundly in love with the doctrine of State rights refuse to accept a proposition that gives every State in the Union an opportunity to decide for itself in which one of these ways it will organize its militia. I do not quite see the consistency of it, and I have not from the beginning. Every State has the right to decide for itself whether it will organize its militia under the militia clause of the Constitution or under the Army clause of the Constitution, and it is left entirely with the State to decide. And when it has decided, if it elects to continue under the present militia clause of the Constitution, the law now in force, which provides for the organization and administration of the militia under such a clause, will still obtain, and it will have its appropriations from the Government under the direction of Congress just the same, and all the other features that have pertained to the National Guard as it exists to-day. They are in the law, and Congress has its direction over the appropriations which carry that law into effect. And the option will be left where our good State rights friends state it ought to be left—with the States. And that is the crux of this proposition.

Now, then, the whole purpose of this thing is to take advantage of a maxim which is as old as our Government, and which was first put into good, terse, appealing language by the Father of his Country, "In time of peace prepare for war." We have been told here——

Mr. SHERWOOD. I challenge that statement. George Washington never made that statement.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. With all respect, I decline to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. SHERWOOD. You can not prove it.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I have not time to go into a discussion with the gentleman about a side issue.

In time of war we need trained troops, and in time of peace we maintain the National Guard for the very purpose of training it for war. The character of warfare has changed, as we learned most bitterly during this last World War, and the brigade and the regiment and the smaller tactical units are no longer the bases for operation in the field.

The basis is the division, and there is not a State in the Union, outside of the States of New York and Pennsylvania, that can make a division of its own troops. What will be the result? In my own New England district there were six States that were organized into one division, and the troops fought that way, the division being the tactical unit. In time of peace you can not assemble those six States into a tactical division for training purposes, and have a man from Connecticut drill the troops from Maine, New Hampshire, Vermont, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts. That is the point about it. And those six States are going to lose every opportunity to train by divisions, and will go back to the old, archaic regimental tactical system that they maintained so long.

Now, then, we did this very thing in time of war, when we had to test out whether our troops were trained or not, and that was to make one general, universal army out of our Regular Army, our National Guard, and our citizen soldiery, because it is a maxim of war that you can have but one army when you go into the field against another. In time of peace, in the name of common sense, let us train as one army in order to meet that very problem that will face us when we get into war. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I am unalterably opposed to a large standing army in peace time, and therefore I am opposed to this bill, but it is a matter which has already been put over on us. I am unalterably opposed to universal compulsory military training, and I am in favor of preserving the life and the integrity of our National Guard, and therefore I am against the amendment of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], and I am going to vote with the distinguished gentleman from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] on this proposition.

To show you how easily an attempt is made sometimes to force votes on serious propositions, without serious consideration, I call your attention to what happened yesterday afternoon when the distinguished gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] said, in substance, "Oh, what is the use of putting off until to-morrow a thing we can vote here in a few minutes, something that everybody ought to understand so easily?" And yet, when I asked him on the floor this morning why it was that his committee saw fit to put two different kinds of oaths into the measure, one oath for one man and another oath for another, he could not satisfactorily explain the matter at all. For the officers who are to be sworn in under the National Guard system, as proposed in his amendment, he has one kind of oath, an oath which properly requires that they shall support and defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies, foreign and domestic.

That is the kind of oath that the President of the United States takes. That is the kind of oath the Vice President takes. That is the kind of oath that members of the Supreme Court take. That is the kind of oath that the Speaker of this House took. That is the kind of oath that every one of my colleagues here have taken. That is the oath each Senator of the United States takes. That is the kind of oath that every officer in the Army has taken. That is the kind of oath that every enlisted man in the Army has taken. It is the kind of oath that every employee of this Government has taken. It is the kind of oath that even the little pages who wait upon the Members here in the House have to take before they can exercise the privilege of an employee of this House. But when you get to the enlisted men in this proposed Kahn amendment you have to change it. It does not require an enlisted man in such amendment to swear that he will defend the Constitution of the United States against all enemies "foreign and domestic." Why do you not do it?

Mr. MASON. Will the gentleman yield for one question?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. MASON. Do you not agree with the military gentleman who just preceded you that if there was a strike in a pickle factory it would be necessary to have a division of 27,000 men to handle it as a proper unit?

Mr. BLANTON. That is possibly apropos, but first I want the enlisted man in the National Guard to take the same kind of oath that his captain takes, and I want him to take the same kind of oath that the soldier in the Army takes, and I want him to take the same kind of an oath that every other officer of this Government takes, when he does enter the service of his Government. I want him to swear that he will defend the Constitution of the United States against "all enemies, foreign and domestic." As domestic enemies may be just as menacing as foreign enemies there may be times when they may be even more dangerous. And the time has come when, as the gentleman said, we are preparing for war in time of peace, it is time to prepare to meet all dangers alike. Therefore I say that the distinguished gentleman from California ought to reconsider this matter and understand his own measure. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, of course there are some men who are so blind that they can never see, and the gentleman from Texas is one of them.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CRAMTON].

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, in the military bill as it passed the House protection for the National Guard of the several States was retained. In the bill as it passed the Senate the National Guard of the several States was made a thing of the past, and the National Guard of the United States was created.

Now, in conference, in disagreement, some of the House conferees have come to us and have recommended what they term "a compromise," under which we are to have two kinds of National Guard organizations in the country, one the National Guard of certain States and again the National Guard of the United States. The purpose of that compromise is very plain to be seen. It is to secure the final adoption of the Senate program, the elimination of the National Guard of the several States, and the creation in its stead of a great new Federal army. It will be in name a National Guard, but it will be the National Guard of the United States and will be essentially Federal. It is to be a Garrisonized National Guard. Under the Senate bill such an army would, on paper, be created forthwith. Under the so-called compromise the elimination of the State militia, known popularly as the National Guard, would be somewhat more delayed but would be none the less sure. Whether the Garrisonized National Guard in its Federal form would materialize, except on paper, is open to question, but that the National Guard of the States would disappear is certain.

The compromise given to us unfortunately covers only one side of the compromise. It states what we are to bind ourselves to accept, and leaves us only hope as to what the Senate will yield. I am glad, however, to accept the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] that all the provisions of the legislation as to pay of officers and men, and so forth, are to be fully as agreeable and liberal for the militiamen as the provisions for the National Guard of the United States. I am somewhat at a loss to understand this language, however, in one section of the compromise:

Provided further, That no troops shall be thus maintained except such as belong to the units of the National Guard of the United States comprised within the limits of such State.

That eliminates in any State any troops except they be the National Guard of the United States.

There is another proviso in the same section—

Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent the organization and maintenance by the States and Territories of State or Territorial militia, State police, or State constabulary.

There seems to be a conflict there which I hope the conferees will take into consideration.

Now, in the Constitution Congress was given two sources of power: One "to raise and support armies"; the other "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

This present attempt to do away with State troops organized under the militia clause is simply another step in the controversy that has gone on for many, many years, simply another step in the conflict between those who would advocate a civilian army and those who would put their trust in a professional army. It is another step in the century-old controversy between the civilian soldier and the professional soldier. That controversy has always existed and we have before us to-day the effort of the professional soldier to destroy the field of opportunities for the civilian.

In the Great War anyone that came in contact with officers of the National Guard, whether in this country or overseas, whether you visited them in camp where they were under fire or otherwise, National Guardsmen who had been in the service for a long time, who had served overseas, who had won from the enemy many kilometers of territory, you found almost without exception those National Guardsmen entertained a feeling that they had been discriminated against by the War Department and the Regular Army Establishment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CRAMTON. I am sorry I can not yield unless the gentleman can give me some time.

Mr. KAHN. I can not give you any time.

Mr. CRAMTON. That feeling was universal among the National Guard officers, and there must have been a foundation for it. There was a foundation. I visited officers of the Thirty-second Division at the front, men who had been under fire, men who had led troops under fire and captured ground from the Prussian Guard, and those men, having done that, saw some young man coming in recently from West Point taking precedence over them; they saw a young man who had never commanded a thousand men in peace, let alone in war, take precedence over them. They were undergoing severest hardships and making heroic sacrifices, rendering services for their country never excelled for efficiency or devotion, but always they carried with them the realization that promotions and recognition at the hands of the War Department and the professional soldiers in control were not for them.

On the other hand, until July, 1918, the Regular Army officer was a rare exception who did not freely express his entire lack of confidence in the State militiamen and in the efficiency, skill, and morale of the State troops and their officers.

Soon thereafter, as in drive after drive, divisions made up of those same State troops took their punishment and won their objectives and carried the line forward, keeping well up with anything that America or any of her allies could produce, such disparagement ceased to find expression on the part of the Regulars.

But it is upon that same theory that this legislation must be defended if at all. Boys of Michigan and Wisconsin who fell while the Red Arrow time after time pierced the German line still lie in their graves in France, but the history they made a few short months ago is to be ignored while we abandon the system under which they gave themselves to their country and under which they were trained.

Under the one clause of the Constitution Congress may "raise and support armies." Under that we provide for the forces that are primarily or exclusively Federal.

Under the other clause the Congress may organize, arm, and discipline the militia, "reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress."

For many years the several States raised their militia, and they were trained in haphazard fashion, but in the act of June 3, 1916, Congress exercised further the power to "organize, arm, and discipline the militia," so that uniformity of organization, equipment, training, and discipline is easily possible under existing law. The method of selection of officers still holds to the enlisted men of the State militia hope of recognition, and to the commissioned officer of promotion, for faithful and efficient study and service.

If the War Department and the General Staff will accept the act of June 3, 1916, in good faith and strive to build up a strong and efficient National Guard in the several States thereunder, they will find a willing spirit of cooperation among the young men of the country and can produce a trained body of soldiery ready for any national emergency.

But if they refuse the opportunity that is before them and insist on a purely Federal force, officered by their own selections and building up their own power and importance, they run counter to the sentiment of the young men of the country. They may be able to provide such an Army on paper, but it will be a Salvador army—all officers and no soldiers. Only in one way can they fill the ranks, and that is by force.

The Constitution contemplated a State militia, which should in time of peace be primarily a State and not a Federal institution and should primarily serve the State. In time of peace the governor of the State and not the President should be its commander in chief. The National Guard of the United States might fit well into militaristic expeditions of a President in northern Russia or in Siberia or San Domingo or Armenia, but would, with its Federal officers, lose entirely its old character as a State agency, and the States would be driven to the extension of the State-constabulary idea again, an advance toward the professional soldier.

The pending compromise would, if it became law, add greatly to existing confusion, give us a mongrel organization, with one or two States accepting the National Guard of the United States freely, others driven in by fear of ostracism, and others standing by old training and traditions. I trust the compromise will be rejected and the opposition of the House to all such militaristic schemes made manifest.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that everybody who has spoken on this bill shall be allowed to extend and revise his remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the privilege of revising and extending their remarks shall be given to all those who have spoken on the bill.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman ought to change his request——

Mr. KAHN. For five legislative days——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And make it include all those who shall speak hereafter on it or who have spoken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from California modify his request to include all those who shall speak and those who have spoken?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. For five legislative days.

Mr. KAHN. On this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, why does not the gentleman include all Members of the House?

Mr. KAHN. I did not know that there was any considerable number who wanted to extend their remarks.

Mr. GARD. There may be Members who desire to extend.

Mr. KAHN. I have no desire to prevent any Member from extending his remarks on this bill for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California modifies his request so that he asks unanimous consent that any Member of the House may extend his remarks on this bill for five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Minnesota is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I have listened to this debate with much interest. In my opinion, more straw men have been knocked over in an attempt to defeat this measure than in any other debate that I have participated in. Our failure to have a military policy in keeping with our position in the world caused our unpreparedness and the consequent loss of billions of dollars and thousands of lives. With one voice we then said that this unpreparedness must not occur again. Any measure then pertaining to our future military policy is most important and should be debated with fair reason and argument rather than through the use of misstatements and the arousing of prejudice.

This Congress has been charged with the responsibility of framing our future military policy. Our Military Affairs Committee went to work upon the problem early in the session. The result was the so-called Kahn bill, which passed the House some weeks ago. The Senate passed the so-called Wadsworth bill. They differ materially. One of the principal points of difference is now before us. It involves the present organization of the National Guard. It makes possible a new organization to be called the National Guard of the United States. This organization will become a part of our reserve army and will cease to be Organized Militia.

The plan is optional. In other words, it is up to the States as to whether or not they will change the status of the existing organization.

At the present time the National Guard is an organized militia. The power of Congress over the militia is set forth in Article I of section 8 of the Constitution, and reads as follows:

Congress shall have power to * * * provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States respectively the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline described by Congress.

Congress is further given the power in the same section—

To provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions.

So, then, it is up to Congress to make suitable provisions to—

(1) Organize,
(2) Arm,
(3) Discipline,
(4) Govern while in Federal service, and
(5) Enable President to call them forth to execute the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion.

It is reserved to the States to—

(1) Appoint officers, and
(2) Exercise command and authority in training them.

There are 48 States in the Union, and notwithstanding the efforts that have been made by Federal authority to obviate the difficulty there has been lack of uniformity in the different organizations as to qualifications of officers, training of the men, and so forth.

The national defense act was enacted under these constitutional provisions.

It will be noted that the President, as the Commander in Chief, is prohibited from using the militia except to execute the laws, suppress insurrection, and repel invasion. To use them during the late war it was necessary for the President to avail himself of other provisions in the national defense act which authorized him to draft, not the regimental units and other organizations, but the individual members thereof. He could not draft the organizations themselves, for they were militia organizations, and he was powerless to use them except for the purposes mentioned. The necessary constitutional power was lacking. As an organization, therefore, it was not part of our Army. After the individual members were drafted into regiments of the National Army they then, of course, were a part of the National Army.

This system was most unfortunate. Undoubtedly with this lack of uniformity there were certain National Guard regiments who were insufficiently trained and improperly officered. On the other hand, there were many guard regiments that were well trained and most efficiently commanded. Many of these skilled regiments suffered because of the lack of training upon the part of others for whom they were in no wise responsible.

It has been said here in debate that our National Guard regiments during the late war were "manhandled" in the system run by officers of Regular troops. It is altogether too true. In many instances they were manhandled and most unjustly dealt with. I know whereof I speak. At the outbreak of the war the State of Minnesota had an efficient National Guard organization consisting of three regiments of Infantry and one of Artillery. The Artillery regiment formed the famous One hundred and fifty-first Field Artillery of the Rainbow Division. Throughout the war the officers of this regiment were guardsmen. This regiment was kept intact and under their brave and most efficient National Guard colonel they fought in practically every major engagement of our armies overseas.

One of our Infantry regiments was ordered to be made over into an Artillery unit. Its citizen officers, who had for years studied and trained to perfect themselves as infantrymen, were suddenly called upon to function efficiently as artillerymen.

I will now call attention to another regiment, the First Minnesota Infantry. This regiment had a glorious record as the Thirteenth Minnesota Volunteer Infantry in the Spanish-American War and the Philippine Insurrection. It was a most efficient unit, and was so described officially in the comments made upon its service on the Mexican border in 1916. It furnished to the Nation in the late war material for over 500 officers. Its depleted ranks were filled up by recruits from the State of Minnesota. The officers who had trained and so efficiently drilled this regiment remained with it. Yet we find this regiment held over here in this country until the summer of 1918. When it reached France, instead of being used as a combat unit, it was used for replacement purposes. When I was overseas I found its officers and men scattered all over France, Luxemburg, and the occupied territory of Germany.

This policy was wrong. It was unjust to officers and men who had spent so many years in times of peace in perfecting an efficient organization. It should not be permitted to occur again.

I believe that this provision submitted by the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] will prevent this from happening again, providing the States see fit to avail themselves of the opportunity offered of having their guard regiments become a part of the National Guard of the United States.

Under the Constitution, in Article I, section 8, "the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies." Our Regular Army and our reserve force are organized and provided for by virtue of this constitutional provision. There are no restrictions to this power excepting that no appropriation for their support can be made to extend over a period of two years. It is proposed, therefore, to organize a National Guard of the United States under the "Army clause" of the Constitution. The present National Guard of the States is organized under the "militia clause," which I referred to some minutes ago. It is made optional with the States as to whether they shall continue as organized militia or shall be converted into the National Guard of the United States. In any event, and this should be carefully noted, Federal aid in the shape of money, regular officer training, and so forth, is to be continued. The only distinction would be that the Federal Government would have the power and exercise the authority over the training in times of peace, and that in time of war the organizations are called into service and become a part of the active Army of the United States.

If a State avails itself of the option given, will it lose its present military force? No. The National Guard in the State will cease to be militia, but will not thereby cease to be liable for duty in the State under the governor if he chooses to call them out. Article I, section 8, of the Constitution provides:

No State shall, without the consent of Congress * * * keep troops in time of peace.

The States can therefore, in time of peace, maintain not only "militia" but "troops," providing Congress gives its consent. In giving this consent Congress can give it only upon certain terms and conditions. That is what will be done if this proposed measure becomes a law. I quote from the measure, as follows:

Maintenance of troops by the States: The consent of Congress is hereby given to each of the States to maintain troops in time of peace: * * * Provided further, That no troops shall be thus maintained except such as belong to the units of the National Guard of the United States comprised within the limits of such State: Provided further, That the States * * * in time of peace * * * shall be entitled to use as State troops under the direct orders of the governor of the State * * * and for such purpose as State militia might legally be used, so much of the National Guard of the United States within their respective borders as has been enlisted in the troops of the State and commissioned by the governor thereof in accordance with the terms of this act and if it is not at the time in active service under a call by the President: Provided further, That nothing contained in this act shall prevent the organization and maintenance by the States * * * of State militia.

In other words, the State will have the same authority under this proposed plan that it now has, except as to the training. I can not see, therefore, that this will in any way hamper the States in the enforcement of the law within their own borders.

So much for the question of State service. Now, as to the liability for service to the Nation as National Guardsmen of the United States. I further quote from the proposed measure, as follows:

When Congress shall have authorized the use of the land forces of the United States for any purpose requiring the use of troops in excess of the Regular Army, the President may, under such regulations as he may prescribe, call into active service for the period of the emergency, unless sooner relieved, the whole or any part of the National Guard of the United States: Provided, That when necessary in order to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrections, or to repel invasion, the President may, in his discretion and under the same conditions as permit the calling out of the National Guard of the several States, call into active service the whole or any part of the National Guard of the United States to serve solely within the United States for such period as he may direct.

Under existing law the National Guard can be called out by the President to serve within the United States to execute the laws, suppress insurrection, and to repel invasion. This is unchanged. In addition, under existing law the President can in war emergency draft the individual members of the present National Guard for any military service. Under the proposed measure the President may call out the National Guard of the United States in an emergency, providing, however, that Congress shall authorize him to do so. In other words, there must be a declaration of war or some authorization by Congress before the President may call out the National Guard of the United States to serve outside of the United States; for example, to go into Mexico. When so called out, they are called out as organizations with their units intact. They are a reserve force in time of peace and an active part of the Army in time of war.

In my judgment such a plan will do much toward preventing the discrimination and manhandling of the guard regiments that was so prevalent during the late war. Furthermore, for training purposes officers—in time of peace, with their consent—can be detailed to the General Staff. This should give them a voice in the general policy of the authorities in the Army toward the National Guard. Officers and men are in all respects national citizen soldiers. Our great need is not a large professional army but a national citizen reserve army.

The American Legion in Minneapolis, in declaring for a "national citizens' army" appointed a committee to submit the views of their organization to Congress. About one-half of the membership of that committee were former guard officers. They submitted a statement of the legion which to me is unanswerable.

They (meaning the members of the legion) believe that this citizen army should be trained, so far as possible, by citizen officers, and its units localized in the territory from which they come, but that it must be trained solely as a national army under the authority of the National Government for use only in time of war.

In submitting the statement one of the members, expressing the views of the committee, said:

One observation, which is referred to indirectly, is this: That any military organization, any army, should be an army, one army, the United States Army. It may be composed, and would have to be composed, of professional soldiers and citizen soldiers, but that should be the only distinction.

The CHAIRMAN. I assume from that that you would assume such an army being raised and maintained under the so-called Army clause of the Constitution?

Mr. GALBRAITH. Yes, sir.

These men were unanimous in believing that the National Guard would function far better under the proposed plan.

The terms of enlistment remain unchanged. The officers are all to be reserve officers of the Army of the United States as well as officers of the State troops in which they live. Officers and men will perform the same kind of service as State troops that they do to-day as militiamen.

Mr. Speaker, I believe the plan worth trying. Objections, of course, have been offered. Many of them have been made under a total misapprehension and misunderstanding of the plain provisions of the measure. I reiterate the plan is not compulsory. It is optional. It is up to the legislatures of the various States to say what they want to do. That is representative government. In this way the rights of the States are amply safeguarded. The State failing to avail itself of the privilege continues to receive the same Federal aid as before. It is claimed that these States will be discriminated against. I deny it. But what do these gentlemen offer in its place? Nothing but the old plan wherein practically all of our guard regiments were in some way or other the victims of discrimination. In the event of another war they offer more "manhandling." We need a citizen reserve force that is a national reserve force. In several years we can then judge as to the merits of the two organizations.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is not that the situation now?

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. No; if the gentleman please, this is the situation: Under the national defense act upon the outbreak of the war these men were drafted into the Army as individuals and not as units.

Mr. BEE. I understand that.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Under this act they are a part of the reserve force in the United States, and in the event of war they go in as distinct units. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I am intensely interested that this Congress formulate an adequate national military policy with a small professional army and an ample citizens' reserve. I believe in the National Guard and its further growth and development. I believe it can be made the nucleus for a most efficient national citizens' reserve. For this reason I expect to support the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 15 minutes remaining and the gentleman from Alabama has 30 minutes remaining.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman from Alabama should use some of his time.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, we went into the Great War to upset the Prussian military system, and now we are beginning to enter on that system ourselves, and I am against it. [Applause.]

I do not know whether under the rules I can talk about it, but the Senate committee seems determined to fasten on this country the Prussian military system. I am rather inclined to think that my distinguished friend from California, chairman of the House Committee on Military Affairs, is in the same condition that Saul was at the stoning of Stephen—that is, he stands by and gives his consent. [Laughter.]

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman know that France has the same system, and France is a Republic? Switzerland has the same system, Australia has the same system, and many other countries.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I do not care who has it, I am against it. [Laughter.] When I was interrogating the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] this morning, trying to twist a fact out of him, he kept beating around the bush and fencing, and finally the gentleman from Delaware popped up and let the cat out of the bag about this bill. He said if the State militia did not want to be discriminated against, the right way to prevent that was to go into the other National Guard. I can give a man an infallible receipt for keeping a horse from being stolen. Do not have any horse. [Laughter.] That is the way with the gentleman from Delaware. He did not know as much as the gentleman from California or he would not have made that statement, because it was an open confession that the intention is to discriminate against the National Guard organized under the militia clause of the Constitution.

I have no prejudice on the face of the earth against the Regular Army. I think it has been made or is being made about three times too big. I have not any dislike for West Point. I do not agree with Dr. Elliott in what he said about West Point or West Pointers. I have a very definite idea about what West Point can do. It can make good drill sergeants, but it can not make generals. A general, like a poet, is born. When I was a little chap my father was a very enthusiastic phrenologist, and he took the magazine of Fowler & Wells. That was about all the paper I had to read. They laid down the proposition flat that there never had been a great soldier that did not have an aquiline nose, a high-bridge nose. I started out to find out whether that was true. With a full-face picture, of course, you can not tell, but with a profile picture you can tell, and history has no record of a single really great soldier that did not have a high-bridge nose, not one. Napoleon chose his generals and marshals largely by their nose, and it must be admitted that he knew a good deal about soldiers.

They turn out very good engineers at West Point, but to assume that there is no man in America fit to command a regiment or brigade except these West Pointers is an absurd proposition. [Applause.]

I will tell you what will happen. The gentleman from Delaware stated the milk in the coconut. If you organize these two sorts of National Guards, then the General Staff here in Washington is just as certain to discriminate against the officers and men forming the guard formed under the clause of the Constitution about militia as two and two make four, and if Napoleon himself should come back to earth and get to be a captain or a colonel or any officer in the National Guard organized under the State system, he would be frowned upon the minute he got into the hands of the General Staff.

I have no objection to the General Staff, either, except I think they ought to attend to their business and let Congress attend to its business. [Applause.] They get up every one of these Army bills, substantially. It is the second strongest lobby that has been around here since I have been in Congress. I think the Anti-Saloon League leads the list in strength of the lobby and the Regular Army officers come second. [Applause.] They are always on the job. They have not got much if anything else to do but wine and dine these committees and anybody else that they can get their eye on and get over to their side of it, and they have a powerful influence here and an undue influence.

That they discriminated against and manhandled the National Guard during the World War there can not be any controversy. They took a man that fought in Cuba, that fought in the Philippines, that was down on the border, and the night before the battle of Argonne they took his brigade away and demoted him to a colonel. I know that to be the case, although I may have got the night wrong. They put a Regular in his place, an utter stranger to the command. I know that to be the case; I may have gotten the night wrong. They would take the colonels and lieutenant colonels out of the best National Guard regiments there were and put them on some detached duty in order to make room for colonels and lieutenant colonels of the Regular Army, and I am against that sort of thing.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. They also demoted Regular Army officers, West Point graduates, and sent them to the rear.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know they did, some of them; and they ought to have been sent to the rear, no doubt, and there are some of these guard officers who were unfit—others superb soldiers. I am not opposed to having fit officers in command of troops, but I say that a man fit to be a colonel of a National Guard regiment, who has seen service wherever there has been service to see since the close of the Civil War, unless he is unquestionably unfit, ought to be retained and promoted.

I do not know of but one National Guard officer who was made a brigadier after the war began. Here is the way it is going to work, and I know it just as well as if I were to see it working: As soon as this double system is adopted then everyone in the War Department here and in the Regular Army will commence a propaganda in the States to have the States come in under the Army clause of the Constitution. It is a perpetual force. They work at it all of the time. I am in favor of preparing for defense. If I had my way about it every school in the United States who could furnish 100 boys to drill would have a drillmaster to drill the boys, and even if we never had another war while the world lasts it would be a good thing for the boys. These governors of States will begin to play into the hands of this crowd here, because they think they want to be in good military society. If you adopt this double system you might as well change the proposition and have one system and be through with it, and then you will be nearer to Prussia than you are now. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR].

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, this compromise would destroy the National Guard of every State. I wish to follow in discussion right along the line pursued by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK]. He made the statement that men were relieved from the command of their regiments on the day before the battle and Regular Army officers put in their stead. I will give you the names of Col. Jack Turner and of Col. Lee, of my State, who served for many years as colonels of their respective regiments, men of marked ability and long service, who were removed the morning of the battle and inexperienced Regular Army officers put in their places. The State of Wisconsin National Guard has been one of the strong State organizations of the country for 40 years and contributed some of the best troops to the Thirty-second Division. They had over 13,000 casualties in that division, the greatest in number, next to the Regular Army and the marines, of any American troops during the war. They were as good soldiers as you could find in the country. They drove the enemy back on the Marne through the experience of the men and line officers, and no thanks to the Regular Army colonels placed in command that day. The Regular Army staff held onto the privates and the lieutenants and the captains of the division because they were food for shot, but when it came to the higher officers—the colonels—those positions were suddenly turned over to favored officers of the Regular Army to wear the laurels and the colonels were removed who had served since the days of the Spanish-American War. So much for the treatment of National Guard officers. I went to the War Department at the suggestion of several gentlemen, including the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who has just spoken—this was in 1917, when our troops were training in Texas and I asked the Secretary of War, at the head of all military affairs, "Will you keep our men together when they go abroad? Will you keep their organizations intact? Will our National Guard officers be retained?" He said that would be done if possible to do so. He promised me that in the presence of Senator Husting, of Wisconsin, who was with me. I went to him afterwards and said, "Why did you scatter them, and why were splendid officers, with whom I had served many years in the National Guard, removed?" He said in reply, "Because the General Staff is making up the Army, and I could not interfere, for I have to depend on the staff to make up the Army." Talk to me about Regular Army officers! I served for five years in the Regular Army, and I know what it means and what they will do. I admire many of them personally, but they are not in sympathy with the National Guard and never have been. They will do exactly what the General Staff says, and you know it if you have had any experience with them.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. I can not in three minutes.

Mr. PELL. That is what I wanted to get—an idea.

Mr. FREAR. The purpose of this is simply a compromise of the worst kind. I trust that you will kill the proposition, and kill the bill if necessary to do so. Let it go back to the Senate conferees, and if they are so determined to destroy the National Guard organizations of the different States that they will refuse to accept this reorganization bill, let the responsibility rest with them. I am convinced they represent the views of the General Staff, and there will be little question about it if they refuse to permit the National Guard to remain as it has been for a half century or more.

I do not apprehend the American Congress will be disturbed by the attitude of the General Staff, which the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] says has the second best lobby in the country surrounding Congress. If so, we better find out why these gentlemen paid by the Government for military services are engaged in lobbying for or against bills before Congress. I do not believe they should be permitted to continue that lobby, and if it means a question of destroying the National Guard system, as this makeshift compromise will, and putting some of these lobbyists in a restraining strait-jacket, I have no doubt of the result. As I hope that the splendid National Guard of my State, with which I was actively connected for 16 years, may be maintained, I hope to see this compromise defeated. (The compromise was rejected by a vote of 212 to 104.)

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD].

Mr. HARRELD. Mr. Speaker, under the Constitution of this country there are two methods of maintaining an Army for the general defense of the country. Those two methods are well defined.

One of them is that there shall be a standing Army for the purpose of preserving peace and for the purpose of defending this country in time of insurrection.

The other provides that there shall be a State militia, which shall be subject to the call of the Government in time of war only.

What this resolution proposes is simply a compromise between the two. I do not understand how there can be such a compromise.

Troops that are called to the Federal service are Federal troops and cease to be State troops.

If they are called into the Federal service under this amendment, as I understand it, and I believe that I am right about it, they would be a part of the Regular Army.

If a casualty should occur to one of them, he would be entitled to a pension. If, for instance, he contracts tuberculosis or any disease, he would be entitled to a pension.

I believe that a man who is called into the service under this regulation, as described, would be nothing more nor less than a member of the National Army, the Regular Army.

A soldier is either a member of the Regular Army or a member of the State guard. This amendment proposes to make him a member of both. Under it it would be foolish to join the State guard. Only those could be recruited who desired to become Regular Army soldiers, thus entirely eliminating the National Guard, which is exactly what is attempted to be done.

There is an age-long antipathy in the War Department and in the Regular Army for the National Guard of the several States.

I know that down in the State where I live we have a very efficient National Guard. At the hands of the Regular Army, after the war ended, that National Guard was mustered out of the service, instead of turning it back to the State. It absolutely demoralized the service of the National Guard in my State, and they have had to build it up again.

I want to tell you that the Regular Army in numerous instances has shown its opposition to the National Guard system.

I believe it is time to go back to the methods prescribed by our forefathers.

The National Guard is popular with the people; it is no trouble to get young men to join it and to come together voluntarily for training.

Why is it almost absolutely impossible to get recruits for the Regular Army in time of peace? Because when they are taken into the Regular Army they are separated from their friends and comrades and scattered to the four winds of the earth—put under officers not of their own choosing and patronized and overlorded.

This may be wise in time of war, but not in time of peace.

Why not take the hint? Why not provide for voluntary training camps for the training of such young men as join the National Guard, "according to the discipline prescribed by Congress," as provided in the Constitution? Make these camps attractive, have them close to home for these boys, where they can train by the side of their friends under officers who are their friends and who know their wants. Over these officers, who would be simply drill sergeants, you might have trained Regular Army officers; but the men in training do not need any staid, old Army officer to train them. A good drillmaster is all they need, and he does not have to be a West Pointer.

If this course was followed you would not have to have compulsory military training, and at the same time you would have a large reserve of trained men turned out from these voluntary military-training camps each year, under the National Guard system, available in times of insurrection and war. Under the Constitution this State Militia can only be called out in time of war or insurrection.

This amendment proposed by the Senate would give to the President the right to call them out in the same manner that he may now call out the Regular Army.

If the League of Nations had been confirmed by the Senate and it was necessary to send troops to Europe at the instance of the council of nine, the President could order out this National Guard and send it to do police duty in Turkey or Russia.

Suppose some States would accept the option proposed herein and other States did not, then we would have gross favoritism shown to those States which did accept. Such money as the Government had to spend on the National Guard would be spent by the War Department on the National Guard of those States which did accept, and the result would be that all the States would ultimately be compelled to accept, and that would be the end of the National Guard, except, perhaps, the name. Anyway, it would be a part and parcel of that great military machine which certain people are so anxious to establish.

I have nothing against our Regular Army. I am proud of it and its achievements. That is why I want to keep it the small, effective, well-organized machine it has always been, rather than a big, overgrown military establishment, such as brought Germany into disrepute among the nations.

The way to do this and at the same time have adequate reserve force for war is to develop the National Guard under the States—that great citizen army of which we are equally proud because of its achievements in the past.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. VAILE].

Mr. VAILE. Mr. Speaker, in 1916 I was defeated for Congress because I was an officer of the National Guard, at that time in the Federal military service by order of the President of the United States. The statement was made in print and on the stump that Ben C. Hilliard was "a friend of organized labor"—which it was implied and assumed that I was not—and that I was guilty of the atrocious crime of being "an officer in the State militia."

My old organization was the nucleus of the One hundred and fifty-seventh Infantry, one of the best trained regiments ever sent to France, and I know that there is a whole lot of truth in the statements made here to-day to the effect that National Guard officers and National Guard regiments were sidetracked. The old First and Second Battalions of Colorado Infantry, on which the One hundred and fifty-seventh was built, had many men who had been under fire before the guard was mobilized for service on the Mexican border. Those battalions were continuously in the Federal service from the 19th of June, 1916, till long after the armistice. They came back from the border just prior to the declaration of war and were sent out to Camp Kearny, in California, where they ate their hearts out in inactivity while they watched new draft regiments leave for France. Before some of those regiments were even formed the One hundred and fifty-seventh Infantry was officially pronounced to be one of the best trained regiments in the service. Its colonel, sturdy Pat Hamrock, who in his youth had served several enlistment periods in the Regular Army and who had worked in and for the National Guard ever since, was frequently praised for the high grade of personnel of his men and the high state of their efficiency. He should have been. They were a fine tribute to his soldierly leadership. The lieutenant colonel, Rice W. Means, now a candidate for United States Senator from Colorado, had served as an officer in the First Colorado Infantry, United States Volunteers, in the Philippines, and had been cited for gallantry in action there. The regiment got to France at last. The lieutenant colonel, some of the other officers, and many of the men saw action. A number of them became casualties; but they saw action as replacement troops, distributed a few at a time among many different organizations.

Now, the men who comprised the nucleus of this magnificent regiment frequently had occasion to feel, when they were on the border, that they were rather regarded as outsiders by the officers and men of the Regular Establishment who served with them. I do not mean that we were not well treated. I think we were generously treated. The Regular officers laid themselves out to be decent to us; and, so far as their duty would permit, I think they gave our enlisted men perhaps a shade the better of it in minor matters of discipline. But we knew that they all felt that we "did not belong." A lady at the Regulars' camp, the wife of one of the higher officers, remarked to me once that military life must be quite a novelty to us. I asked her how many of the officers of her husband's regiment below the rank of captain had ever been under fire, and she said none, so far as she knew. She was greatly surprised to learn that I was one of only three of the officers in our entire two battalions who had never had that experience. Well, most of them have had it now and have acquitted themselves with that credit which we have learned by the experience of a hundred and fifty years is always to be expected of our unparalleled little Regular Army, and in what I say I desire merely to voice the desire of the national guardsman, which I know exists, for a status which will make it possible to recognize him as the real soldier which he is.

The men who join the National Guard join it for patriotic motives and for the love of the game. They have nothing to gain but the satisfaction of a public service and the pleasure of the work. That is the spirit that the American people have to thank for the immediate availability of 360,000 trained soldiers, in addition to the Regular Army, when we entered the World War. It is that spirit which takes the clerk and the blacksmith and the lad who drives the grocery wagon night after night to the armory instead of to the pool hall. It is that spirit which keeps him lying in the mud at the range adjusting his rifle sights to the wind and learning to change a "2 at 3 o'clock" into a No. 5 in the center of the black. It is that spirit which fiercely fans the tireless soul of the company map hound who walks your legs off on Sunday and savagely criticizes your sketches of all the roads, fences, fields, houses, and so forth, between the city limits and the old brewery, and which keeps his class of noncoms busy half the night sticking pins into the campaigns of Grant and Lee. "Play soldiers?" Oh, yes; in the same sense that the Regular himself or any other soldier is a play soldier in time of peace—except that the boys in the National Guard are doing it purely for the love of it.

My own experience was not long, but it was long enough to give me an intense admiration for the splendid fellows with whom I shared it and an understanding of their point of view, and I can assure you that it is in favor of the right of the State to federalize its National Guard.

You have heard some letters from adjutant generals of different States in favor of the State's right to appoint the officers and to train the guard. With this point of view I have entire sympathy, and I want to say that the country owes a great and little appreciated debt to these loyal, patriotic, and self-sacrificing men who have worked in season and out of season for the welfare of their militia organizations, constantly seeking to increase and maintain their efficiency and their pride of personnel. But, Mr. Speaker, I have been a company recruiting officer. I have been one of those fellows who spend day after day trying to get men to join the National Guard. In my experience the chief objection of the prospective recruit lies always in his fear that the guard would be only a State force. When there was a prospect of his becoming part of a Federal force it was not hard to get him to enlist. Now, for Heaven's sake, give the State a chance to accept the option for its militia to be a part of the Federal force. [Applause.]

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to myself. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is recognized for 11 minutes.

Mr. DENT. Mr. Speaker, I think the proposition submitted by the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN], reduced to its last analysis, is a very simple one. The House bill provided that the National Guard should be organized in the different States under the law that existed prior to the declaration of war, with certain amendments perfecting that bill and taking care of certain defects. The Senate in its bill proposes to do something that has never been heard of in the history of this country. The Senate bill contains a proposition that has never been advanced in any Congress in the history of the United States so far as I have ever heard, and that is that the State troops should be organized under the Army clause of the Constitution rather than under the provision of the Constitution providing for organizing, disciplining, and training the militia. That of itself is a sufficient reason why at this particular time the amendment of the gentleman from California should not be adopted. Why should we undertake at this time to change all of the theories and all of the ideas that this Government has acted under for more than 100 years of its existence by a provision that nationalizes the State troops, is a sufficient answer it seems to me, to the motion of the gentleman from California.

Now, let us see. They submit a compromise proposition which I think is worse than the original. If we should adopt the original proposition they will not have the kind of National Guard in this country which we have had. Under the compromise we will have two kinds of National Guard, one under State authority the other under Federal control. If you adopt the compromise measure, I say, it is worse than the original idea, because you would have a hybrid National Guard organization. You have one kind of organization of the National Guard in one State and another kind in another, and one will be the favorite of the War Department while the other will be a stepchild.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. I yield.

Mr. KAHN. Is not that the condition that prevails in this country to-day? The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HARRELD] said his National Guard is not organized under the national-defense act, and so you have a different kind from what you have in some of the others.

Mr. DENT. The gentleman from California is referring to the fact that the State of Oklahoma did not take advantage of the national-defense act, I suppose. If they did not do it, of course that is a different proposition. If the State of Oklahoma does not want the benefit of Federal appropriations, then the State of Oklahoma has the right, and ought to have the right, to say so.

Mr. KAHN. And the bill pending will give every State the right to say how they will have their National Guard organized.

Mr. DENT. I know. The proposition that the gentleman from California offers is to allow the State of New York, for instance, to say that they will organize under the Army clause, and to allow the State of Nebraska, or the State of Oklahoma, to organize under the militia clause; and I repeat that the guard organized in New York would be the favorite sons of the War Department, and the guard organized in Oklahoma will be a stepchild. You can not make anything else out of it. [Applause.]

Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. HUSTED. How can that favoritism be practically exercised as against the National Guard of States that do not organize under the Army plan—this favoritism that you talk about?

Mr. DENT. Why, my friend, they will have to inspect the guard; the Regular Army officers will have to inspect the officers of the guard, and the Regular Army officers will have to inspect the men of the Guard, and Regular Army officers will be present when they have their drills, and they will send in their report that the guard organized in New York under the national law is a first-class organization, but that the guard organized in Oklahoma under the militia clause is not a first-class organization.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman have time to yield to me?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. You remember, as we all do, when we were framing the national-defense act that at that time we were confronting exactly the same proposition. The States had the option of determining whether they would come in and take advantage of the national-defense act or stay out and be deprived of those benefits. My friend had no objection then to the proposition and found no fault with it.

Mr. DENT. No; certainly not. I did not find any fault with the national-defense act, because that was uniform and universal. That applied to every State. Every State had to accept the provisions of the national-defense act or it would not get the benefit of the appropriation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Certainly.

Mr. DENT. That is a different proposition. Here you propose to have a guard organized as a Federal national force in one State and organized as a State force in another State.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Oh, no.

Mr. DENT. No; you can not get around that proposition, Brother GREENE. [Applause.] You propose under your compromise surely to have one National Guard organized under the Army clause of the Constitution and another National Guard organized under the militia clause of the Constitution, and as a result you have a hybrid National Guard organization in the several States.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. We started out with that same situation, because the States that would not accept the national-defense act were left on the doorstep without an appropriation.

Mr. DENT. They are not only left on the doorstep, but they do not get any Federal aid at all if they do not want it. If the State wants to organize its militia without help from the Federal Government, why should it not do it?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. This time they do get the money, and they are on the same parity as they were before.

Mr. YATES. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DENT. Yes.

Mr. YATES. I served five years in the National Guard. I am very anxious, indeed, to vote for its interest and not against it, but I have not heard——

Mr. DENT. I yielded to the gentleman for a question and not for a speech.

Mr. YATES. This is a question and not a speech. Not one member of the National Guard, with one exception, has objected to this bill from Illinois. I would like to know if it is not true that this bill that the gentleman is now attacking came from the civil officers and not from the General Staff? Is it not true that this embodies the wish and the view of the National Guard?

Mr. DENT. It is not. My colleague from Kansas [Mr. ANTHONY] read a telegram from Mr. Bennett C. Clark, president of the National Guard Association, sent to me, and congratulating the gentleman from Kansas and myself on the stand that we have taken.

Mr. YATES. But the National Guard is silent.

Mr. DENT. He is head of the National Guard organization, and every adjutant general in this country that I have heard from is against this proposition.

Mr. YATES. That is not true, of my own knowledge.

Mr. DENT. I say that that is true as to those I have heard from.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Thirty-five of them have indorsed your proposition.

Mr. DENT. Yes. The whole proposition, Mr. Speaker, is this: If you want to take away from the governors of the States the right to control their State troops without getting the permission of the President of the United States; if you want to organize your National Guard under an act of Congress and not under the act of the legislatures of the States; if you want to surrender to the centralized power in Washington the right to say who shall constitute your State troops, then vote for the Kahn amendment; but if you do not want to do that vote against it. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I left?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has 10 minutes.

Mr. KAHN. I understand that all time on the other side is exhausted?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. I yield those 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MCKENZIE].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. McKENZIE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I wish that we might consider this matter calmly and without prejudice and try to come to a sane, sensible conclusion. As one of the conferees on this bill, I feel—and my colleagues share that feeling with me—that we are agents of this body. We have been commissioned to try to bring about an agreement on this great bill, which everybody admits ought to be enacted into law speedily.

Now, there is not any mystery connected with this matter. There is not any underground work being done. It is not true that the General Staff is undertaking to railroad something through Congress. I am a member of the Committee on Military Affairs, and I have listened to scores of officers who appeared before us in behalf of the reorganization bill, and not one word was uttered in connection with this matter. The House committee undertook to reorganize the Army on the basis of the national-defense act; and you will remember that prior to 1916 the National Guard officers were appointed by the governors without any prescribed qualifications or any regulations. In that act we undertook to Federalize the National Guard, and we provided that the officers might be appointed by the governors, but that they must be selected from the class of men who had passed the examination prescribed by the Secretary of War.

Many of the States availed themselves of that law. We provided that they should receive certain pay, that the officers should receive certain pay, and we have been working along under that law. The war came on and the various regiments of the National Guard were drafted into the service. Many of the officers had not been appointed under the national-defense act but under the old law, and consequently had to submit to examination and were found to be inefficient and had to be put out. It was a calamity, and we all felt that way about it, but it could not be helped.

Here is the question before this House. It is not a question whether it is the Regular Army or the National Guard; it is a question whether we are going to get any reorganization bill at this time. As has been stated by the gentleman from Alabama, we wrote the bill on the basis of the national-defense act. The Senate wrote an original bill ignoring the national-defense act and struck out our bill and inserted their own. We have been trying to thrash out this whole matter, and one of the things in the Senate bill is a provision that provided that the National Guard of all the States should be organized under the Army clause of the Constitution. We, as your conferees, said to the Senators that such a provision could not pass the House; that it would be folly to report such a proposition to the House. Finally we submitted this proposition as a compromise, putting it in the alternative. The Senate agreed to accept it and let the House conferees practically write the remainder of the bill.

Now, I want to ask you if there is any grave danger to the National Guard or to the people of this country if the conferees on the part of the House agree to this compromise? What is it? It simply says that if the Legislature of Texas or the Legislature of Illinois or the legislature of any other State shall pass a resolution permitting the National Guard of those States to organize under the Army clause, it can be done, and they will be so organized and receive the same pay and compensation and treatment as the National Guard now receives.

Now, I want to say to you gentlemen in all fairness and in all candor, lay aside your prejudices. I am not arguing this case one way or the other; I live in a State that has always had a National Guard of which we have been proud. Old Illinois furnished the 33d division in the Great War, and long ago, when I was a member of the Illinois General Assembly, I stood for the National Guard then and always have been a friend of the National Guard ever since. I fought for the National Guard in the enactment of the national-defense act, and I can not conceive wherein, as long as the Legislature of Illinois stands between the National Guard and this law, the National Guard is in any danger.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. I will.

Mr. CONNALLY. Suppose the Legislature of Illinois should put the National Guard under the Federal system. Could it ever get out? Would there be any way of retracting or withdrawing? I am asking the gentleman for information.

Mr. McKENZIE. That is a matter that can be taken care of, although it is not in this amendment.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKENZIE. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. The guard would die with the expiration of each individual enlistment.

Mr. CONNALLY. The organization would be there.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. But there would not be anybody in it.

Mr. McKENZIE. I know this much about the National Guard of Illinois: I know the General Assembly of Illinois follows the lead in the enactment of law that the National Guard of our State want. I know that if the National Guard of Illinois should go to the legislature and say, "We would like to organize under the Army clause of the Constitution," the legislature of that State will permit them to do it; but if the National Guard of Illinois, or such men as Col. Foreman or Col. Davis, and all those men who led regiments on the battle fields of Europe, say that they do not want it, it will not be done.

Now, gentlemen of the House, without arguing the merits or demerits of this proposition, where is the danger to the National Guard? I am one of those who always believed and believe now that these things ought to be left to the people. This is only another instance not of Prussianism, because Prussianism is the exercise of autocratic power of the government in time of peace over the individual citizen, against which I have always been opposed. But it is not Prussianism; it is the very opposite of Prussianism, and puts it squarely up to the people of every State.

Now, gentlemen, do you want to permit this compromise, that is without danger to the National Guard, that is without danger to the people, that leaves it to the people of this great country to say what it wants, and let us go back to the Senate, where we can agree on a reorganization bill and put this country on a firm and sound military basis instead of our Military Establishment dangling in the air, as it is to-day. As I have said, without arguing the merits or demerits, I care nothing about that; we are your agents, we are your servants in this matter, and it is for you to decide calmly and without prejudice whether that is a fair proposition or not. [Applause.]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. KAHN. I will withhold it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I understood the gentleman from Oklahoma to say that all he wanted to do was to make a motion to nonconcur in the Senate amendment and send it back to conference. That is exactly what has been done by the motion I offered earlier in the day. I certainly could not withhold the motion for the previous question if the gentleman is going to offer something entirely new.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have my amendment reported for information.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will I lose the floor if I yield for that purpose?

The SPEAKER. No; the Clerk will report the gentleman's amendment for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. McKEOWN moves that the managers on the part of the House be further instructed to insist on their disagreement to sections 69 and 70 of the Senate amendment.

Mr. KAHN. That has already been done by the motion that I made this morning, which was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. This is a motion to insist on the disagreement.

Mr. KAHN. That has already been done.

Mr. McKEOWN. I ask the gentleman to withhold his motion for two minutes, until I can explain the purpose of it.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California has one minute remaining.

Mr. KAHN. I may want that. I think, in view of the fact that the gentleman has a right to extend his remarks and the further view of the fact that the gentleman's proposal has already been agreed to, I shall have to insist on my motion for the previous question.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, may I offer it as an amendment? I offer it as an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair must first recognize the gentleman from California, who moved the previous question.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from California will remember that there was a general misapprehension, and the ruling was that it would not have to come in as a separate motion. Then it was discovered that it should be moved as an amendment to this motion.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HICKS. The gentleman from California having moved the previous question, is not that the regular order, if nothing else?

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California.

The question was taken.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, is it proper to have the motion read? Many of us were not present when it was read.

The SPEAKER. It has been read once. [Cries of "Regular order!"]

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from California to instruct the conferees. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll; and there were—yeas 104, nays 212, not voting 111, as follows:

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. NEELY, asked me to state that he was unavoidably absent and that if he were present he would vote "aye" on this proposition.

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will announce the conferees.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. KAHN, Mr. ANTHONY, Mr. MCKENZIE, Mr. DENT, and Mr. FIELDS.

MAY CARROLL.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I present the privileged report which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

House resolution 509.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to May Carroll the sum of $266.67, the same being the amount received by her per month as clerk to the late William J. Browning, a Representative in Congress from the State of New Jersey at the time of his death, March 24, 1920.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the usual resolution providing for additional compensation for one month to the Secretary of a deceased Member. There is to be an amendment offered to this resolution on which the committee took no action but thought it to be a matter that should be referred to the House without action or without recommendation by the committee. For that purpose I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD].

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the figures "$266.67" insert the following: "monthly from and after March 20, 1920, until the election and qualification of a successor to the late William J. Browning."

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposed the gentleman from Tennessee was going to raise the point of order. Of course the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARRETT. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IRELAND] lost the floor when he yielded to the gentleman from New York to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is correct.

Mr. IRELAND. And I am yielding for that purpose.

Mr. GARRETT. I shall not, however, keep the floor very long. I did not catch the name of the Member that was mentioned in the resolution that was presented, and I am very glad that I did not. I do not know who the secretary is, and I am very glad that I do not, because no personal element can possibly enter into what I am about to say concerning this matter. It seems to me that the proposition submitted by the gentleman from New York—of course, we know it is an unusual one—is a very remarkable one. The amendment would seem to proceed upon the theory that the clerk to the Member is a sort of a deputy Congressman, and that when a vacancy occurs in that office the clerk shall serve as Representative—that is, in a certain degree—pending the filling of that vacancy. Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that that is a theory that we had better go a little bit slow about committing ourselves to. As a matter of fact, when a Member dies his district is without representation for the duties for which the Member is elected—that is to say, in the legislative branch of the Government. All these innumerable duties that are thrust upon us, of department work and all that, are matters wholly outside of our official duty, and are attended to, of course, as a matter of courtesy. It seems to me that if we adopt the policy of taking the clerk of a Member after he has died and continue that clerk as an official, we are treading on very dangerous ground, and without further consideration of that very serious matter I do not think this House should set the precedent that it is asked by the gentleman from New York to set. The secretary to a Member is subject to removal by that Member at any hour.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. In a moment. Under the proposition offered by the gentleman from New York that clerk would be subject to nobody, not responsible to the people back in the district, not responsible to anybody here, and having no functions, in fact, to perform. I suppose the clerk could not use the frank of a dead Member to send out mail.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I yield to the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SISSON. Just to answer a question. The gentleman has covered the question of the responsibility, but I will ask this additional question: A great many Members have two clerks, and have divided the salaries. Some have a clerk and some have a stenographer, and some have both. The salaries may not be the same. Who is going to perform the duties of clerk and who the duties of stenographer, or in the case of two clerks who is going to perform those duties?

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. SANFORD. I do not think the gentleman understood my amendment. My plan was that we would keep these clerks under the jurisdiction of the Clerk of the House, and I stated that I would offer that further amendment.

Mr. GARRETT. That changes the whole theory of the law. The theory under which clerks are now appointed is that the clerk is the employee of the Member, and that the Member has the absolute control of the clerk's employment and its continuance. So far as that is concerned, the law ought never to have been changed so as to put them all on the roll. But it was changed. Nevertheless, the legal relationship which exists between the Member and the secretary or clerk is not changed. But it would be changed if this were enacted. The whole theory of this matter would be changed by the proposition of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that if the amendment would prevail as a matter of law, a clerk of this sort would have no authority to transact any legislative business for the residents of the district.

Mr. GARRETT. That is so, so far as I can see, and the matter could be extended to the other body. It is a wonder they have never thought of it before.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Is the gentleman about to yield the floor?

Mr. GARRETT. I was going to make a point of order on the whole proposition. Let me inquire of the gentleman from Illinois: As I understand, this does not come from the Committee on Accounts? It was not reported from the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. IRELAND. It was submitted to the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. GARRETT. And the Committee on Accounts has made no report?

Mr. IRELAND. It was to be offered on the floor of the House.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I wanted to ask the gentleman, if he has the right to do so, to yield to me about five minutes. I would like to support the resolution.

Mr. GARRETT. I can not yield to the gentleman from Mississippi [laughter] for that purpose. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. I will make it, or I will still reserve it, if it is desired by anyone to further discuss the subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARRETT. That it is not germane to the proposition that comes from the Committee on Accounts, and is not authorized by law.

The SPEAKER. At first blush it seems to the Chair that it is just as much authorized by existing law as the resolution to which it is offered.

Mr. GARRETT. That may be. Probably the original resolution might have been subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. It comes from the Committee on Accounts. At first blush the Chair would be inclined to feel that it is as much authorized by law as the resolution. The Chair would be glad to hear from the gentleman on that point.

Mr. GARRETT. It occurs to me that it is without authority of law and is subject to a point of order.

The SPEAKER. Any payment out of the contingent fund would be in order.

Mr. GARRETT. This not only pays out of the contingent fund but it continues the clerk in office, upon the rolls of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is mistaken. This is the amendment: It simply says that there shall be paid to the clerk $266.67 monthly from and after March 24, 1920, until the election and qualification of the successor to Mr. Browning. It does not impose any duties upon the clerk or create a clerk. It simply appropriates money out of the contingent fund. That may be an argument against the adoption of the resolution, but it does away with the point of order. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Wyoming.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for one minute.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that we would scarcely be justified in enacting legislation of this character. The usual character of resolution is to pay the salary of the clerk for a month. I do not think Congress would be justified in providing a salary for a Congressman's clerk from the time of the death of the Congressman until after his successor is elected and qualified. It seems to me the very statement of the matter is sufficient to condemn it.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Mississippi is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Speaker, the only possible objection I could have to this resolution is that it does not make it general law. I would not only vote for this resolution but I would vote for a resolution that makes this a general law, applicable in all cases.

The duties of a Congressman, of course, are legislative, and a clerk could not attend to those, and would not. But there are a great many other things that a Congressman has to do, and does do, not, in my opinion, merely as a matter of courtesy to his district but as a matter of duty to the people of the district; and the clerk can attend to those duties efficiently, as a rule.

Now, a Congressman dies. I understand the rule is that the clerk is provided for for a month. So far as the law is concerned, it might just as well be four months. It is provided in order that the clerk may wind up certain business that is then pending—not legislative, but otherwise. But the district from that time on until another Congressman is elected is without any sort of representation here in Washington. If the clerk is continued in office, there are a great many things that he can do for the people of that district. Soldiers are writing continuously now about their allotments, they are writing about their compensation, they are writing about their war-risk insurance; people are writing for passports; boys are writing in regard to Liberty bonds that have been lost in some way or another. There are a great many documents that we think are valuable or we would not appropriate the public money in order to have them sent out. The clerk attends to those things; otherwise when the Member dies the people of that district are absolutely deprived of all of this service.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Assume the case of a Member being dead.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, ask the question. The Member is dead.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. And if the secretary is not attending to any of these manifold things that you speak of, would you compel the secretary to do all those things that you say must be done after the death of the Representative? What discipline could you invoke?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. None.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. When a Member of the House dies, of course the people of his district know that, and cease writing to him about anything.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. The average man would not know who the secretary is, and therefore he would not write to the secretary.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes; what is the gentleman's question?

Mr. BARKLEY. What service except voluntary service, such as the clerk might render, would be expected of the secretary?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, I assume that everybody has an efficient secretary. If the Members of the House have a secretary as efficient as I have, she would notify everybody that she would attend to the routine of the office, and it would not require any discipline either. I may say to the gentleman from New York——

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I regret that we have not time for more extended discussion, but under the circumstances, with the business ahead of us and pressing for time, I am warranted in moving the previous question on the resolution and all amendments thereto.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois moves the previous question on the resolution and amendments thereto.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The resolution was agreed to.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4332) entitled "An act to exchange the present Federal building and site at Gastonia, N. C., for a new site and building."

THEODORE W. KOLBE AND MAY PEACOCK.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the privileged resolution which I send to the desk.

House resolution 542.

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House of Representatives be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund of the House, to Theodore W. Kolbe the sum of $186.66 and to May Peacock the sum of $120, the same being the amount received by them per month as clerks to the late Charles A. Nichols, a Representative in Congress from Michigan, at the time of his death, April 25, 1920.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is the regular resolution, and the compensation named is at the rate that the clerks have been paid.

The resolution was agreed to.

JANE NICHOLS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 546.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms is hereby authorized and directed to pay Jane Nichols, mother of the late Representative Charles A. Nichols, of Michigan, the sum of $452.05, being the amount of salary due him as a Member of the House at the time of his death.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I am sure there will be no objection to this resolution, but I would like to make this short explanation. This resolution is necessary because under the law the amount due the late Congressman between the 4th of the month and the date of his death is only payable to his estate or his widow. The late Mr. Nichols was a bachelor. This resolution is necessary in order to pay this amount to his mother.

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, I assume the gentleman intends this for the aged mother in addition to the prospective appropriation that will be made later.

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. This is the balance of his salary from the 4th of April to the 25th.

Mr. GARD. Did I understand that the law is that the salary is paid to the widow or to the estate?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes; to the widow or to the estate.

Mr. GARD. In this instance Mr. Nichols had no widow or dependent children?

Mr. IRELAND. No; he was unmarried and there will be no administration of his estate.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 11892, the river and harbor bill, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to take the river and harbor appropriation bill from the Speaker's table, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference. Is there objection?

Mr. DUPRÉ. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the gentleman from Iowa on his return to the House.

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object, I presume the gentleman from Iowa has consulted with the ranking minority member of the committee with reference to sending this bill to conference.

Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL], the ranking member, is not here, but he asked to have the bill sent to conference, saying that he could not be here.

Mr. GARNER. That is one thing I want to suggest to gentlemen on that side, that when they ask unanimous consent to send a bill to conference I think it is nothing but their duty to the minority to state that they have consulted the ranking member of the minority who is going to be on the conference and that it is agreeable to him.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. IRELAND. I hope the gentleman will withhold that for a minute.

Mr. BLANTON. I will withhold it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. KENNEDY of Iowa, Mr. DEMPSEY, and Mr. GALLAGHER.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment joint resolution of the following title:

H. J. Res. 351. Joint resolution extending the provisions of an act amending section 32 of the Federal farm loan act approved July 17, 1916, to June 30, 1921.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed with amendment joint resolution (H. J. Res. 354) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to Paul E. Slocumb Post, No. 85, Grand Army of the Republic, Bloomington, Ind., necessary tents and cots for use at the State encampment to be held at said city May 25, 26, and 27, 1920, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 400) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The message also announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 9521) to prevent hoarding and deterioration of and deception with respect to cold-storage foods, to regulate shipments of cold-storage foods in interstate commerce, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SMITH of South Carolina as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 1695. An act validating certain homestead entries; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

LOAN OF TENTS AND COTS TO THE PAUL E. SLOCUMB POST, G. A. R.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution 354 from the Speaker's table, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan tents, cots, and so forth, to the Paul E. Slocumb Post, of Bloomington, Ind.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman calls up from the Speaker's table the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 354) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Paul E. Slocumb Post, No. 85, Grand Army of the Republic, Bloomington, Ind., necessary tents, cots, and blankets for use at the State encampment to be held in said city May 25, 26, and 27, 1920.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. GARD. What amendment is it?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. To strike out the word "blankets."

Mr. GARD. And permit the use of tents and cots?

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Yes; and eliminate blankets.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BLAND of Indiana, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate amendment was concurred in was laid on the table.

REVISION OF THE LAWS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I call up the following privileged resolution, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

House resolution 548.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revision of the Laws of the House of Representatives is hereby authorized to employ, in addition to a reviser now authorized, other competent persons to assist in codifying, revising, and compiling the laws of the United States under the direction and supervision of the said committee and the chairman thereof, and the Clerk of the House of Representatives is authorized and directed to pay from the contingent fund of the House of Representatives to the additional persons so employed the amounts designated for each by the chairman of the said committee, upon vouchers by the said chairman, but not to exceed the total amount to the said additional employees of $9,000.

With the following committee amendment:

Line 11, after the word "chairman," insert the words "and approved by the Committee on Accounts."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. These employees who are sought to be provided for by this resolution are of what kind—lawyers?

Mr. IRELAND. If the gentleman will permit me to make a statement on that, I think I can clear the matter up. This resolution is offered to assist the Committee on Revision of the Laws, that has had this work under consideration since the beginning of this term. The appropriations made for the clerks and the reviser mentioned in the resolution have proven inadequate for the expedient dispatch of this business. The chairman of the committee has interviewed as many of the lawyer Members of the House as it was possible for him to see, and I understand that without exception they are all very much pleased with the work that he has thus far accomplished. The additional help, aid, and legal assistance which he contemplates hiring are all lawyers, who have had considerable experience in the legal editions of——

Mr. BLANTON. Is this codification being done by the committee or by paid experts?

Mr. IRELAND. I imagine that the technical, routine work is largely done by the revisers.

Mr. BLANTON. And they are paid what kind of salaries?

Mr. IRELAND. Their salaries are of different amounts—$100 a month or such a matter, most of them.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman know that?

Mr. IRELAND. I have the word of the chairman of the committee. I will yield to him in a moment. He can explain all of that.

Mr. BLANTON. Does the gentleman think that he should inflict this resolution on the House at this time of day, after the House agreed to so many of his resolutions this evening?

Mr. IRELAND. Unfortunately, I can not choose the time. I have been waiting for over 30 days to get these resolutions considered. I have yielded to everyone, and I think I have been very patient. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have been very much interested in the matter of codifying the laws of the United States so that they can be printed in one volume, so that the people can find out what the law is. When the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] was made the chairman of the Committee on Revision of the Laws I told him that we would give him a good committee, and that they must go to work and see if it were not possible to codify the laws—not to revise them—and put the existing laws in a codified shape as they stand, without attempting to change them, and then endeavor to pass that codification and make it the law as a codified statute of the United States. [Applause.] There is nothing that we could do in a small way that would be of greater advantage to everyone than that sort of thing. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] and his committee, including some very excellent men on both sides of the House, have been doing exceedingly good work in this matter. Of course, they do not do the work of codifying the statutes themselves, personally, in the main, although the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] and I think the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE] have given some personal attention even to that. They have done a lot of this work; I do not know just how much, but a third or more. There is no political patronage about the work. The gentleman from Kansas has endeavored to get as competent service as he can. He has employed the services of men who are familiar with the matter of law codification to do the work, one man doing one piece of work and another man doing another piece of work, all of which the committee very carefully scrutinizes; but it is impossible with the force they have to complete that work by the time of meeting in December. No one can tell exactly how much it will cost. I have talked with the chairman on a good many occasions and have discovered that he is not inclined to be extravagant. I think, if this is permitted, in all probability we will be able to have presented to the House when we meet in December a complete codification of the law down to the date which was selected, which was a year or two back, and we hope and expect that we will be able to pass that through both Houses of Congress in some way so that it will become a revised statute of the United States.

The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] has done exceedingly good work on this committee in the past and is continuing to do it now. The expense of this is nominal. Let us, if we can possibly do it, try to fix it so that anyone can find out what the law is.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman surely will agree that if the work is to be worth anything it must be done by experts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly; and it is being done by experts.

Mr. BLANTON. While our distinguished colleagues oversee the work, of course they can not do the actual work.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No.

Mr. BLANTON. I am heart and soul with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE] in the matter. I have been looking into the work that he has done, and very much approve of it. The question is now, Are we in a position, is the Government in position, when it is in debt to the extent of nearly $28,000,000,000, to employ the kind of experts who should be in charge of this work, and should we go to the necessary expense in order to get proper work at this time?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think so; the expense is not very great.

Mr. BLANTON. One $4,000 man is to be employed in this resolution, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. BLANTON. I was so informed.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman is mistaken. That is not in the resolution.

Mr. BLANTON. The resolution authorizes not to exceed $9,000.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The resolution authorizes not to exceed $9,000. That is not to employ a $4,000 man at all, as I understand it. I think what the chairman of the committee wants to do is to employ some man who is learned in this business to do part of this work in his extra time.

There are a number of people who are competent to do that. The chairman asked me the other day if I could recommend to him some man competent to do that work, and I told him I could not, and I have not and I do not intend to try to do so.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman speaks of some extra time. The gentleman means some time put in out of hours?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I mean possibly a college professor who knows the game and who will do this extra work at night on one class of work.

Mr. BLANTON. I think somebody ought to be employed to put in all his time on it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, well, there ought to be employed experts who will do the work well.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the gentleman will find that he can secure some excellent suggestions from the West Publishing Co., if the chairman of the committee will call on them——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will say that I understand the chairman of the committee has had expert advice of the West Publishing Co. and also the Cooperative Publishing Co., if that still exists, and various other publishing concerns, and I think now they have reached the conclusion that if it can it would be desirable for Congress to revise its statutes in one volume. [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE]. [Applause.]

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I notice the suggestion just now, and it is a very good one, that we consult the West Publishing Co., for example. I desire to say that at the start of this work I consulted that company, and they are very warmly supporting me, and right now are doing some work for me. That is also true of the Edward Thompson Publishing Co., which publishes the other annotated statutes, and of Mr. Uriah Barnes, who edited the Barnes Federal Code, the little black books. All of these have helped us, and are helping me right now. Inquiry has been made as to how this work was being done. We have had the assistance in this work of a doctor of laws, who is and has been for 20 years professor of a great law school, and has been one of the editors of the Cyclopedia and the Encyclopedia of Evidence and many textbooks. We have had and now have the assistance of a gentleman who was a member of the last commission to revise the laws some 15 years ago. We have helping us a gentleman who edited the last publication of the District laws and several learned lawyers. The way I got them to work was to take their extra time. They teach or practice a part of the time and the rest of the time they write law books, and I have gotten them to assist in this work and they have given me their extra time of evenings and whenever they can. During the last 10 months I have put in most of my own time on the work. We have now finished about one-third of this work, as we estimate. Some inquiry has been made as to the character of the work. I have letters from two justices of the Supreme Court and one of them says that the research and industry displayed is wonderful. The other says as far as he can see, and he has examined it as much as he had time, the work is well and thoroughly done. I had a letter from one of the biggest law firms in the United States to-day stating that they had looked into it—I sent them a copy—and they said it was well done. As I say, the work up to the present time is one-third done as we figure, and has cost $5,000. The last time it was attempted, some 15 years ago, the preparation cost about $200,000. When they got this far they had spent $60,000. We have spent $5,000. When the Revised Statutes were enacted in 1874, the Hon. Luke P. Poland, chairman of the Revision of Laws Committee, reported that it cost $100,000, which would be at the rate of about $35,000 for one-third, and we have done it for $5,000. One reason, as I said, is that the chairman has given his time to it and made no charge; and another reason was that it was done under the work of a committee of the House and by a chairman who gave his personal attention to it. A distinguished Senator said that the reason we got it done was because somebody gave it his personal attention, some Member who took a personal interest, which is much better than any commission we have ever had, because no bill ever drawn by a commission has ever been reported favorably by any committee of this House. Now, in figuring that we have done one-third at $5,000, we can figure it for about $10,000, and by careful figuring I reach the conclusion that if I had $9,000 to spend, we could finish it by December. We have been working about 10 months. I think in the next six months we can do twice as much work as we did in the last 10, and thus complete this book if we get this money to employ a few more assistants and spur up——

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield just for information?

Mr. LITTLE. Certainly.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman did not state, and therefore I did not know, what went with all the work done by the same committee under the chairmanship of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS]. Is that included in the $5,000?

Mr. LITTLE. No. Congress has been allowing $4,000 a year for the revisal. I took that for 10 months and part of the clerk hire and employed three to four men whom I put to work, giving one of them $125 a month, or rather $1,500 a year, and another $1,200, and another whatever I could pay him. Some of them worked for whatever I found I could give them. We have men helping right now who are so anxious to get it done they are working for nothing. Of course, I can not expect them to continue that way. The reviser before me, the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS], brought in his bill before I came here, which passed the House, but did not go through the Senate. It was a bill to revise only a certain part of the laws; not to codify them all. In all the history of this country there has been but one code of our laws made, and that was 46 years ago. The laws now are in 36 volumes.

When I became chairman of this committee and investigated the former work of the committee I found that it was allowed $4,000 a year for a reviser. The question arose as to what he should do. Forty-six years ago a bill was passed enacting the Revised Statutes as the Code of American Laws. Since then the committee has from time to time revised certain comparatively small parts of the laws and done some admirable work, but as fast as they finished anything something came along to amend and they were no nearer finished than before they started. In 1897 a commission was appointed which, drawing $20,000 a year for some nine years, completed a revision which was turned down by the Committee on Revision. After a careful inquiry I decided that we would take the $4,000 a year and go ahead and make a new code of all the laws like they did in 1874. What is the use of making two bites of a cherry? It only cost $100,000 in 1874 and here I was all equipped with $4,000 a year and $2,000 for a clerk. The committee said that they would stay with me and we went at it. For 10 months the $4,000 a year has been devoted to this task as well as most of my committee clerk's salary, which was expended to employ a reviser. So with about $5,000 we have completed one-third of this work so well that justices of the Supreme Court commend it highly. We must do twice as much in the next six months as we did in the past 10 in order to have the bill ready for a vote the first week in December. Our revisers are more experienced and can work more rapidly now. I have located other good men, and with this money I can employ sufficient experienced talent to finish in time. The committee has been very helpful. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MOORE], a learned lawyer, has been able to give us some of his time with very helpful results. Up till now the chairman has divided the work with his associates and has carefully gone over every section of the work they have done.

If you will refer to Mr. SLEMP's presentation of the ordnance and fortification bill, you will find the author of this bill saved $288,500 that day and $10,000 on Mr. KAHN's last appropriation bill. That $298,500 will pay for this code in full, and it will not cost the Government one cent except that.

One-third of this proposed code is now before Congress and the bench and the bar of the country for examination and correction. Some mistakes will be discovered and corrected, of course. Everybody will have a chance to investigate the work and conclude as to its value. Up to this time the chairman has had to do about one-half the work. Dr. Burdick, of Kansas University, and Mr. John Lott, of Ohio, have done most of the rest of the first third. Others are helping now. I can not put in so much time this summer. With this fund I can get the aid that will get this bill ready for a vote by December, I think. If I can be accorded 3 per cent of the money already saved, that will, I believe, complete the arduous task.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield me two or three minutes?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I had several months' experience in this particular kind of work on the District of Columbia Committee. Judge Jenkins, of Wisconsin, was a member of the committee and chairman of the Judiciary Subcommittee and I was the ranking member of the subcommittee, and it was assigned to us by the committee to get up a bill revising and codifying the laws of the District of Columbia, and we put in months of very hard work on the bill, much of it done at night. The judge and I had no expert assistance. If a gentleman has never done that kind of work he has no idea what a tremendous burden it is and how much time it takes in pure detail drudgery. If the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. LITTLE], with this small amount of money and the kind of assistance he can get for it, can finish this work by the 1st of December, if it is as difficult and as tedious as was the District of Columbia work of like character, I think he will deserve a monument to his memory. I am only afraid that he can not get as good and as competent assistants as he ought to have with this appropriation. The codification is needed very badly, and having had experience I know whereof I speak with reference to this kind of work.

Mr. SISSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me?

Mr. IRELAND. I yield two minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, of course, in two minutes I can not say what I would like to say about this matter, but I had occasion to go into Mr. Little's office and examine the work that is being done. I was appointed on this committee when I first came to Congress, and there was some work in progress at that time. We revised two portions of the law—civil and criminal procedure. Now, I do not think anything is quite as much needed in this country as to have a code in such form that it can be used by the people throughout the country, and if the gentleman from Kansas can do this work for anything like the amount that is asked for here, he is to be congratulated and the country is to be congratulated. And if he can get a code so that the lawyers will not have to go through 37 great big volumes of the acts of all kinds, hunting up what the law is, he will have rendered the country a very great service and will be entitled to very great credit. And if he can accomplish this work between now and the beginning of the next session, I want to see that code denominated as the "Little Code." [Applause.]

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution and the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

SUBSTITUTE TELEPHONE OPERATOR.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the consideration of the following privileged resolution.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 547.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, during the remainder of the present fiscal year, compensation not exceeding the rate of $2.50 per diem for the services of a substitute telephone operator.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask that a letter from the Clerk of the House of Representatives, of an explanatory nature, be read.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. GARD. How many more of these resolutions will the gentleman have to-night?

Mr. IRELAND. Four or five, possibly.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
CLERK'S OFFICE,
Washington, D. C., May 4, 1920.

Hon. CLIFFORD IRELAND,
Chairman Committee on Accounts,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. IRELAND: By reason of an unusual amount of sickness during the present fiscal year of our regular force of telephone operators, the appropriation of $500 for the employment of a substitute operator is exhausted, and we have two months remaining of the fiscal year. For this period it is estimated that an amount not exceeding $150 will be necessary.

I inclose a draft of a resolution for the employment of such substitute at the usual rate of compensation, $2.50 per diem, until July 1, when the regular appropriation will become available, and would thank you to cause it to be considered by the Committee on Accounts.

Very truly, yours,

WM. TYLER PAGE.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman said he had four or five more of these resolutions?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman has not any peace resolutions, so called, among them, has he?

Mr. IRELAND. No.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

JOHN A. M'KENZIE.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 514.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided for by law, to John A. McKenzie, janitor and messenger in the rooms of the official stenographers to committees, additional compensation at the rate of $260 per annum, payable monthly.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this resolution is to equalize the salary of the messenger to the committee reporters with that of the messenger to the reporters of debates in the House. When the salaries of the reporters of debates and the stenographers to the committees were raised, the salary of the messenger to the reporters of debates was raised, but this messenger was overlooked. He has been an employee of the committee stenographers for over 20 years.

Mr. CALDWELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. CALDWELL. How many more resolutions have you before you come to the majority and minority clerks?

Mr. IRELAND. I do not think we have time to reach that to-night.

Mr. CALDWELL. If you have no time to reach that, I will make the point of no quorum.

Mr. IRELAND. I wish the gentleman would withhold that.

Mr. CALDWELL. I wish the gentleman would call it up as the next one.

Mr. IRELAND. I can not do that.

Mr. CALDWELL. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. IRELAND. I move a call of the House, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Obviously no quorum is present.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will open the doors.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ASSISTANT IN THE DOCUMENT ROOM.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks for the present consideration of the resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 508.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House, until otherwise provided by law, additional compensation at the rate of $180 per annum to one assistant now being paid $1,100 per annum in the House document room.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is to equalize the salaries of the employees in the House document room. No one seems to know exactly why, but there are 11 of them drawing $1,200 compensation, while one draws $920. This is to equalize the salaries of the men, all of whom are doing the same work.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the present consideration of another resolution which I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 492.

Resolved, That there shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House until otherwise provided by law compensation at the rate of $1,200 per annum for the service of a shipping clerk in the folding room of the House, such shipping clerk to be in lieu of a folder at the rate of $900 per annum.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this involves the expenditure of $300, the difference between $900 and $1,200—$900 being his present compensation. The necessity of a shipping clerk in the folding room is apparent to all who have had experience there, and that service has been performed for some years. The recipient of the additional salary has been in the employ of the House of Representatives since 1889, and performing the duties of a shipping clerk.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Will the man who gets this increase have the title of shipping clerk? Is he now employed in the document room?

Mr. IRELAND. Yes. He has been employed continuously since 1889.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend the remarks I made on the amendment here a while ago.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MILLER, for the day, on account of the funeral of a relative.

To Mr. SUMMERS of Washington (at the request of Mr. WEBSTER), for the day, on account of official business.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 43 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, May 20, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. KING. I ask that the resolution as amended may be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution as amended, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, is instructed to investigate forthwith and report to the Senate as soon as possible the campaign expenditures of the various presidential candidates in both parties, the names of the persons, firms, or corporations subscribing, the amount contributed, the method of expenditure of said sums, and all facts in relation thereto, not only as to the subscriptions of money and expenditures thereof, but as to the use of any other means or influence, including the promise or use of patronage and the providing of funds for setting up contesting delegations, and all other facts in relation thereto that would not only be of public interest but would aid the Congress in any necessary remedial legislation.

That said Committee on Privileges and Elections, or any subcommittee thereof, is hereby empowered to sit and act at such time and place as it may deem necessary; to require by subpœna, or otherwise, the attendance of witnesses, the production of books, papers, and documents; to employ stenographers at a cost of not exceeding $1 per printed page. The chairman of the committee or subcommittee, or any member thereof, may administer oaths to witnesses. Subpœnas for witnesses shall be issued under the signature of the chairman of the committee or subcommittee thereof. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, willfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States.

The expense thereof shall be paid from the contingent fund of the Senate on vouchers ordered by said committee, signed by the chairman thereof and approved by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word before the action is taken. The Federal Government has heretofore determined that it would enter the States and control to a greater or less degree the election machinery therein. A number of years ago the Force bill was a specter which haunted the States and threatened to place the control of their elections under Federal authority. A Federal marshal or Federal soldier at the polls was promised by that proposed legislation.

The States are regarded with so little importance by many people that they would deny them the power and the right to enact their own election laws and to control their own elections. Under the guise of protecting the purity of elections where the elections of Senators and Representatives are involved, statutes have been passed by Congress and the threat is made to extend the authority of the United States beyond present limitations. No doubt there have been some abuses in the States in connection with election matters and doubtless at times frauds have been perpetrated, but in my opinion the people can better control their local affairs, including elections, than can any Government functioning at Washington. The building up of a huge Federal electoral machine or some stupendous organization to control the votes of the people will not accomplish what is so vehemently claimed by many.

It is possible some candidates for the Presidency have expended large sums in their preconvention campaigns, but it is my opinion that the electors within the States will visit their displeasure upon those who have offended and public opinion will punish any who may be guilty. The people of the States are ready and willing to enact needed legislation to meet evils as they arise. We are too prone to fly to the Federal Government to cure some wrong which but recently has been brought to the attention of the people. We know that the States are constantly enacting statutes to correct evils. Public conscience quickly responds to rational and proper demands. The ethical and moral standard of the American people is high and they will not tolerate abuses which can be corrected by legislation. I shall not oppose this resolution, but I take this opportunity to express the thought that it is in line with the centralizing and consolidating tendencies of the hour and will be regarded as a precedent for further infringement upon the rights of the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

VALUE OF COTTON CONTRACTS.

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, I introduce a bill to amend subdivision 3 of section 5 of the United States cotton-futures act approved August 11, 1916. I ask that it be read and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

The bill (S. 4415) to amend subdivision 3 of section 5 of the United States cotton-futures act approved August 11, 1916, was read the first time by its title, the second time at length, and referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That subdivision 3 of section 5 of the United States cotton-futures act, approved August 11, 1916, be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Provided, That in the case of contracts made 30 days after the enactment of this amendatory act, in which the parties have not specified the basis grade, at least one-half of each lot of cotton tendered for delivery under such contract shall be of standard grade of middling or above and each hundred-bale lot tendered for delivery under such contract shall consist of not more than four different standard grades and not less than 25 bales of each such grade."

Mr. COMER. Mr. President, in offering the bill to amend the cotton-futures act making the delivery of a contract of 100 bales to be at least one-half middling and above and to require not less than 25 bales of each grade of cotton tendered to fill a contract, this amendment is intended to help the Smith-Lever bill of August 11, 1916, and the Smith-Lever amendment of March 4, 1919, to accomplish their purpose, namely, the stabilizing of the values of futures contract cotton basis middling on the value of spot cotton basis middling.

The benefits from this stabilization would be realized by every regular business in cotton, commencing at the producer, dealer, banker, manufacturer, consumer. Not only this amendment but all the laws on futures contracts are intended to correct the factitious movements in cotton prices prevailing on the exchanges. These oscillating prices are accomplished by assembling the tenderable grades in such arrangement as will least suit the buyer, and at differences factitious, slow, and uncertain of adjustment and productive of an unreliable market, all this making of the exchange market a gambling condition akin to that maintained by the Prince of Monaco. Cotton involving billions of dollars, associated with the direct interest and use of millions of people, deserves a better fate than to have its value shuttlecocked around.

The power within the law to destroy or even to divert temporarily the usufruct of the law of supply and demand is injurious to every legitimate business. This includes cotton handling, and any claim that such handling is beneficial to any cotton interest is without foundation and should by law be made impossible. This has been discussed on March 25 and 30, on April 1, 3, 17, 29, and 30, on May 8 and 12. I wish to call attention particularly to the discussion had on April 17 and May 12.

I have received resolutions adopted by the Alabama Bankers' Association, in convention assembled at Mobile, and also a communication from the president of the Pierce County Farmers' Union of Georgia, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

Resolution.

"Whereas a measure now pending in the United States Congress as an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill introduced by Senator B. B. COMER, of Alabama, provides that all deliveries of cotton on the exchanges shall contain 50 per cent of middling cotton or better and the balance, at the option of the seller, shall be of grades tenderable; and

"Whereas the banking interests of Alabama are largely dependent on the production and marketing of cotton affected by this legislation; and

"Whereas it is the judgment of the Alabama Bankers' Association, in convention assembled, that the adoption of this measure will cause exchange quotations to more nearly reflect the actual prices of cotton in the markets as governed by supply and demand: Be it

"Resolved by the Alabama Bankers' Association, That we hereby indorse the Comer amendment to Agricultural appropriation bill and urge the Alabama Members of Congress to aid in the passage of same as of benefit both to the producer and the consumer; be it further

"Resolved, That the secretary of this association be instructed to send a copy of these resolutions to each Member of Congress from Alabama."

BLACKSHEAR, GA., May 17, 1920.

Senator B. B. COMER.
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. COMER: As president of the Farmers' Union of Pierce County, Ga., I am writing you to inform you that the Farmers' Union of this county heartily indorses your cotton-exchange amendment, and we as a county union urge that you do all in your power to get this amendment through, as we believe it will be of great benefit to the mass of farmers.

Yours, very truly,

H. G. BOWEN,
President Pierce County Farmers' Union.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

Mr. OWEN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 369), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish the Senate with the following information:

First. Any and all facts, figures, data, or information now in possession of the Treasury Department relative to profiteering which would in any way enable Congress to deal with the matter either through the present proposed revenue legislation or through enactment of more effective criminal statutes. That such report shall contain a list of all corporations with the amount of their earnings which have earned in excess of 15 per cent on their capital stock, as shown by their returns to the Internal Revenue Bureau for the calendar year 1919, accompanied by such statement as will show net earnings of the same corporation for the calendar year 1918.

Second. The figures showing the amount of money which the Government has raised up to this time since the beginning of the war by taxation and the amount which it has raised by loans.

GOVERNMENT OF MEXICO.

Mr. KING submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 370), which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Whereas the people of Mexico have repudiated the government which for many years, and particularly during the German war, in disregard of the true interests and welfare of Mexico, pursued a policy which was incompatible with the national honor of Mexico, which made of Mexico a rock of offense in her international relations, and which was designed to thwart the unity of the States within the Pan American Union; and

Whereas the political integrity of Mexico and the liberty and welfare of the Mexican people can only be realized and maintained by a recognition of, and adherence to, those principles of public order, peace, justice, law, and morality which are acknowledged and enforced by all civilized and enlightened States: Therefore

Resolved, That the Senate express the hope that the people of Mexico will institute a new government which will bring internal peace, stimulate industry, secure the liberties and rights of the people, and promote the welfare of the country by a wise, just, and consistent policy; which will acknowledge and discharge the duties of Mexico under international law and the comity of nations, particularly for the protection of the lives, liberties, and rights of the nationals of other States within Mexico; which will open the way for cordial and amicable relations and commerce with the United States, and provide for the settlement of outstanding questions between the United States and Mexico.

MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that to-morrow morning, at the close of the morning business, I shall address the Senate on the pending live-stock legislation.

REMAINING BUSINESS OF THE SESSION.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, yesterday afternoon when the shipping bill was under consideration and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] was discussing the high cost of living on the shipping bill, he gave expression to this view:

I wish, however, to say in passing that I do not subscribe to the program of the steering committee. I do not recognize the right of any small assembly of men on either side of the Chamber, after bills have been reported from committees to the Senate, following full discussion and consideration, to say that such bills shall not be considered by the Senate except as they may say; and I serve notice—

And so forth.

The Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], responding to the same sentiment, said:

I realize, as the Senator does, that the endeavor may be in vain, just as he says the effort may be in vain in respect to the particular bill in which he is interested and in which all the country is interested as well; but I will make the motion, and I will ascertain exactly whether or not a bill of the character to which I have referred can come up before the Senate or whether it is to be relegated to the obscurity to which it has been condemned by the steering committee.

Mr. President, I think it quite proper at this time to call attention to the functions and the duties of the committee on order of business, not only that individual Senators may understand what that committee's work is but also that the country may understand that its function is to facilitate the enactment into legislation of all bills reported which receive a majority vote of the Senate and never to obstruct or delay the consideration of any bill whatsoever.

During the early days of a session there is no necessity whatever for a committee on order of business; any bill which has been reported from a committee can generally be brought up and immediate consideration secured for it; but toward the close of every session, and especially of short sessions and those sessions when we are looking for an adjournment or recess at some future day, the calendar is likely to become congested and Senators become desirous of knowing just when and the order in which they can bring up for consideration the bills in which they are interested. One of the purposes of the committee on order of business, which is generally called the steering committee, is to assist in securing at the earliest possible period consideration of all bills which have been reported from the committees of the Senate. More important, however, than that, their duty is to see to it that all appropriation bills shall be passed before the first day of the ensuing July.

There are a number of appropriation bills yet upon the calendar; there are a number now in conference. It has been hoped that we could adjourn this session about the 4th or 5th of June. The steering committee had not done very much at this session until it became apparent that it was desired to adjourn at a certain date, when it became especially essential that we should secure the enactment of the appropriation bills which are necessary for the support of the Government during the ensuing year.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from North Dakota if the work that should be done in the public interest is not completed, what reason is there for adjournment?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think there is good reason to act on all the bills that are reported as soon as we can; and if we can get through before the Republican convention and the Democratic convention, which may take much of the time from June 5 until July, we had better do so, even though we take only a recess and come back, but we should in the meantime have the appropriation bills disposed of.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from North Dakota is discussing the work of the steering committee. I should like to ask the Senator what program of business the steering committee has actually arranged for the remainder of the session, and whether a bill such as I referred to yesterday, which is known as the packer bill, is likely to have any consideration either now or at any future time at the hands of the steering committee?

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, that bill has been before the committee, as have a number of other bills. The only arrangement that the steering committee can make, as a rule, is in reference to the order in which bills shall be considered, and especially in reference to the appropriation bills. Some appropriation bills are now ready; some are not ready. There may be three or four upon the calendar at the same time, and Senators desire to know when they can have such bills taken up. For instance, the shipping bill is now the unfinished business, and every Senator must assume, now that that bill is the unfinished business, that it will be disposed of.

Mr. KENYON. Yes; but the shipping bill was reported, as I understand, on the 4th of May. How does it happen that the shipping bill has been brought up so quickly, while other bills have not been?

Mr. McCUMBER. That is because the Senator in charge of the shipping bill was alert and upon the job and moved to take it up.

Mr. KENYON. That was the reason for it being taken up?

Mr. McCUMBER. That was the reason.

Mr. KENYON. Did the steering committee have anything to do with it?

Mr. McCUMBER. The steering committee had nothing to do as to fixing the order in which that bill should come up.

Mr. KENYON. Did not the steering committee assign that bill a place?

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the steering committee did not assign it a place. The Senator from Washington gave notice that he would bring it up, and the steering committee made no objection to his bringing it up at the time when he said he would bring it up.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from North Dakota, then, says that the steering committee had nothing to do with giving the shipping bill any preference or any place?

Mr. McCUMBER. The steering committee had nothing to do with giving the shipping bill the right of way over other bills in any order whatever. We had not considered the order in which bills should be taken up until there seemed to be a conflict between the Senators themselves as to when they should move to take them up.

However, I was about to explain to the Senator from Iowa that we now have under consideration the shipping bill, which is the unfinished business. Then, there is the Army appropriation bill, which should be taken up; there is the pension appropriation bill; the sundry civil appropriation bill, and the legislative appropriation bill. Some of the appropriation bills are still in conference, and those bills, of course, have not been finally passed.

Mr. KENYON. The legislative bill has been passed.

Mr. McCUMBER. The legislative bill was vetoed and must necessarily go back to the President after it has been passed again by the two Houses of Congress.

Mr. KENYON. That bill was passed on yesterday, I think.

Mr. SMOOT. It was passed on yesterday.

Mr. McCUMBER. It had not passed at the time we had the meeting of the steering committee.

Mr. KENYON. Now, as I understand, it is arranged that the bills are to come up in the order named by the Senator?

Mr. McCUMBER. Not necessarily; but we hope they will come up in the order I have indicated.

I was going to explain to the Senator that we ought to get the appropriation bills through, whether we do any other business or not. We have got to pay the bills of the Government. I was here yesterday and the day before yesterday, expecting to get up the pension appropriation bill. I was waiting until the Senator from Washington should get through with the shipping bill. I found that the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] was also waiting at the same time to move to take up the Army appropriation bill. I desired also to take up the special omnibus pension bill, many of the pension bills which it embraces having been on the calendar since last September and waiting until we disposed of the Fuller bill. The idea was to take only certain of the bills which had been favorably reported, combine them in a special omnibus bill, and ask the consideration of the Senate for that bill. I was waiting to get that bill through. Other Senators were waiting to move the consideration of bills in which they were interested.

The Senator from Iowa wrote a letter to the steering committee requesting the consideration of two bills. I think there is no question that one of them would be considered undoubtedly right away, and I think the Senator was notified to that effect. I did not notify him, but I understood that he had information that we would take up his bill, known as the women's bill, as soon as we could get through with the appropriation bills.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Now, let me explain so that we will understand just what we are attempting to do.

Mr. KENYON. I think we would like to have that done.

Mr. McCUMBER. We want to get through all of the bills that we possibly can in a given time. If we adjourn or take a recess, I hope we will be able to dispose of every bill upon the calendar; but I want the Senator to remember one thing, and that is that the purpose of the steering committee is only to facilitate the consideration of bills and never to delay the consideration of any bill. The moment a bill is reported to the Senate it has a right to be heard by the Senate and voted upon. The steering committee does not consider the merits of a bill, only to the extent that when we are nearing the end of a session it must recommend that the appropriation bills have the right of way in order that they all may be passed before the 1st of July.

There is the Spanish War pension bill, which I hope will be brought up; there is the omnibus pension bill, which I have been trying to get up for some time, but which I deferred so that we might first dispose of the appropriation bills.

It has been also hoped, Mr. President, and suggested to Senators that ordinarily we occupy the time after 2 o'clock in the discussion and consideration of the appropriation bills; that we should try, without respect to the order in which they might be considered, to bring up other bills during the morning hour after the close of the routine morning business. We believe that such a course will facilitate the passage of the bills and clear up the calendar in the shortest possible time.

Mr. NORRIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to say to the Senator that I am in entire sympathy with him in regard to the appropriation bills. I believe that we really ought to have a rule that would give them the right of way as a matter of right; but we have been considering for quite a number of days the shipping bill, which is not an appropriation bill, when a number of appropriation bills and conference reports are waiting to be taken up. It seems to me that situation ought to be rectified.

Mr. McCUMBER. The reason that that bill has the right of way to-day is because the Senator from Washington moved its consideration and because evidently a majority of the Senators thought it was of sufficient importance to justify its consideration at this time, and it was believed that it would not seriously interfere with the appropriation bills.

Mr. NORRIS. Has it not already been demonstrated that it has seriously interfered with the appropriation bills?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes; it has.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, if we are going to rely on a program, which I think is reasonable, that appropriation bills shall have the right of way, we should call up one now and lay the unfinished business aside until the appropriation bills are disposed of.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will tell the Senator a better way, and that is to confine our arguments to the bill under consideration. The very Senator who arraigns the steering committee spent two hours yesterday in discussing a matter that had not the slightest relation to the shipping bill. It was a proper question to discuss; his speech was a splendid presentation of matters that ought to be known to the American people; we can not complain of that; but it was not germane to the subject, and I dare say that less than one-third of the time that the shipping bill has been before the Senate has been devoted to the consideration of that bill. The Senator from Washington has had to sit here hour after hour and day after day waiting for some Senator to get through with some argument upon the League of Nations, a subject which has passed out of existence some time ago so far as the Senate is concerned, or upon some other subject about which he thinks it important that the American people should be informed. I say that if we had put such matters aside for a little while and considered only the business before the Senate we would have disposed of the shipping bill a week or two ago.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, what the Senator says is true; and yet he recognizes, and the steering committee ought to recognize, that under the rules of the Senate the very practice of which he is complaining is perfectly legitimate. The question of changing the rules of the Senate may be involved; but the steering committee, it seems to me, ought to recognize what the rules are. If they are not right, then let us change them; but we have them as now formulated, and if we want to consider appropriation bills first, then, it seems to me, when there is an appropriation bill ready we ought to consider it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, whether the rule is right or wrong raises a great many questions. It is rather difficult to determine at all times what remarks are pertinent to a particular question under discussion. On the whole, I think it is safer to leave it to the good faith and judgment of the individual Senators whether or not they will confine their remarks to the particular subject under consideration.

But, Mr. President, I want to say that I think it comes with ill grace from Senators who have been touring the country for six months and who have not been in the Senate one day in twenty during the last six months to criticize the steering committee because of its efforts to get Senators together and consider and agree what they would take up first and dispose of, to the end that we may get through at least with the appropriation bills.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know whether the Senator is referring to me or not.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not.

Mr. KENYON. I have been in the Senate fully as much as the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. There are other Senators who criticized the committee yesterday. I have read already the criticism of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]; and I am not criticizing the Senator if he believes that the interests of the country demand his nomination as candidate for President on the Republican ticket, and is therefore absent from the Senate during the six months that he is campaigning for that important office. What I complain of is that he comes back after the end of six months, and then criticizes those who have stayed here and been at their work day after day, attempting to get through with the Senate's business, because some bill in which he may have an interest has not been brought up and passed before this time.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. KENYON. The bill to which the Senator from California referred is a bill known as the Nolan-Johnson minimum-wage bill. That was reported from the Committee on Education and Labor a long time ago. I think the Senator from California did not feel himself charged with getting the bill up on the floor. The chairman of the Committee on Education and Labor tried to do that a number of times and requested members of the steering committee to give it a place on the program. The Senator from California, as I understand, was not criticizing the steering committee for failure in its work, but he was criticizing them for what he believes is an untimely burial of that bill.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me a moment——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. LODGE. The minimum-wage bill, within my knowledge, has never been mentioned to the steering committee.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator said that yesterday. I say it has. I mentioned it myself to members of the committee.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator may know what has transpired better than I do.

Mr. KENYON. I know what I said.

Mr. LODGE. I only know what occurred at the meetings when I was present.

Mr. KENYON. I know what I said to members of the committee better than the Senator from Massachusetts knows what I said. It was not presented to the committee personally, but it was presented, by letter of May 6, to the chairman of the committee. Here is the letter. Now, why does the Senator say it has not been mentioned?

Mr. LODGE. Because it has not been mentioned in the committee in my presence. That is why I say it.

Mr. KENYON. The Senator may not have been present at all times.

Mr. LODGE. I have not been present at all times.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, one thing is certain—it has not been considered by the committee.

Mr. KENYON. No; that is what the Senator from California is complaining of.

Mr. McCUMBER. Suppose that it has not. There are perhaps 100 bills on the calendar that have been reported that have not been considered by that committee at all.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question for information?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. NELSON. After a bill has been reported from a committee and placed on the calendar, can not any Senator who is interested in it, after the morning business is closed and before the time set for any business that is on the calendar to be laid before the Senate, make a motion to take it up?

Mr. McCUMBER. Why, certainly, if he is in the Senate; but, of course, he can not do so if he is out over the country.

Mr. NELSON. Could not the Senator from Iowa have made a motion at any time during almost any morning hour to take up his bill if he had had enough votes to take it up?

Mr. McCUMBER. Any Senator can move to take up any bill at any time. The only purpose of the steering committee is, as I have tried to make clear, when we get in a congested state, and we have appropriation bills undisposed of, to see that they get through within the proper time; and when we hurry them along we are opening the gate wider for the consideration of any other bill that is before the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. The packer bill, as stated several times by the Senator's colleague [Mr. GRONNA], could not have been taken up and disposed of during the morning hour.

Mr. McCUMBER. It could if there were enough votes to take it up.

Mr. KENYON. But, I say, it could not have been disposed of. It was a bill which it was known would bring about a great deal of discussion, and the object was to bring it up when it could be made the unfinished business. The motion could have been made, but it is well understood—there is not any use of camouflaging about that—that the bill that gets the right of way from the steering committee is the bill that will be taken up. That is why we have asked that that be done. We proceeded with the usual course of asking the steering committee to give that bill a place. If that is not effective, we will try some other method.

Mr. McCUMBER. I may have asked the steering committee to give a place to my pension bill. They have not given a place to it. I have just as much right to ask it as any other Senator. Their attention is given to other bills. I can bring that up, if I have enough votes to bring it up, at any time. The Senator can do the same with any bill that he has before the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. All I say is that we deferred to the well-recognized custom here, as I have understood, of going to the steering committee. That is all we did, and we met this result. Now, of course, we can move to take it up—we know that—and we will move to take it up at every opportunity.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator says—

Whether it is to be relegated to the obscurity to which it has been condemned by the steering committee,

The steering committee condemns no bill to obscurity.

Mr. KENYON. I did not say that.

Mr. McCUMBER. I say, this was one of the Senators speaking on this subject yesterday—the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON]. The steering committee condemns no bill to obscurity. It recognizes the right of the Senate to pass judgment on every bill that has been reported favorably from a committee, but it ought to assist Senators in having an agreement as between themselves on the order in which the appropriation bills and any conference reports connected with them may be considered. That is practically all that the committee on order of business has done in this case.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the Senate. I regret that the Senator from Iowa, whose bills, I think, have had as fair consideration as those of any other Senator in the Chamber, should see fit at this time to threaten to punish the Senate if he does not succeed in getting a majority to take up any bill which he may have, and to undertake to keep it here all summer.

Mr. KENYON. I have not threatened to punish the Senate. Where is there any threat to punish the Senate? I am insisting that the business of the Senate be done; that is all.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, when I read the statements made by the Senator from Iowa yesterday, and the Senator from California yesterday, I can not see anything but a covert threat in their statements and in the suggestion of the Senator this morning, first, that he would move to take up the bill to which he refers, and, second, that he saw no reason why we should adjourn.

Mr. KENYON. Does the Senator object to our moving to take it up?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly I do not object.

Mr. KENYON. That is all I say. We will move to take it up, and keep on moving to take it up and trying to secure its consideration.

Mr. McCUMBER. I hope, however, that the Senator will not do that at the expense of getting through with the appropriation bills before June 5.

Mr. KENYON. The appropriation bills should be finished before the close of the fiscal year, of course; but I see no reason——

Mr. McCUMBER. I say, before June 5. I hope we will get through with them by that time.

Mr. KENYON. I hope we can get through with everything by June 5; but if there is business on the calendar that concerns the public that we can not get through by June 5, then I think we should come back and finish the calendar.

Mr. McCUMBER. Well, let us try to get it through by June 5, if it is possible to do so, and allow Congress to adjourn. Now, I appreciate the fact—referring again not to the Senator from Iowa but to another Senator who criticized the steering committee—that when a Senator has been away from the Senate for six months, and comes back at the end of the six months, when the others are tired out, he is rested and prepared to stay and fight another six months, and especially after the convention is over, when he will have plenty of time to concentrate his mind upon the business of the Senate; but I think he should give consideration to the feelings of those who have been here at work during his absence.

ARMY REORGANIZATION—CONFERENCE REPORT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives insisting upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, and requesting a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, from the committee of conference representing the Senate I submit the report on House bill 12775, and I desire to make a statement in connection with it.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12775) to amend an act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provision for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to reach an agreement thereon.

C. S. THOMAS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
JULIUS KAHN,
D. R. ANTHONY, Jr.,
JOHN C. McKENZIE,
S. H. DENT, Jr.,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, in view of the report which I have just submitted in connection with the Army reorganization bill, I think it is my duty to inform the Senate of the situation.

Senators will remember the passage of the Army reorganization bill through the Senate and will remember some of its salient features. The conferees have been sitting something over four weeks. During that time, Mr. President, certain tentative agreements have been reached by the conferees, and I think I ought to state what they are.

The bill as passed by the House and the bill as passed by the Senate, in so far as they affect a reorganization of the Regular Army alone, are not diametrically opposed. There were several differences in the provisions, and the conferees set to work to compose those differences in the first instance before approaching a solution of some of the fundamentals which characterize the respective bills.

The conferees have reached a tentative agreement, for example, relating to the functions of the General Staff and the eligibility of officers for service upon the General Staff. The conferees have likewise reached a tentative agreement on the single list for promotion in the Regular Army. Also upon the classification and elimination of Regular Army officers in their respective grades. Also as to the term of enlistment for the enlisted men of the Regular Army and their pay in all the grades of the enlisted personnel. Also upon the method of filling vacancies in the commissioned personnel of the Regular Army; for example, those provisions of the legislation which provide that at least 50 per cent of the vacancies created by the act shall be filled by the appointment into the Regular Army of emergency officers who saw service during the recent war.

The medical service of the Army, including the Medical Corps, the Dental Corps, and the Veterinary Corps, and the Medical Administration Corps, has also been tentatively agreed upon.

The treatment of chaplains has been tentatively agreed upon, and other smaller matters have been agreed upon in the conference.

The question then arose, Mr. President, as to whether or not that feature of the Army bill as passed by the Senate which attempts to establish one Army for the United States, organized under the Army clause of the Constitution, should prevail or should be abandoned completely. After much discussion the Senate conferees finally agreed to permit the several States of the Union to decide for themselves whether the National Guard of those States should be organized under the Army clause of the Constitution or remain as they are to-day, organized under the militia clause. Specific provisions were offered by the Senate conferees making it perfectly plain that each State should exercise an option, that no degree of compulsion whatsoever should be attempted by the Federal Government or the Congress upon the right of the State to decide whether its National Guard should remain as it is to-day, with complete Federal aid and recognition under the militia clause of the Constitution, or should come in under the Army clause in accordance with the provisions laid down in the bill as passed by the Senate.

In addition to making that offer, Mr. President, the Senate conferees offered to take the national-defense act as the basis of the legislation, figuratively speaking to throw the Senate bill out of the window as a piece of legislation, give it up completely, and take the national-defense act, which was used by the House in drafting its bill, as the basis for the new legislation.

In addition to that, Mr. President, the Senate conferees offered to the House conferees to permit the House conferees to complete the reorganization of the Regular Army as they chose, and there are still several most important things to be decided in that regard, notably the organization of the Quartermaster Department, the question of a separate construction division, the question of a separate transportation division, the size of the Regular Army, the distribution of its personnel among the different branches and services. All these things the Senate conferees offered the House conferees to settle as they saw fit if the House conferees would consent to permit the States to exercise their untrammeled option on that matter of the organization of the National Guard under the Army clause or under the militia clause.

The House conferees, Mr. President, were not in a position to accept that by a majority vote of their committee. So the matter was reported as disagreed to, and it was presented to the House upon yesterday, upon which occasion the chairman of the House committee, Mr. KAHN, and Mr. MCKENZIE, another member of the House committee, attempted to persuade the House of Representatives to accept this compromise, a compromise, Mr. President, which I venture to assert, without fear of successful contradiction, means that the Senate conferees offered to surrender four-fifths of their contentions.

I omitted to state that in addition to the offer of the Senate which I have described, the Senate conferees offered to give up the provision for voluntary military training. That, too, was to be eliminated as a part of the compromise. And upon yesterday, greatly to the regret of the Senate conferees, who have worked so hard over this matter for 10 months, the House, by a vote of 2 to 1, declined to accept the compromise which I have outlined in this brief and somewhat sketchy manner.

Of course, Mr. President, it is not proper for me or any Senator to criticize the other body, and I shall not do so upon this occasion; that is far from my thought. Every man is entitled to his convictions; every man is entitled to vote in accordance with his convictions. But during all this long discussion, Mr. President, in and out of the conference, the Senate conferees have encountered opposition from the outside of the Congress, which I think it is entirely proper for me to describe. There is a certain group of adjutants general of the several States, who are so tenacious of their prerogatives in commanding the guard in their respective States that they are not even willing to let the legislatures of their States decide whether the guard should be organized under the Army clause or remain under the militia clause.

Through the influence of those adjutants general, who to my positive knowledge for five or six years have been the principal stumbling block placed in the path of progressive, sane, national military legislation through the influence of those adjutants general, it has become exceedingly difficult for the Congress to enact laws enabling the citizen soldiers of the Republic to organize and train themselves on a uniform, sound, military basis, and thus fit themselves to defend their country in time of war.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think it is appropriate to add just here to the very forcible statement of the Senator from New York that the adjutants general of the country, for the most part, with here and there an honorable exception, constitute a political association, and it is the political influence and power which they exercise which makes it possible for them to dictate to the House of Representatives its course regarding this proposed legislation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I would not complain of this situation were it not for the fact that the bill as passed by the Senate absolutely assures to the several States the control of these troops within their respective borders, and absolutely insures to the States the control of the commissioned personnel of the guard, even though it is organized under the Army clause, for it specifically provides that no man may be an officer in the National Guard of any State without the recommendation of the governor; and it also provides, Mr. President, that under the direct order of the governor the troops shall be at the disposal and for the use of the State for any internal purpose. Even with these safeguards, Mr. President, in behalf of the States, protecting them from exploitation by the Regular Army; even with the safeguards put in the bill to the effect that regulations governing the new National Guard shall be drawn up upon the recommendation of a committee of officers the majority of whom shall be guard officers—in spite of these safeguards, Mr. President, these gentlemen refuse to permit their several States to decide the matter for themselves by legislative enactment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York further yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that the Senator should also emphasize the fact that the proposed plan of organization reported in the Senate bill has behind it the sanction of those members of the National Guard who saw active service in the recent war.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has, and this provision in the bill came from the American Legion. The assertion has been made that this is the culmination of a three years' conspiracy on the part of the General Staff to ruin the National Guard. Such an assertion is not true. The General Staff had nothing whatsoever to do with the drafting of this provision. The Chief of Staff had nothing whatsoever to do with it, nor the Secretary of War. None of them knew anything about it until the bill was printed. The suggestions came from citizen officers, and a majority of the committee of the American Legion, that was sent to Washington and spent days and days with the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in helping to draft this legislation, was composed of National Guard officers.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I merely wish to remind the Senator that it is far from being true that the General Staff had anything to do with the framing of the bill; that the General Staff bill which was sent to the committee was absolutely set aside.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was set aside and, worse than that, put into the wastebasket.

I do not want to take the time of the Senate on this matter. It is one on which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. SUTHERLAND], and many other Senators have been working for many, many months.

I think it is the duty of the Senate conferees to do their best to represent the sentiment of the Senate. I have entertained the idea that the two Houses are of equal power in the matter of legislation.

I therefore ask for the adoption of the conference report, and I shall then move that the Senate insist on its amendments and that the Chair appoint conferees upon the part of the Senate at the further conference.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understood that the conference report would not create any discussion, but that the bill would go back to conference without delay. I do not feel that I can consent to take up matters that are likely to create extensive discussion. Unless I can have some assurance that it will go to conference without any further considerable discussion I shall object to the consideration of the conference report at this time.

Mr. McKELLAR. I wish to make a very short statement before action is taken, and it will be very short. I do not see any reason for taking any length of time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. First permit the Chair to state to the Senator from Tennessee that the question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course; I understand that. There is no mistake in my mind about that, but I have a right to say something about whether we shall agree to the conference report.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The question I raise is whether I shall give my consent to the consideration of the report. I know that I can not object to the presentation of it, but the consideration of it is another matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. I will say to the Senator that it will take only a short time for me to say what I wish to say about it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. But I have no doubt it will invite discussion from others. I should like to say that I think I have been very fair. I am not desirous of scolding anybody, and I am not complaining of the discussion, but I was in hopes that we could get the shipping bill through and out of the way to-day.

There is now pending to the shipping bill the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who has to leave the Senate a little before 1 o'clock. I was hopeful that we might take a vote on that amendment, anyway, to accommodate him, and then I would not insist on further action until the conference report had been disposed of.

Mr. McKELLAR. In view of the statement made by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I desire to make a brief statement showing an opposite view. Of course, I am willing to yield to the Senator from Washington. So far as I am concerned, I can make my statement later in the day, but I should like to make it to-day, if I can have opportunity to do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think if we could accommodate the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Tennessee would then have an opportunity to make his statement.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not want the conference report to be adopted before I have had an opportunity to make a short statement on it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all right. I merely made the suggestion. I do not know whether we can reach a vote on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin before 1 o'clock or not. I do not know whether anyone desires to discuss that particular amendment, which is to strike out the first paragraph of section 25.

Mr. RANSDELL. I wish to discuss it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has just informed me that he will not ask the Senate to take up his amendment at this time. Therefore the Senator from Tennessee may, so far as I am concerned, proceed.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I have very little to say on the conference report, except that I am in entire sympathy with the attitude of the House in reference to the matter. I think it would be a ruinous policy for the Government to have a biarrangement of this kind, a National Guard that is Federal and a National Guard that is State, the two at loggerheads, the one looked after by the Federal authorities, and especially with the General Staff in charge, the other left an orphan. I do not think that this is fair treatment for the National Guards of the 48 States.

I believe thoroughly in the National Guards as now organized and as we have had them organized since 1916. They have been a great credit to this country. Over 100,000 of them went to the Mexican border, and over 350,000 of them went into the German war and acquitted themselves with the highest distinction and the highest honors. Nothing can be said against their record. Why should they be abolished? I do not think they ought to be abolished, and I am delighted to know that the representatives of the States feel enough interest in their own States to want the National Guard system retained, the National Guard system that has been a part of the military system ever since the foundation of this Republic. It ought not to be abolished at this late day. It has done well in every war.

I think the idea of changing the system and adopting a Federal system pure and simple, as the bill as passed by the Senate proposes to do, is ruinous in policy, is wrong in principle, is not in accord with our institutions, and ought not to be adopted. I do not know of any vote that has occurred in the House of Representatives—certainly since I left there—that I have taken more pride in than I have in the vote on yesterday, where, by practically a two-to-one vote, the House of Representatives stood by the National Guard of this country.

I hope the Senate upon mature reflection will recede from the position that it has heretofore taken on the question. I think we ought to recede. I think we ought to stand by our States. I think we ought to stand by the National Guards of the various States. I believe it is a better method of defense for our country.

I am not going into personalities and talk about the adjutants general of the various States and their influence upon legislation. There is no Senator in this body who does not know that, when it comes to influencing legislation, the adjutants general of the various States are pigmies in comparison with the other interests that have been influencing this legislation.

We ought to instruct our conferees to agree to the views of the House on this subject. All Senators are familiar with it. It is not necessary for me to go into it. The real question is whether we are going to have a Prussianized military system in this country or whether we are going to have the military system of the fathers of the Republic and of all the days of the Republic, which has never known defeat. The question is, when you boil it down, whether you are going to accept the German military system that we defeated in the late war or whether you are going to stand by your own. I for one am going to stand by the American system, if I am the only Senator who does so.

If we are ready to have a vote, Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Tennessee make clear the distinction between the two provisions in controversy?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] has very well explained that situation. One is that the proposed National Guard shall be a Federal National Guard under the control of the Regular Army and to be loaned to the States or the States permitted to use them when they are not otherwise in use by the Federal Government. The other is the present National Guard.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will pardon me, I understood the Senator from New York to say that in every instance the status of the State organization was to be determined by the legislatures of the respective States. If that is the fact I can not concur in the conclusion which the Senator from Tennessee has expressed. That is the reason why I ask him to make clear his distinction between the two provisions. So long as the legislatures of the respective States determine the status of their so-called military organizations, whether you denominate them militia or National Guard, I can not see that the remarks of the Senator from Tennessee, to the effect that the bill as passed by the Senate Prussianizes the organizations, are applicable.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is entirely the way you look at it in a question of this kind. The National Guard hereafter will be under the control of the Regular Army, and as it is now it is under the control of the various States primarily.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. I have listened to this debate without saying anything. I have heard the Senator reiterate that statement. As I understand it, it is to be left to the States to decide absolutely whether the National Guard will come under the law relating to the National Guard or not, and no State need come under it if it does not want to do so.

Mr. McKELLAR. Let us assume that that is true, as it probably is. We will have a part of the States with a national system and a part with a State system. Who wants that in this country? The National Guard of New York will probably accept the Federal system. Then there will be other States that will not. We will have a National Guard that is a Federal National Guard, and a National Guard that is a State National Guard, and we will be in confusion all the time.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, his proposition is that no State that wants to come under the Federal law shall be permitted to do it because it interferes with the comfort and well-being of certain adjutants general of other States.

Mr. McKELLAR. Oh, no; the Senator from Massachusetts is wholly mistaken. My position is that we now have, under the act of June 3, 1916, as I recall the date, a National Guard law under which the country has performed the greatest military service in all history, that it was largely done by the National Guard under that law, and that we ought to leave it as it is.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. THOMAS. Is not the Senator aware of the fact that the vast bulk of the soldiers and officers, whom he justly eulogizes, are emphatically and enthusiastically in favor of the Senate proposal?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not so understand it. It is my information——

Mr. THOMAS. Then the subcommittee has been grossly deceived.

Mr. McKELLAR. No; I do not know about that. There are some on either side of the question. I understand that the National Guard of New York especially is very strong for it. We will have a very large body of soldiers in that State. But I do say this, that some of the most prominent of the national guardsmen in this country, including, I believe, one of the chiefs of its organization, Mr. Bennett C. Clark, whom we all know, are very much opposed to the system.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. McKELLAR. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The Senator speaks of the organization of the National Guard under the act of 1916. The Senator has not forgotten that the National Guard under the act of 1916 was authorized to be drafted into the Regular Army and became a part of it as soon as we got into the war?

Mr. McKELLAR. Of couse I have not forgotten it. I think it is a very wise provision and should remain in the law. I believe that law is probably as good a law in reference to the subject of the National Guard as can possibly be enacted. I am satisfied with it and desire to vote to leave the enactment as it is upon this question.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If there be no further discussion, I will not object to proceeding to vote upon the conference report.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, every Senator knows that it is a physical impossibility for all of us to follow in detail every matter of legislation, even though it be of great importance. I have no desire to delay the pending matter, but I should like to vote intelligently upon the proposition. I am not fully informed regarding it. My time has been so taken up with other matters that I have not followed the action of the two Houses with reference to the subject now in dispute; but I was particularly struck with the question which was propounded by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. It applies to my situation exactly. Neither the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], so far as I know, nor any other Senator has answered the question. It may be that all other Senators are fully informed as to the questions embraced in the conference report; but I confess I am not, and I should like to make an inquiry with reference to it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to say to the Senator that if he thinks this subject ought to be discussed further, should like to have it discussed further, I shall object to its consideration at this time. Then it may come up later.

Mr. NORRIS. I dislike to have the Senator do that, and still I do not desire to walk into the booth blindly and vote on something that I feel I am not qualified to pass upon because of the lack of information.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I can inform the Senator——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. President.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator has the right to object, I suppose, under the parliamentary situation; but I wish to ask some questions in reference to the pending matter, and I should like to hear it discussed a little further. I am proceeding solely with the idea of securing information and nothing else.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oregon rises to a parliamentary inquiry, which he will state.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to know on what question we are about to vote. We are not about to vote on the particular provision of the bill which Senators have been discussing, but, as I understand, we are simply to vote on whether the Senate shall insist on its amendments and rerefer the matter to the committee of conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The question is on again committing the matter to the conference committee.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to know on what question we are about to vote.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is the parliamentary situation, I do not know that I care particularly to pursue the matter.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I entered the Chamber a little late. Then it is not a question of instructing the committee?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I have no objection.

Mr. MCKELLAR. And I withdraw my request for a yea-and-nay vote.

Mr. NORRIS. I have no objection to the matter going back to conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. NORRIS. Is it a report of disagreement?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is a report of disagreement.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is a report of disagreement.

Mr. NORRIS. Then I have no objection to its being agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. SUTHERLAND, Mr. NEW, Mr. CHAMBERLAIN, and Mr. THOMAS conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I merely wish to renew the appeal which I made a while ago, that we proceed with the consideration of the shipping bill. I am not scolding Senators, but I do hope that we may proceed with the consideration of that bill, so that we may pass it to-day, and that other matters which Senators think should be discussed may be postponed until later.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The proposed amendment is to strike out the first paragraph of section 25 as reported by the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] stated only a moment ago that he desired to discuss this proposition, but he is not now present, and I do not know whether he is in the cloakroom.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Louisiana was called out of the Chamber for a moment, and if the Senator from Washington will permit, I will send for him and request that he return at once.

Mr. SMOOT. I will take a few moments of the time of the Senate until the Senator from Louisiana returns.

Mr. RANSDELL entered the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Louisiana is now present.

Mr. SMOOT. With the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, I will occupy the attention of the Senate for a moment.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well.

CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I have been waiting patiently for the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to enter the Chamber and call the attention of the country to the wicked collection and expenditure of money for campaign purposes, as he did here a few days ago when there was an article written by a certain Mr. Brown referring to the Republican candidates for the nomination for the Presidency. I have before me the Washington Times of last evening, and, fearful lest the Senator from Montana has overlooked it, and well knowing his interest in this particular subject, I think perhaps it will be proper for me at this time, in the absence of that Senator, to call the attention of the Senate to the article. It reads:

"$5,000,000 FUND BEING RAISED TO BACK MCADOO—'BIG BUSINESS' HAS CANDIDATE—MONEYED INTERESTS BEHIND WILSON'S SON-IN-LAW, SAYS EDWARDS'S MANAGER—PLACE HOLDERS ENLISTED—DODGE, MORGENTHAU, CRANE, HURLEY, AND BARUCH GIVE ACTIVE SUPPORT.

"NEW YORK, May 19.

"'A "big business" syndicate has been formed to underwrite William G. McAdoo's presidential campaign. At least $5,000,000 has been collected or pledged.'

"This allegation was made last night by one of the most influential of Gov. Edwards's campaign managers.

"BARUCH AMONG BACKERS.

"Pioneers in the movement to finance the preconvention expenses of President Wilson's son-in-law, as named by the Edwards manager, are Bernard M. Baruch, Thomas L. Chadbourne, Cleveland H. Dodge, and Henry Morgenthau, of New York, and Charles R. Crane and Edward M. Hurley, of Illinois.

"Appointees of McAdoo as Secretary of the Treasury or Director General of Railroads are said to have been enlisted to aid him.

"Appointees of Hurley while chairman of the United States Shipping Board are also on the list of McAdoo workers.

"'When the agreement was made between managers for Gov. Cox, of Ohio, and Gov. Edwards, of New Jersey, to make common cause against Wilson for a third term or McAdoo as his heir, we satisfied ourselves that a great fund was being raised to put over either Wilson or McAdoo.

"'Barney Baruch began the McAdoo finance project immediately after the President physically collapsed last August. Thomas L. Chadbourne soon joined Baruch. Within a few months Celveland H. Dodge, the most generous contributor to the Wilson campaign funds of 1912 and 1916, associated himself with Baruch and Chadbourne.

"'Henry Morgenthau waited until he assured himself that the President might not run again. Then Charles R. Crane and Edward M. Hurley came in. All these men are multimillionaires.

"COMBS FOUND EVIDENCE.

"'Former National Chairman William F. Combs, during his recent western tour, found plenty of evidence of how the pro-McAdoo clique was working to secretly pledge national delegates to the President's son-in-law. Its members advised McAdoo to keep out of the primaries, as did President Wilson himself—even out of his home (New Jersey) primaries. They knew neither could carry these primaries.

"'These financiers count on Federal patronage and loyalty to the administration to put McAdoo over.

"'Attorney General Palmer, who is all but "done" as a rival to McAdoo, has promised to throw his following to him. Vance McCormick, member of the war board and former national chairman, is also a party to the compact.

"'The battle for the presidential nomination is this minute between the Wilson-McAdoo and the Cox-Edwards wings of the party. William J. Bryan may be a determining factor, as he was when at the last moment in 1912 he swung his followers to Wilson.'"

I do not desire to take the time of the Senate to discuss the question, but I thought perhaps the article which I have read ought to be made public through the same medium as that employed by the Senator from Montana some days ago when he made an announcement in relation to a similar subject.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator from Utah has brought this subject to the attention of the Senate, because if it be true it is subject to the condemnation of the Senator from Montana. I do not know whether it is true or not.

Mr. SMOOT. I hope the Senator from Colorado will not say that I think it is true.

Mr. THOMAS. I have not and will not say so. I do say, however, deliberately and unequivocally, that one of the men implicated in this telegram has not expended a dollar nor contributed a cent and has neither secured nor aided in securing contributions from anyone else in furtherance of the candidacy of Mr. McAdoo.

Immediately after this subject was brought to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Montana, I received a letter from Mr. B. M. Baruch, whose attention had been directed to it. He authorized me to make this statement, and my acquaintance with Mr. Baruch justifies my confidence in his veracity.

I have no doubt that when the campaign opens, if Mr. Baruch is called upon for a contribution, he will make it; I have no doubt that contributions of reasonable amount by advocates of the Democratic and Republican candidates will be made. They will be perfectly proper and legitimate; and I incline to the belief that much of the discussion and gossip that we have encountered regarding the existence of enormous preconvention funds for this, that, and the other candidate are exaggerations. There is no question that this campaign, once it has been entered upon, will be prolific in money spending, and the political pot, as usual, will call the political kettle black, but the party which spends the least will do so because, unfortunately, it can not obtain more. That is the history of American politics; but I take this occasion to make this statement regarding one of the implicated parties, and I am satisfied—indeed, I am willing to stake my own reputation upon the truth of his assurance.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to say that the article does not say that the money has been paid, but that it has either been paid or pledged.

Mr. THOMAS. But it does say that immediately after the President was seemingly eliminated by his illness from the contest this organization was made and financing of it began, and that is not true of Mr. Baruch.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the article so states.

BONUS TO VETERANS OF WORLD WAR.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, while I have the floor I ask to insert in the RECORD a letter of the Secretary of the Treasury to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House relating to the proposed bonus to the soldiers. In these days of financial debauchery the note which the Secretary sounds is so sane and reassuring that I am satisfied it will prove a valuable contribution to the literature of the day. I hope that all will heed it, to the end that any new taxes which are to be raised will be used to pay debts and not to buy votes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Colorado to read the article rather than to have it printed in the RECORD without reading.

Mr. THOMAS. I will take pleasure in doing so, and I promise the Senator from Louisiana I shall detain him only for a moment. The letter reads:

"I received your letter of May 1, with the inclosed copies of bills H. R. 13798, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON, and H. R. 13799, introduced by Mr. RAINEY, to provide for the payment of adjusted compensation to the veterans of the World War. Both bills impose an 80 per cent war-profits tax.

"The most serious aspect of this compensation matter, as I pointed out when I had the honor of appearing before the committee, is the proposal greatly to add, especially at this time, to the present grievous burden resting upon the people of the Nation and the Treasury. The method of financing the proposal raises grave problems, but it is secondary. The very heavy burdens which will rest upon the Treasury by reason of laws already enacted, including particularly the recent railroad laws, which it is estimated will entail an expenditure of approximately $1,000,000,000, and also by reason of the delay in making provision to realize upon the Government's investments in railroads and ships, taken in connection with the existing credit situation, suggests the need of grave consideration of the question whether, quite aside from and in addition to any taxation which it might be necessary to impose in order to pay a bonus to the soldiers, it may not be necessary to provide for meeting the necessities of the Government in larger measure from taxation.

"The total indebtedness of the Government maturing within three years, represented by Treasury certificates, war savings certificates, and Victory notes, is in the neighborhood of $8,000,000,000. It is no longer possible to finance the current needs of the Government in part by the issue of Treasury certificates except on onerous terms which reflect upon the value of the Government's bonds and depreciate them in the market. Furthermore, it would appear to be bad economy and bad finance for the Government to borrow money on short-term certificates of indebtedness (maturing within from three to six months) to be invested for a term of years in railroads and ships.

"It is a matter of serious concern to have the Government appearing in the market every few weeks for loans. Certainly nothing ought to be done to add to existing credit expansion that can possibly be avoided. The result would be to increase prices and to make a difficult situation less satisfactory. In the circumstances obviously the Government ought to appear in the market for loans as infrequently as possible and for the lowest sum. Additional taxes are also undesirable, but they may be less undesirable than borrowing. They would at least have the effect in part of enforcing economies. The first thing to do, I am sure you will agree, is to keep Federal expenditures down to the minimum, and it is obvious also that other governmental jurisdictions and private individuals should do likewise.

"I beg to submit to your committee for its serious consideration the question whether, all things considered, it would not now be advisable to seek out additional sources of revenue to meet the current requirements of the Government over and above any additional revenue which would be necessary if the soldier bonus plan is determined upon in order to obviate the necessity of continuing in considerable measure to meet them by borrowing. Having those things in mind, I hesitate to express an opinion concerning the bills which you have submitted to me, taken by themselves. There are many grave objections both to the proposed new war-profits tax and to the alternative measure, a sales tax, which, I understand, your committee is considering. If, in view of the urgent needs of the Government for money to meet its requirements, your committee concludes that it will be wise to raise a larger amount by taxation and desires any suggestions from the Treasury, I shall be glad to have the experts place themselves at its disposal. In the meantime I refrain from making any further comment on either proposal.

"For the reasons indicated, and for other reasons, I think it would be highly unfortunate for any new obligations to be placed upon the Treasury through the enactment of the bonus proposal in any form, however financed."

Mr. President, I had occasion last week to submit to the Senate a few observations prompted by the letter of the President to a Mr. Hamaker, of Oregon, when I drew a parallel between the possible attitude of this administration regarding the treaty and that of Mr. Cleveland regarding bimetallism in 1896. Since that time the parallel has been the occasion of some editorials in and more contributions to the public press, particularly in the city of New York, some of which have, wisely or unwisely, condemned the position of the Democratic Party and commended that of Mr. Cleveland at that time. Incidentally, I presume, the position which I, as a member of that party, occupied has been challenged.

I am not accustomed to paying attention to such matters, which are the common experiences of men in public life, however humble; but I can not refrain at this time from adverting to a communication in the New York Times of this morning entitled "Wilson and Cleveland," of which I am largely the subject. It bears the signature of "Junius, jr.," and the substance of the article justifies the assertion that this gentleman is a witless descendant of one of the greatest intellects of the eighteenth century. He knows as much about the question of bimetallism as the average monkey knows about the Ten Commandments. He exhibits a sublimity of ignorance of the problem from the beginning to the end of his contribution, and draws the conclusion—doubtless extremely satisfactory to himself—that while the parallel exists, it is as complimentary to President Wilson as it then was to Mr. Cleveland.

Mr. President, I assert, as I have many times asserted, and without any fear of successful contradiction, that the issue of 1896 involved one of the greatest problems ever presented to the consideration and judgment of the American people; a judgment not only influenced but obtained through the corrupt use of money, aided by the active sympathy of a so-called Democratic administration. That it was historically, scientifically sound, and financially sound, and that every position taken by the supporters of Mr. Bryan in that year was justified has been verified by the logic of events. I go further, and declare that but for the disloyalty of the Democratic administration the Democratic ticket would have been triumphantly elected, and the monetary system of the country as fixed by the Constitution would have been restored, with benefit not only to America but to the world.

That, however, is a controverted question with which I am not now concerned. The important, the outstanding, fact is that Mr. Cleveland's administration not only assumed to dictate to the majority of the party what its attitude should be, but failing to do so, became disloyal to the ticket after it had been nominated and took the field, and threw the great weight of its influence on the side of the candidate representing up to that time the greatest corruption fund ever collected in America for the debauchery of the American people. I have said, and I reiterate, that Mr. Cleveland will go down in history as the destroyer of the party which honored him with the greatest office in the gift of the people; and I trust that the fact will constitute a warning and not an example to all his Democratic successors.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I am through.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I recall the Senator's attention to one fact in connection with that campaign? Does the Senator recall that one of the distinguished candidates on the so-called gold-standard ticket made a speech in the Middle West, where he advised his auditors that if they could not support him, they ought to support the Republican ticket?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes, Mr. President. The Senator alludes to Gen. Buckner, of the so-called Gold Democratic ticket. It was a bastard ticket, whose sole object was to defeat and destroy the Democratic Party, and a ticket which was improvised and supported by the officeholders of the then so-called Democratic administration.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, now that we have disposed of many national problems, and have kept the merchant marine bill waiting a long time, I shall endeavor to discuss, as briefly as I can, one of its most important features. I allude to section 25 of that bill, addressing myself particularly to the first paragraph thereof.

This is the merchant marine bill, Mr. President. It has been held back so long, I expect I had better tell Senators that it is H. R. 10378, to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, and so forth. I read from section 25:

> That the owner of a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and operated in foreign trade shall, for each of the 10 taxable years beginning with the first taxable year ending after the enactment of this act, be allowed as a deduction for the purpose of ascertaining his net income subject to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes imposed by Title III of the revenue act of 1918 an amount equivalent to the net earnings of such vessel during such taxable year, determined in accordance with rules and regulations to be made by the board: Provided, That such owner shall not be entitled to such deduction unless during such taxable year he invested, or set aside under rules and regulations to be made by the board in a trust fund for investment, in the building in shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, an amount, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury and certified by him to the board, equivalent to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes that would have been payable by such owner on account of the net earnings of such vessels but for the deduction allowed under the provisions of this section.

That has been amended by a proviso which in substance says that the amount of these taxes shall not exceed one-third of the cost of the vessel, the other two-thirds of its cost being paid by the shipowner or operator.

In plain, simple language, Mr. President and Senators, that provision would exempt the shipowner and operator from the payment of excess-profits taxes on ships owned and operated by him for 10 years from the time this act becomes a law, provided he expends an amount equivalent to these exempted taxes in the construction of new ships, and provided further, that these exemptions do not exceed one-third of the cost of the new ships to be constructed by him.

Let us assume that a shipping company should, in the course of a year's operation, make such a profit that the excess-profits taxes, which, under ordinary circumstances, it would have to pay, would amount to $500,000. In order to derive the benefit of that exemption, this company would be required to expend that $500,000 in the construction of a new ship, in an American shipyard, to be owned and operated under the American flag, and that sum could not exceed more than one-third the cost of the vessel.

In other words, in addition to the $500,000 which, in that particular instance, would really be the property of the Government, this shipowner would be obliged to contribute $1,000,000 of his own money, so that the new ship, when constructed, would have cost $1,500,000, of which one-third was derived from these excess-profits taxes and the other two-thirds from the ordinary funds of the owner.

Why that exception? Why single out one class of property in this country and give it the benefit of an exemption? That is a question that has been asked, and it is a very natural one.

Some of the Senators opposing this have said, "You make one rule for the overseas commerce and another rule for the coastwise commerce."

That is true; but, Senators, for a great many years our coastwise commerce has been an American monopoly. All foreigners have been forbidden by law from engaging in the coastwise commerce of this country. It was a very wise law, too. But for that law, when the recent war broke out we would have had practically no ships, for it is a well-established fact that on August 1, 1914, at the outbreak of the late World War, only about 9 per cent of the colossal foreign commerce of the United States was carried in American ships. All the balance of our great, magnificent, wonderfully rich commerce, 91 per cent, was carried in the ships of Scandinavian countries, of Germany, Great Britain, France, Spain, Italy, Japan, all the countries of the world other than our own. But, thanks to this law safeguarding our coastwise commerce, we did have a splendid fleet on the Great Lakes and the ocean coasts of America, and, of course, many of those vessels, hitherto engaged in the coastwise commerce, were large enough and strong enough for overseas commerce, and to some extent answered the needs of that commerce.

All the Senators will recall what an unfortunate situation this Nation was in at the outbreak of the war, how nearly impossible it was to get our commerce carried across the sea, the very great reduction in the selling price of innumerable articles of American commerce. I recall one in particular affecting my own section of the country—cotton. Its price fell far below the cost of production, because we had no ships to carry it. All the ships of Europe were engaged in one way or another in the war and could not serve us as formerly. It was a most unfortunate situation in which our country found itself at that time, and one I sincerely hope it will never be placed in again.

As a result of the war, we found it necessary to build ships. A constant cry went up from all sides, "We can not get along without ships. We must have ships, and more ships, to carry our commerce across the ocean." Later, when we entered the war ourselves, it was absolutely necessary to build a bridge of ships across the Atlantic Ocean. We built it. We carried our armies across the ocean. We built millions of tons of ships. We expended and committed ourselves to the expenditure of nearly three and a half billions of dollars for ships. We constructed a colossal fleet, and we have those ships on hand now.

Senators, if there ever was an exceptional case, this presents one. I ask you to look at this as a business man would view it, for we are trustees of the Government—its board of directors.

We are business men, charged with the duty of making the best possible use of this great asset which has cost over $3,000,000,000.

What are we going to do with it? You naturally say, "Sell it." You surely would not sell it to foreigners. Oh, no; we will all agree on that. These ships must be sold to Americans. We must have a big American fleet. We must have hundreds and thousands of ships carrying the American flag. We must never permit the state of affairs which prevailed when the war broke out.

How are we going to get our American people to buy these ships? Three billion dollars is a very large sum of money. You answer me, "Yes, Senator, that is true, but a great deal of that cost can probably be charged off as a war expenditure. You can not properly say that you must sell these ships for $3,000,000,000. Normally they would not have cost $3,000,000,000. You must make a fair and proper reduction in the sale price under the cost price."

I reply, "Yes; that is correct; you will have to make some reduction, but even making a reduction of one-third, if that great reduction be finally agreed upon, there is still over $2,000,000,000 worth of property which must be sold. Where will you find a purchaser?"

You say, "We will find those purchasers among the big shipping companies in America."

I ask you to tell me who they are. I ask you to name them.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. The Senator from Louisiana has stated that the cost of constructing the vessels now composing and hereafter to compose the fleet operated by the Shipping Board was in excess of $3,000,000,000. I now understand him to say that he is entirely willing, in order to dispose of those ships, to sell them for one-third of the cost, if it were necessary.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator misunderstood me entirely. I say that possibly it will be necessary to reduce the selling price to two-thirds of the cost, cutting off one-third of what they cost as a war expense. If they cost three billion, you would probably have to sell them for two billion in order to find a purchaser.

Mr. NUGENT. All right; that is the same proposition I presented. In other words, the position of the Senator from Louisiana is this, that in order to dispose of these ships, which cost the people of the United States $3,000,000,000, he is entirely willing that they be sold to private interests at a loss to these people of a thousand million dollars. There can be no question with respect to his contention concerning that matter.

Mr. RANSDELL. Absolutely none. That is absolutely correct.

Mr. NUGENT. I desire to say, Mr. President, that that is the fundamental reason for my opposition to this bill. I absolutely refuse to give my assent to any proposition of any kind or character or description which will tend, either directly or indirectly, to take a thousand millions of the people's money out of their pockets and turn it over to private interests, it does not make a particle of difference to me whether those interests constitute the great Shipping Trusts of this country, or whether they constitute small and comparatively insignificant shipping companies. I am opposed to it unalterably.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator what he would do with these ships?

Mr. NUGENT. What I would do with them is this: Rather than dispose of them at such a sacrifice, as they were built for the people of this country with the money of the people of this country during a time of great stress and great need, and as they are now being operated at a profit, according to the report of the committee, I would continue to operate them under Government control. That is what I should do, Mr. President, in the interest of the whole people of the United States.

Mr. RANSDELL. May I ask the Senator if he, as a business man, imagines that we could operate ships in the general commerce of the world, which cost this Government from $200 to $300 per ton, in successful competition with ships of Great Britain, France, and other countries constructed prior to the war and which cost from $30 to $50 per ton? How could that be done as a business proposition? I should like to have the Senator explain.

Mr. NUGENT. In response to that question I will say that if I understand the matter, so far as the operation of the ships composing the fleet is concerned, under direction of the Shipping Board, they are now being operated and have heretofore been operated with a profit to the people of this country.

I assume that heretofore they have been operated in competition with the shipowners of the countries to which the Senator from Louisiana refers. In support of my statement I desire to quote from the report of the committee recommending the passage of this act, if I understand it correctly. There are certain extracts here from the testimony given by Chairman Payne of the Shipping Board, and, among other things, appears this:

Voyage revenues from operations to June 30, 1919, as reflected in condensed balance sheet of June 30, 1919.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the statement also in the report that there is nothing deducted or allowed for depreciation or for interest, as is generally done in private business. When that is allowed according to ordinary course, then there is no surplus. That simply shows—and I asked the Shipping Board simply to give me—the actual receipts and the actual expenditures, without counting depreciation or interest.

Mr. NUGENT. In answer to the Senator from Washington, the fact remains that, excluding the items to which he has referred, the Shipping Board has operated this fleet in competition with shipowners of foreign countries at a net profit to the Government of over $166,000,000.

So far as the question of depreciation is concerned, that certainly is a fearful and wonderful thing, and no man can tell what it, as a matter of fact, amounts to or what, as a matter of fact, should be allowed for depreciation. The Senator from Washington stated a day or two ago that the Shipping Board was now allowing or charging off for depreciation 4, 5, 6, and up to 10 per cent, but I say that there is no man who can determine what is the proper amount to be allowed for depreciation.

But even though there should be a charge for depreciation—and, undoubtedly, there should be—no man can say and there is nothing here to determine to what extent that depreciation should go or what amount of money it would aggregate, so far as the ships operated by the Shipping Board are concerned.

Mr. RANSDELL. I am much obliged to the Senator for his very learned disquisition. In his mountain home he had probably learned a great deal more about this complicated shipping matter than those of us on the Commerce Committee who live in seaboard cities and who for nine months have been studying this question. We have had before us, sitting as a great board of directors composed of 19 Senators, one of the most important business questions ever presented to the American Congress during my 21 years of service.

I wish to say that the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES], has been as fair-minded and able a chairman in the examination of this subject as I have ever seen during my congressional career. I wish further to say that there has been absolutely no partisanship in the investigation of the subject. We began the hearings in June of last year and we carried them on, with more or less interruption, until the 30th of March of this year, when they were closed. We listened to hundreds of witnesses. People from every walk of life and from every portion of the United States testified; all who wished to come and assist us in arriving at a correct solution of what to do with these ships, worth $3,000,000,000, which was the vital question.

After all of that study, investigation, and the expert testimony adduced before the committee we unanimously resolved, without one dissenting vote, that we should sell these ships. Here is the provision, and I read it from the first paragraph of the bill:

That it is necessary for the national defense and for the proper growth of its foreign and domestic commerce that the United States shall have a merchant marine of the best equipped and most suitable types of vessels sufficient to carry the greater portion of its commerce and serve as a naval or military auxiliary in time of war or national emergency, ultimately to be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States.

That provision represents what was decided, viz, that we wished to have a great merchant marine suitable to act as a military and naval reserve, competent to handle our troops in time of war, designed to make our Navy available and valuable at all times, and a merchant marine ultimately to be owned and operated by the private citizens of this country and not by the Government.

Mr. President, it has always been the policy of our Republic, and I thank God it has, for the Government not to do anything that the private citizen could do just as well. The Government has never engaged in any kind of commerce or in any business that its citizens could do better. The Government, of course, has controlled the Army, it has owned and operated the naval vessels, but never in its history until this war has it owned and operated any appreciable number of commercial vessels. It is contrary to our policy to do so, and I do not think many Senators within the sound of my voice were so much pleased with our recent Government experiment in railroad operation that they now want us to indulge in permanent ownership and operation of ships of commerce by the Government.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ASHURST in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think this can be overlooked, however, that the committee have recognized the fact referred to by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] that these ships are now owned by the Government and that we have endeavored to frame legislation that would result ultimately in getting them into private ownership with as little sacrifice as possible to the people.

Mr. RANSDELL. I thank the Senator for bringing that out. I had intended to do it myself. I was about to say that we are not going to sell these vessels hastily. We contemplate the Shipping Board continuing to operate for years, and are adding to its membership. It now consists of five, and we propose to make it seven. The salaries of the members of the Shipping Board are now $7,500 and we propose to increase this to $12,000. The personnel of the Shipping Board are now taken promiscuously from any place the Executive sees fit to select them. We provide specifically that two shall come from the Pacific coast, one from the Gulf coast, two from the Atlantic coast, one from the Great Lakes, and one from the interior. We direct particularly that the Shipping Board shall establish new routes and new lines of trade wherever it be possible.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. One moment and then I will yield. We provide that those routes shall be operated by agents of the Shipping Board; that they shall continue that operation for years, if it be necessary, as Government vessels, until it be determined whether or not they can make a success of operating in these new lines. We are not tying the hands of the Shipping Board at all, but are simply declaring a general policy. Suppose you are a business man and not obliged to dispose of your holdings, but as a prudent man you find yourself with a vast amount of property on hand. Naturally you would handle it in the best way possible. Remember that when the war broke out we had practically no foreign trade in our own vessels, but are now determined to build up one with this great fleet. We instruct the Shipping Board to build up that trade, and not to do it only from one or two great ports but from all the available ports of the Union.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho for a question only. Does the Senator wish to ask me a question or make a speech? I yield for a question, but not for a speech.

Mr. NUGENT. I merely desire to answer a statement made by the Senator.

Mr. RANSDELL. Very well; the Senator can do that, if he pleases, in his own time. I was very willing to yield for a question, but was met with a speech. I prefer to finish now, though I will yield for a question.

Mr. NUGENT. I will reply to the Senator later.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President and Senators, I wish to impress upon you the fact that these ships we propose to exempt from war taxes are not in private ownership. They belong to the Nation, and to that salient fact I ask the especial attention of those Senators who are averse to Government ownership and operation of any utility and who wish to see private individuals transact the business of the country.

Whenever I have owned an expensive piece of property and wished to dispose of it, I have always found that I had to offer some inducement to prospective purchasers. If I hold unyieldingly to the very highest prices, if I tighten up on terms of payment and ask the highest rates of interest, I will not find a purchaser. I am obliged to grant some inducement. So we propose here to provide an inducement. We say: "You are a manufacturer of steel or furniture or a great miner or merchant; you have accumulated millions of dollars from your mining or manufacturing or merchandising. We should like you now to engage in a new business, something which you do not understand, something of which you may make a disastrous failure. We want to persuade you now to go into this new venture and buy some of these ships." "All right." "If you will do that, as a special inducement, we will agree that we will not tax your excess profits on the ships that we sell to you, provided that, of course, you make any excess profits." And down under our breath we say, "We do not guarantee excess profits; you probably will not make a dollar"—we whisper that; we do not say it boldly to the purchaser, but in our inner consciences we do—"but if you do make money we will let you"—do what? Put the money in your pocket? No—"we will let you use that money to pay one-third of the cost of a new ship and allow you to go down into your own pocket for the other two-thirds of its cost." When that new ship is built, of course, it must pay taxes at once; there is no exemption of that new ship from any kind of taxes.

Is that anything very remarkable, Senators? I can not see that it is. All of us admit that we ought to encourage the American merchant marine; all of us assert that it would be a glorious thing if our flag could be on the seas as in the days of the old clipper ships, which were built largely in Maine and in other New England States, and which carried our flag to every sea on earth; when 91 per cent of our commerce was carried under Old Glory, as compared with 9 per cent so carried at the outbreak of the recent war. We all admit it would be brilliant, glorious, and patriotic to have a return of that wonderful overseas commerce under the American flag; but I do not believe many of us would like to see that business carried on by the Government itself. We would like to see it operated by American citizens, but if we are to get them into the business we must give them some inducement to enter it.

Is this a very unheard-of proposition? I can not think so at all. Let me read you the statutes of two or three States on this subject. My own State of Louisiana exempts ships from all taxes of every kind.

The provision in reference to the matter is very brief. In July, 1916, the following amendment to the constitution of the State of Louisiana was proposed and adopted:

1. Ships and ocean-going tugs, towboats, and barges engaged in overseas trade and commerce, and domiciled in a Louisiana port, shall be exempt from all State, parish, and municipal taxation: Provided, however, That this exemption shall not apply to harbor, wharf, shed, and other port dues.

2. No ship, tug, towboat, or barge operated in the coasting trade of continental United States shall be within the exemption herein granted.

That proposition to exempt ships in the overseas commerce from all taxation was submitted to the voters of Louisiana on November 7, 1916, and was carried by a two-thirds vote. The people of Louisiana believe in ships; they favor overseas commerce, but they do not propose to help the coastwise commerce. That commerce already exists and does not need help. They treat coastwise commerce just exactly as they treat any other business of the country that is in esse and not in posse. There is now a big coastwise commerce; there are now plenty of ships to carry the coastwise commerce; we do not need more ships for the coastwise trade; but we need millions of tons of ships for foreign commerce. So the voters of Louisiana, when the question was presented to them in the fall of 1916, said, "Yes; we will exempt from all taxation—State, municipal, and parochial—ships and tugs and towboats engaged in overseas commerce, but we will not give a dollar of exemption to ships engaged in the coastwise trade." The Nation can well afford to follow the example of Louisiana in this wise measure.

I find, Mr. President, the State of New Hampshire has an exemption of a similar nature. I read from the public statutes and sessions laws of New Hampshire, page 204, section 13, as follows:

Ships and vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade for at least 10 months of the year preceding the annual assessment of property for taxation or built during the year for that trade, shall not be included in the personal estate liable to be taxed, but the net yearly income of such ships and vessels may be taxed as such personal estate.

That is not so liberal as is the Louisiana provision.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KING in the chair). Does the Senator from Louisiana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. Do I understand the Senator from Louisiana to say that he is now reading from the statutes of the State of New Hampshire?

Mr. RANSDELL. I am.

Mr. NUGENT. Do I understand that under the law of New Hampshire the proceeds from the operation of ships are subject to the income tax?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will again read the provision for the Senator. It is as follows:

Ships and vessels engaged in the foreign carrying trade for at least 10 months of the year preceding the annual assessment of property for taxation, or built during the year for that trade, shall not be included in the personal estate liable to be taxed, but the net yearly income of such ships and vessels may be taxed as such personal estate.

Mr. NUGENT. The net income is taxed.

Mr. RANSDELL. The net personal income upon those ships is taxed, but the ships themselves are not taxed and are not assessed for taxation.

Now I read from a book which is entitled "Constitution of California Annotated," page 529:

SEC. 4a. All vessels—

I call the special attention of Senators to this—

All vessels of more than 50 tons burden registered at any port in this State and engaged in the transportation of freight or passengers shall be exempt from taxation, except for State purposes, until and including the 1st day of January, 1935.

That provision seems to exempt all vessels of more than 50 tons from taxation of every kind and sort, except for State purposes. I do not know how it is in California, but in Louisiana that would leave a very small tax, for municipal taxes and parish taxes in my State always amount to many times the State taxes, and this California provision exempts ships from all except State taxes.

Now, let us see what the great Empire State of New York has done in regard to exempting ships from taxation. We know that most of the overseas commerce of this country goes out of the port of New York; we know that the foreign commerce of New York in imports and exports exceeds by about ten times—1,000 per cent—the commerce of the next greatest port in America—the port of New Orleans. New York has a wonderful commerce, and the State of New York has enacted the following provision, which I read from the Consolidated Laws of the State of New York, page 8293:

SEC. 12. All vessels registered at any port in this State and owned by an American citizen, or association, or by any corporation incorporated under the laws of the State of New York, engaged in ocean commerce between any port in the United States and any foreign port are exempted from all taxation in this State for State and local purposes—

They are exempted from all taxation, including both State and local—and all such corporations, all of whose vessels are employed between foreign ports and ports in the United States, are exempted from all taxation in this State, for State and local purposes, upon their capital stock, franchises, and earnings, until and including December 31, 1922.

That law was passed some time ago.

Mr. President, it appears from that law and the others which I have read that the States of Louisiana and New York completely exempt ships engaged in the overseas trade from all taxation of every kind—State, county, and municipal. Those two States are the ones which have the great harbors of New York and New Orleans. The provision found in this bill does not pretend to exempt ships from all taxation; it simply exempts them from excess-profits taxes for the period of 10 years. In the case of the two States referred to the exemption from taxation is not coupled with a proviso that a sum of money equivalent to the exemption must be expended in new ships; the owners and operators of those ships are allowed to put that exempt tax money in their pockets; they are not obliged to spend it, and for every dollar of expenditure add two dollars of their own money in constructing new vessels. The provision of the pending bill is a very different proposition from the provision of the laws of the States of Louisiana and New York.

Mr. President, if there ever was an exceptional case this is it; if there ever was an instance when the Congress should do something to build up its merchant marine this is one. We have been talking for years and years about building up our marine; we have had under consideration innumerable provisions looking to the payment of subsidies for ships, but they have never passed.

Some years ago we had a provision for preferential duties on goods brought to this country in American ships. It passed Congress recently, but a Supreme Court decision upset it. We have been trying for the longest time to get a merchant marine, and would not have it now but for the necessities of the war. As we have it, let us handle it wisely. Let us put it as rapidly as possible in the hands of our enterprising private citizens and have them compete with the citizens of the Old World.

Do not imagine, Senators, that an easy task confronts us. Do not expect that Great Britain, which carried the commerce of the world, or a very large percentage of it, prior to the war, and which still expects to carry it, is going to sit supinely by and see the United States, her largest and most prosperous customer, taken from her. We are going to meet with every kind of obstacle and every impediment that the shrewdest people on earth—the British—can place in our way. We must have in this ship business, if it be humanly possible, the best brains and intellect—the best business men of America.

They are not in it now, although they have made a great success in every kind of business undertaken by them. Let us persuade them to go into this overseas business, and the Government will not be taking any material amount of money out of our pockets to do it. We are simply giving them this little encouragement to build up a wonderful and necessary business.

I hope that the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin will not be adopted, but that the paragraph in the bill, as amended and corrected by the committee, will be allowed to remain as it is.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, before the Senator resumes his seat I should like to ask him one question. I am not clear as to the meaning of one of the provisions of the section that has just been discussed. On lines 20 and 21, page 25, these words appear:

An amount equivalent to the net earning of such vessel during such taxable year, determined in accordance with rules and regulations to be made by the board.

It would seem, if I interpret this section correctly, that for the purpose of taxation and applying the principle of exemption the taxpayer may not only be exempted from paying taxes upon the receipts derivable from the vessel which would be subjected to taxation, but he may take all of the net earnings of the one or more vessels which he may have and apply them in reduction of taxes which he might be compelled to pay upon his other investments or his other property. Now, if I interpret that section correctly, it seems to me to be manifestly unfair and unjust. Why should the Government exempt from taxation property which I may have—real estate, for instance, or banks or mines—because in a shipping venture in which I am interested I may have made large net profits?

There may be some reason for the exemption of the earnings of the ship from taxation, providing those earnings are put back into the construction of other vessels, if it is to be the policy to encourage the construction of ships; but I can not understand the justice of the position, if that is what this section means, that the rest of the earnings of an individual who may be engaged in the shipping business shall be exempted from taxation to the extent of his net earnings in the shipping business.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator misconstrues that section. We have no idea whatsoever of exempting any other property than the vessel itself; and I think, if the Senator will analyze the sentence, he will see that on line 21 the words "equivalent to the net earnings of such vessel during such taxable year" do not refer to the other property. I will say, however, that if the Senator really fears that any such construction as he places upon this language may possibly be given it by the Treasury Department, I am sure the chairman of the committee would have no objection whatsoever to the insertion of some words which will make it perfectly clear that we do not intend the exemption to apply to anything except the earnings of the vessel itself.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that is certainly true, and if the provision should pass in that form we will see to it, if there is any question about it in conference, that it is made plain; but after we got the idea we had this language framed up by our drafting people. It is a technical proposition, and they said it would carry out our idea.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, he will readily understand that the context of this section might lead to the conclusion which I have suggested. For instance, it states:

That the owner of a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and operated in foreign trade shall, for each of the 10 taxable years beginning with the first taxable year ending after the enactment of this act, be allowed as a deduction for the purpose of ascertaining his net income subject to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes imposed by Title III of the revenue act of 1918—

And so forth.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but then comes the proviso.

Mr. KING. One moment—

An amount equivalent to the net earnings of such vessel.

Now, it does not limit the deduction for taxable purposes to the earnings made from the vessels themselves, but the net earnings derived from the vessels apparently might be applied by him in the reduction of the taxes which he would be compelled to pay under the revenue laws of the Government of the United States derivable from other sources of income.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, that was not the intention. I shall be glad if the Senator will suggest something to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. KING. I shall be glad to prepare an amendment which I think will relieve the section of the criticism to which I have referred.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I am very glad the Senator called that matter to our attention. I can not construe the language as meaning what he has stated, but it is barely possible that some revenue officer might construe it in that way; and as that was not our intention at all, as stated before, we would not have the slightest objection to any amendment which would make it perfectly clear.

Mr. President, I ask that there may be published as an appendix to my remarks a very brief article which I have before me from Mr. Lewis Nixon, who is a very prominent shipbuilder in this country, published in the May issue of Uttmark's Nautical News. I do not ask to have it read—it is very brief—but I should like to have it published as an appendix to my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENDRICK in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

"WHAT IS NEEDED FOR THE AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

"(By Lewis Nixon, designer and builder of the Oregon and one of the foremost authorities on subject of American shipping—Expresses opposition to subsidies—Talks of builders, owners, and operators, May, 1920.)

"There is a way that the merchant marine of the United States can be made a permanent, paying success, and that without any subsidies or Government operation. It is merely necessary to turn over the vast fleet of American merchantmen, acquired during and since the war, to private operators and secure for these vessels a gainful trade. These regulations for such a profitable trade under the American flag are amply provided for in the Constitution.

"Foreign Governments for years have systematically opposed American trade expansion on the oceans, dating back from the War of 1812, when the price of peace virtually was the abrogation by the United States of its "direct trades" restrictions on foreign vessels plying to American ports.

"Do not let us start out with the mistaken idea that a merchant marine can not pay in competition with the sea carriers of other nations. But let us also not lose sight of the fact that to be of genuine usefulness to our people our merchant marine must pay.

"The investment of billions of dollars in ships—good, bad, and indifferent—merely because they are ships is simply a waste unless intelligent and constructive management and control go with possession.

"The arguments in favor of any form or method of aiding our own merchant marine were denounced by a certain school of thought responsive to the propaganda against any effort to put our flag back upon the ocean. Those who, by a life-time of study, felt at least the right to an opinion were denounced as subsidy seekers and lobbyists.

"For 35 years I have publicly expressed my opposition to subsidies which would meet a difference in cost of operation by payments out of the Public Treasury. In the first place, I believe such a policy unconstitutional, and in the second place, I am sure that it would be ineffective. We might pay subsidies that would permit our vessels to run empty and yet not develop a maritime carriage of any use to the Nation or its people. We should do as our forefathers did and drive trade into American bottoms by preference, as it is only upon a healthy and growing trade based upon a demand for American vessels, that we can found an enduring merchant fleet.

"Of course, mail compensation is an entirely proper exercise of Government expenditure under the constitutional power to establish post offices and post roads but we need the tramp ship as well as the fast mail steamer.

"While our so-called statesmen in response to sophistic arguments have bartered away our birthrights upon the seas in cunningly drawn treaties and conventions, prating of reciprocal benefits, the other nations, after persuading us to suspend constitutional regulations which were proved effective, have evaded such reciprocity by adopting every possible discrimination against us that ingenuity could conceive or our impotent statesmanship permit.

"While foreigners can carry our products they do it in their own way and to their own advantage and so largely control their disposition and prices. Jefferson's distinction of active and passive cargoes, the active being carried by our own vessels and the passive by foreign vessels, was one of that great statesman's happiest phrases.

"When we actually competed on the oceans and possessed the all-pervading commercial connections and the machinery for doing international business, we carried cargoes at the lowest rates, even though our ships cost more and our crews were paid more and were better fed than the crews on foreign ships.

"It has been said by little Americans that our people were as well engaged in other industries as in shipbuilding and shipowning. I think that they can not be better engaged than in preventing bankruptcies and panics, adding to our national wealth, independence, and constructive efficiency and in keeping gold at home.

"We must stop the betrayal of a sacred pact of the Constitution, brace up the weakened commercial pillar of national greatness and return to measures found effective by our legislators when conditions in the foreign trade were such as they will be two years hence.

"Men had the effrontery to say that we could not compete on the oceans when weekly additions of great vessels were being made to the foreign fleets centering here, all of them built and kept in gainful service on the profits made from our trade.

"The Baltimore platform of the Democratic Party pledged itself as favoring the exemption from tolls of American ships, engaged in coastwise trade, passing through the Panama Canal. It also expressed the belief in fostering, by constitutional regulation of commerce, the growth of a merchant marine for the United States.

"We have since admitted foreign vessels to American registry. We adopted discriminating duties under the leadership of Senator UNDERWOOD, directly carrying out the above pledge, yet this law of the land was abrogated by a Treasury ruling. We have caused our coasting vessels to pay tolls through the Canal. All this before the war.

"The World War found us with several shipyards of high efficiency. There was a tremendous demand for neutral bottoms, but even these were subject to attack without notice or search. We entered the war and the Government also entered shipbuilding. Shipbuilding was considered a business and not an art. Hence any good business man was considered as being capable of organizing a shipbuilding industry. So carried away were some that the people were promised 10,000,000 tons of shipping a year, the very promise evidencing the incompetency of the promiser.

"Instead of building on existing yards to the fullest possible extent many new yards were started and a riot of expenditure and hurrah methods resulted. Men were bid for by rival establishments, and many rushed in who could not build vessels at all, assumed enormous contracts and enjoyed vast advances.

"It was too late to criticize nor was it the time, even if views of a veteran builder would have been listened to. I saw vessels launched, riveted only partially above the water line, with sea valves uncut, no tail shafts in place, no rudders mounted, and no drydocks in which to finish them.

"And the people thought that tonnage launched was tonnage practically ready to go into service.

"Instead of utilizing available labor for the maximum tonnage of really well-built ships, efforts were scattered and much poor work, which must be made good, was put overboard. We must in many instances now insure against leakage, and every failure of one of our newly built vessels at sea is well heralded and used against us by our commercial rivals.

"Our well-established shipyards, however, have turned out many first-class vessels. The others will, in time, be rebuilt and be able to take their places at sea. Shipyards throughout the world are putting ships afloat as rapidly as possible and profitable routes will soon be covered; and, while paying rates will continue for some time, cargo will not much longer seek the carrier.

"About 18 months ago the Secretary of the Navy stated that the administration would embark upon the Government operation of vessels. This, before a large gathering of naval architects and builders of ships and ship equipment. Of course, such a policy meant the end of American shipbuilding in a short time. Men who understood ship management would go abroad to get their ships and put them under foreign flags that they might escape bureaucratic handicap. Happily, this policy has been abandoned and there is still hope, therefore, for an American merchant marine.

"I do not approve selling our vessels to foreign owners to be run under foreign flags, but no country will dare bankrupt itself by keeping a fleet of idle vessels of such numbers as will strain its credit.

"We have capable rating organizations such as that headed by Stevenson Taylor that could place values upon vessels, the well-built ships being of great value and some of the poorly built ones dear at any price. This country is not rich enough to risk the cost of vindicating mistakes. The running of ships is business—not politics.

"The sooner the vessels now the property of the Government can be disposed of to operators, not speculators, the sooner will a killing drain of money, to be made up by taxes, be stopped. Some of the foreign hulls we now have are well built. I of course do not know the cost of putting them into serviceable condition and I naturally do not wish to see them pass back to foreign flags. But we have lost enough already and our people must not face further useless loss. Proper legislation by Congress at this time can save the situation for the American merchant marine.

"Unless we are prepared to prefer our own ships in foreign competition and to strike off the shackles which will hold us back as soon as we must seek cargoes by bidding against the foreign ships and unless our legislators are prepared to admit their error in passing, at the command of the leader of a foreign seamen's association, an act which makes it impossible to meet foreign ships on the ocean, we had better liquidate, before the property further deteriorates, and take the place of a tributary and dependent Nation so far as the sea is concerned, even though we do face on two oceans.

"The control of the oceans in peaceful commerce is the great prize of statesmanship. The great trouble is that, after one has spent a lifetime in the study of ocean commerce, treaty influences, commercial laws and practices, some one will, by a catch phrase, upset for the time being the lessons of history and economic laws.

"Shipping to be in full usefulness to our people must face no risk of the checking of industrial activity, and the present excess-profits tax seriously menaces our industrial activity and manufacturing interests without which our shipping can not survive.

"There is a national desire for an American merchant marine, as it would benefit every calling, profession, and trade in every section of our country. We have ships; we have competent shipbuilders and able ship managers; we have traders, artisans, and farmers; we have the money.

"We need legislation and administration along proven lines of usefulness. The man who advocates half-baked theories or who advocates class legislation in such a crisis is a mighty poor American."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to the amendment of the committee. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 25, where the committee proposes to insert a new section, section 25, the Senator from Wisconsin moves to strike out the first paragraph, with the exception of the numerals designating the section, in the following words:

That the owner of a vessel documented under the laws of the United States and operated in foreign trade shall, for each of the 10 taxable years while so operated, beginning with the first taxable year ending after the enactment of this act, be allowed as a deduction for the purpose of ascertaining his net income subject to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes imposed by Title III of the revenue act of 1918 an amount equivalent to the net earnings of such vessel during such taxable year, determined in accordance with rules and regulations to be made by the board: Provided, That such owner shall not be entitled to such deduction unless during such taxable year he invested, or set aside under rules and regulations to be made by the board in a trust fund for investment, in the building in shipyards in the United States of new vessels of a type and kind approved by the board, an amount, to be determined by the Secretary of the Treasury and certified by him to the board, equivalent to the war-profits and excess-profits taxes that would have been payable by such owner on account of the net earnings of such vessels but for the deduction allowed under the provisions of this section, or unless such owner, with the approval of the board (to be given only if because of the smallness of the amount involved the board deems it best for the interests of the United States), applies such amount on any mortgage indebtedness due to the United States for the purchase of ships.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to strike out the first paragraph.

So Mr. LENROOT's amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that I shall ask for a separate vote on this amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

Mr. NUGENT. I move to strike out the second and third paragraphs of section 25 in the proposed committee amendment, commencing at line 14 on page 26, down to and including the word "therein," in line 12 on page 27.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. NUGENT. On yesterday I stated the reasons which impelled me to oppose the first paragraph of section 25 of the committee amendment, the one on which the vote was just taken. I am also opposed to the second and third paragraphs of that section. I shall read the second paragraph:

> That during the period of 10 years from the enactment of this act any person a citizen of the United States who may sell a vessel built prior to January 1, 1914, shall be exempt from all income taxes that would be payable upon any of the proceeds of such sale if the entire proceeds thereof shall be invested in the building of new ships in American shipyards, such ships to be documented under the laws of the United States and to be of a type approved by the board.

It appears from this paragraph, Mr. President, that the shipowners of the country have been singled out from all other classes of our population and exempted from the operation of the tax laws of the United States. It will be observed that in the event a shipowner sells a vessel and invests the proceeds in another vessel he is exempt from all income taxes. I know of no reason why that should be done.

A farmer who owns a farm and sells it and invests the proceeds in another farm, the shopkeeper who owns a store and sells it and invests the proceeds in another store, the stockman who has a bunch of sheep or cattle and sells them and invests the proceeds in another bunch of sheep or cattle are all obliged to pay their excess-profits taxes, and I see no reason in the world why these shipowners should not be obliged to do the same thing.

The second paragraph of the section provides what is tantamount to a stock dividend, which, under the recent decision of the Supreme Court, is merely the capitalization of profits. I think it is utterly wrong that such a proposition should be countenanced by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. NUGENT. I yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator referred to a case where a farmer sells his farm and buys another farm. That would not be an analogous case at all. There is nothing in the section which would exempt a shipowner if he sells his ship and buys with that money another ship. The exemption which is given to him is only in case he sells his ship and reinvests the entire purchase money in the building of another ship, not in buying it.

Mr. NUGENT. It seems to me, Mr. President, that that is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is a very broad distinction, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me. It is the object of the bill in part, and a very large part, to encourage the building of an American merchant marine. If he simply sells and reinvests the money in the purchase of another ship, he does not contribute at all to the tonnage of our merchant marine, but if he sells and reinvests the entire money in the building of a new ship, he adds that much tonnage to the American merchant marine, and the country to-day needs more than it needs anything else an adequate merchant marine to transport and accommodate its foreign trade.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, as I stated before, it appears to me that the illustration given by the Senator from North Carolina amounts to nothing more than a distinction without a difference when applied to the matter which I presented, and I repeat that if a farmer owns a farm and disposes of that farm and invests the proceeds derived from the sale of the farm in the purchase of another farm he is liable, under the law, to pay an income tax and a tax on the excess profits, should he have earned any. Consequently I say that these shipowners are, as a matter of fact, singled out from people in our country engaged in any and every other line of business as the subject of special legislation.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. NUGENT. In a moment. The Senator from North Carolina stated—and I agree with him—that it is necessary that we build up an adequate merchant marine. The Senator stated that this special legislation, these special exemptions, are being enacted in favor of the shipowners because the building up of a merchant marine is of more vital importance to this country than any other one thing. I disagree with him in regard to that matter. I contend that if any class of men in this country are, under existing conditions, to be made the beneficiaries of special legislation it should be those engaged in agriculture. Agriculture is the basic industry of this country. Without it we would not exist for any considerable time. Every man knows that from the highest to the lowest, not only in this country but throughout the world, we are clamoring for increased production of foodstuffs. Every man knows that a very considerable difficulty is being experienced by the farmers of this country in the cultivation this year of the lands which they had under cultivation last year and the year before because of the scarcity of labor and the exceedingly high cost of everything which enters into their production. So I say that the farmers should not be discriminated against in the manner provided by this bill, which exempts the shipowners, one class of our citizens, from the operation of the excess-profits and the war-profits tax laws so far as the sale of ships is concerned.

I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator permit me to make just a very brief suggestion in regard to this paragraph? The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], I think very justly, called attention to the fact that there is a great distinction between selling one ship and using the money derived from the sale to buy another ship and selling one ship and using the money to construct another ship in an American yard.

I wish to supplement that by reminding the Senator that a great many millions of dollars at every port of the United States have been invested in shipyards. The amount of money which is invested in these shipyards is almost incalculable.

Mr. NUGENT. Why was it invested in shipyards?

Mr. RANSDELL. As a war measure.

Mr. NUGENT. By whom?

Mr. RANSDELL. Some of my friends, farmers of north Louisiana, went to the Gulf coast and put their money in shipyards, because, as patriotic citizens, they wanted to help this Nation——

Mr. NUGENT. And for profit.

Mr. RANSDELL. Just as much for patriotism as for profit. I think it is a very great slander on the patriotic people of this country to say they built those shipyards for profit. I repudiate any such accusation.

That money was spent in those shipyards, those shipyards exist, and we ought to find business for them, if possible. We ought to utilize them. We ought to encourage them. We ought not to junk them; and a good many of them have already been junked. Let us keep them going, if possible. Let us continue the business. In the State of the Senator from North Carolina he knows a great many million dollars were invested in these yards and a great many millions have been invested in my State in shipyards. We want to keep them going.

The Senator can not say any more about farmers than I can, because I am more of a farmer than he is. It is the only business in which I am engaged, and I live in a great agricultural State. But I wish to see the business of America go on, and not merely one class of it. This is not class legislation. It is to help the biggest kind of industry in the country.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, every man knows, as a matter of course, that the gentlemen who have built and who are operating the shipyards are not operating them as eleemosynary institutions. I do not doubt that many of the builders of these shipyards were actuated in part by patriotism. Neither do I entertain the slightest doubt that all of them were actuated, in a measure at least, by the idea that there was profit to be derived from the building of ships.

So far as the shipbuilding companies are concerned, for the past several years it has been the general belief, and it has been charged in this Congress and elsewhere—and judging from newspaper reports that have appeared during the past two or three weeks that belief and those charges were based on facts—that certain of these shipbuilding companies looted the Treasury, that they robbed the Government in the prices charged by them for the construction of ships, and certain of them are now in difficulty with the Department of Justice of the United States, which is seeking to recover some of the millions which were taken from the Treasury by these selfsame gentlemen.

Going back to paragraph 2, I repeat that I am utterly opposed to its enactment. I do not believe that, particularly under such circumstances and conditions as now prevail, the shipowners should be given this exemption from taxation which is not enjoyed by other people in the country.

I now desire to call attention to paragraph 3 of this section, which I shall read——

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

Mr. NUGENT. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. TOWNSEND. As I understand it, this provision proposes to exempt from the profit taxes——

Mr. NUGENT. From all income taxes. That is the language of the provision—from all income taxes.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the same thing.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I suppose it has reference simply to the money obtained from the sale of the old vessels, and that would be the difference between the value of the property years ago and what the selling price is. Am I correct about that?

Mr. NUGENT. I apprehend that that is true.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The proposition in the bill, then, is in case money obtained from the sale of an old ship is invested in the purchase of a new ship built in the United States, that excess, as I may call it, is to be exempt from taxation.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator is mistaken about that. It must not be invested in a ship that happens to be built in the United States. Of course, that might be simply the purchase of another ship, but it is granted only in case the money is invested by the seller in the construction of a new ship, a ship which has not already been built, the purpose being to add another ship to the American merchant marine.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I did not quite understand what the situation was and asked for the purpose of getting right.

Mr. NUGENT. I now read paragraph 3 of section 25:

> The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the board are hereby authorized and directed to determine from time to time what shall be allowed for annual depreciation of vessels purchased from the United States, or vessels completed in the United States, since November 11, 1918, in order that the owners of such vessels shall, with respect to the capital cost thereof, be put as nearly as may be on a parity with the owners of ships under the flag of our foreign competitors in the world's carrying trade, and such allowances shall be embraced in the deductions allowed by law in determining the net income subject to income taxes and war-profits and excess-profits taxes; and if said Secretaries and the chairman of the board are unable to reach a unanimous decision in such matter, it shall be referred to the President, and his decision shall govern therein.

Senators will note that the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the board are not only authorized but they are directed to take such action.

With respect to the question of depreciation that is considered in this paragraph, I am frank enough to say that, to my mind, it is a fearful and a wonderful thing. To illustrate: A couple of weeks ago I had occasion, during the course of a speech I delivered in the Senate, to call attention to the activities of the American Woolen Co. I stated, among other things, that the capital invested in the business was $22,000,000 and that during the past six years that company had earned net profits in excess of $59,000,000; in other words, it had earned profits to the extent of nearly three times the amount of the capital invested in the business during the course of six years. In that connection I read from the New York World of May 13:

> An investigation completed by the Department of Justice shows the American Woolen Co. made a net profit of $19,000,000 in the first quarter of 1920, or within $1,000,000 of the total common stock capitalization of the company, according to information reaching the World to-night.
> According to the informant the investigation of the American Woolen Co. was begun two months ago, following the receipt of charges that it was profiteering in necessities.
> On the basis of $19,000,000 for the first quarter, the American Woolen Co. would earn total profits of $76,000,000, or nearly 400 per cent, on its total common stock capitalization during 1920.

During the course of the speech referred to I called attention to the fact that during the year 1919 that company earned net profits in excess of $15,500,000, and I now call attention to the fact that, according to a statement appearing in the New York World, dated April 28 last, those profits for 1919 were made after that company had charged off to depreciation $7,250,000, or practically one-third of the entire capital invested in the business.

I am utterly opposed to any such proposition. I do not believe for a single, solitary moment, and I venture to assert now that no other man, either within or without the Congress, possessing ordinary stage-horse sense, believes that the property of the American Woolen Co. depreciated practically one-third in the year 1919. So I am decidedly suspicious with respect to all these questions relative to depreciation.

But let me call the attention of Senators to the language of this paragraph:

> The Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the board are hereby authorized and directed to determine the amount of depreciation during each year—

For what purpose?

In order that the owners of such vessels shall, with respect to the capital cost thereof, be put as nearly as may be on a parity with the owners of ships under the flag of our foreign competitors in the world's carrying trade.

What does that mean? It means, as a matter of course, that as nearly as may be the amount to be allowed for depreciation shall be in such sum as to place the capital cost of American ships on a parity with the capital cost of foreign ships.

I read from a little pamphlet entitled "For an American Merchant Marine," issued by a committee of American shipbuilders, 30 Church Street, New York. Among other things this pamphlet states:

> About one-half of the cost of a ship is represented by wages. * * *
> It is, of course, costing more in Great Britain and elsewhere to build ships now than it cost before the war. Our costs have also increased, and at the present time it is estimated by authorities that it costs about $30 a ton more to build a ship in the United States than it costs in the yards of Great Britain. According to one authority, the labor cost on an American cargo ship is approximately $65 per ton. The corresponding labor cost in a British yard would be about $35 per ton. This covers the difference in cost of shipbuilding.

It appears from that pamphlet that it costs approximately twice as much per ton to build a ship in the United States as it does to build a similar ship in a British shipyard, and I apprehend that the cost of shipbuilding in England is greater than the cost in any other European country. So in order to place these American ships, so far as capital cost is concerned, on a parity with the capital cost of foreign vessels, paragraph 3 directs the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, and the chairman of the board to fix a rate to be allowed for depreciation that will accomplish that result, and if the provisions of paragraph 3 are carried into effect it will mean that shipowners will be given credit for depreciation to the extent of nearly 100 per cent, and consequently there will be nothing left that will be subject to the operation of the income-tax laws.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I wish to address myself for a few moments to the pending question. From the beginning of the Republic down to this very hour the question of maintaining a merchant marine has been an all-absorbing one. Shortly after the Revolution we began the establishment of a merchant fleet. We did so by giving to American vessels a preference in the matter of import duties and by their exemption from port dues and tonnage taxes. As a result of that policy we built up an oversea carrying tonnage which in 1810 supplied 90 per cent of our foreign trade. At the end of the War of 1812 we lost much of our shipping, largely the result of our treaty with Great Britain, which compelled us to give to that country the same privileges in our ports as we accorded our own ships.

Our merchant marine, however, maintained its supremacy, and in the years preceding the Civil War we had a tonnage which carried about 60 per cent of our overseas trade. Following that war, or as the result of the war, perhaps, came the introduction of steel and iron ships, and then the people of the country turned to more profitable business. The development of industry through the introduction of machinery of every character, the opening up of the western country, the building of the railroads across the continent, all tended to attract the capital of America to business other than shipping. It was more profitable to engage in other lines of industry. So when 1910 came our overseas shipping had fallen into such decay that we carried only about 8½ per cent of our own foreign trade.

We would not have had, perhaps, for many years to come, if ever, a merchant marine, except for the recent war. There was a difference of opinion among our people and in all parts of the country as to just what we should do. On one occasion the Senate passed a bill providing for a subsidy or subvention; at another time the House of Representatives passed a similar bill. I was a Member of that House when it passed such a bill, as was the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], but we never seemed to be able to get together on this all-important question.

The World War came on, and we found America without any merchant shipping worth mentioning. Senators will remember that a few years previous to the war, when the then President, Mr. Roosevelt, sent our great naval fleet around the world, it became necessary to carry in foreign bottoms the coal to operate our own ships; we had not even coaling vessels enough flying the American flag.

During the two or three years before we entered the war we increased our shipping somewhat because of the demands on the part of Europe. Then when we went into the war ourselves we entered upon the building of ships, in the beginning not with the idea of establishing a merchant marine—that was not the primary thought in our mind—but we did it to win the war. We appropriated vast sums of money, and we built a great fleet.

Now, Mr. President, we have that fleet. With the ships already constructed and those under way we shall have a merchant tonnage second only to that of Great Britain. I want our fleet to be the greatest in the world; I want a return to the condition obtaining in the days before the Civil War, when the American flag floated from the masthead of vessels in every port of the world.

That, Mr. President, is the reason why, as a member of the Committee on Commerce, and as a member of the subcommittee that prepared this bill, I joined with Senators on both sides of the Chamber in an effort to bring into this body a measure that would maintain what we have and perhaps increase our fleet so that some day it will be the greatest in the world.

We have just adopted one clause in this section which exempts from excess and war profits taxes the incomes derived from the operation of vessels in the foreign trade, provided these taxes are invested in the building of new, modern ships which have the approval of the Shipping Board. The second clause of the section provides that American shipowners operating vessels built previous to the year 1914—in most cases old and obsolete ships—may, if they sell them, be exempt from all income taxes, provided that they invest the entire proceeds from the sale in the construction of new vessels in American shipyards. This provision, it seems to me, as much as any other in the bill, will assure the building of more modern, up-to-date American vessels.

Mr. RANSDELL. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CALDER. With pleasure.

Mr. RANSDELL. The Senator means if they invest the money in the construction of new tonnage, not in the purchase of new tonnage?

Mr. CALDER. In the construction of new tonnage.

Mr. RANSDELL. In the building of new tonnage in American yards.

Mr. CALDER. The second provision of section 25 of the bill is not effective unless not only all the profits on the sale of the old vessels but the entire amount received for their sale is invested in the building of new vessels, so that every old ship sold means a new vessel built.

These old ships are not going to be sold unless some such provision as this is inserted in the law. All we do, if we adopt it, is to provide for the building of more ships for the American merchant marine; and I will say to the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] that the maintenance of a great merchant fleet to carry the products of the farm and mine from his great State is essential to the permanent prosperity of his people.

Mr. President, permit me to relate an incident that happened to me the other day in New York. I sat next to a distinguished ambassador from a South American country, and he said to me that it was a rarity for ships flying the American flag to enter the ports of South America, and even in the exceptional case it is usually some old-fashioned freighter carrying a special cargo. He said that from his port, which was the city of Montevideo, ships sailed weekly for Italy, Spain, Germany, and England, but there were no regular sailings of ships to North America. The result was that despite the fact of our nearness to South America, our natural interest in it and theirs in us, we were doing little or no business with them. He very truthfully stated: "You can make all the business connections you like, unless you have American tonnage passing to and fro from our ports to yours you are never going to build up with us a real, permanent business. Our foreign trade to-day," he said, "is controlled by Italy, Spain, Germany, and England, and if you want your share of it you have got to have an American merchant marine to carry it."

So, Mr. President, in the interest of the farmers of the country, in the interest of the manufacturers of the country, in the interest of the miners of the country, and, above and beyond all, in the interest of the workers of the country and in the interest of the flag itself, I trust that the section objected to by the Senator from Idaho will be left in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words. The Senate will remember that the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], who moved to strike out all of the first paragraph of the pending section, stated the other day that he was heartily in favor of the second paragraph, and, from the statement made by the Senator from New York, it seems to me the second paragraph ought to appeal to every Senator who is especially anxious to have the American merchant marine built up and to have up-to-date, modern ships.

Now, with reference to the last paragraph, I will say that the situation is about this: As I understand, under the income-tax law, the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to make reasonable allowance for depreciation in determining the net revenues upon which income tax shall be paid, and in doing this he fixes the amount at about 3 per cent. The depreciation allowed in other countries is a much larger percentage than that, and as a result, of course, our people are handicapped and our shipping placed at a decided disadvantage.

The purpose of the third paragraph is to place in the hands of a body interested in the building up of the American merchant marine the power to meet that situation by putting our people upon a parity with others; that is the sole purpose of it, and I am satisfied that it will work out to very great advantage. I hope that the motion of the Senator from Idaho will be defeated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BECKHAM in the chair). The question is on the motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] to strike out the third paragraph of section 25.

Mr. NUGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (when Mr. BECKHAM's name was called). The present occupant of the chair makes the same announcement of his pair and its transfer as upon the preceding vote, and votes "nay."

Mr. DIAL (when his name was called). I am paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] and therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Announcing the same transfer of my pair as heretofore, I vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to inquire whether the junior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a general pair with that Senator, which I transfer to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BALL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I understand that, if present, he would vote nay on this amendment. As I intend to vote in the negative, I feel at liberty to vote, and vote "nay."

Mr. KING. I desire to announce that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM] and the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. KELLOGG] are necessarily detained on account of official business, being engaged in a hearing before the Committee on the Judiciary. Each of those Senators is paired.

Mr. WARREN (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN]. I inquire if he has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not voted.

Mr. WARREN. Then I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] is detained on business of the Senate.

I have also been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

So Mr. NUGENT'S amendment to the amendment reported by the committee was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the adoption of the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Did the amendment which has just been voted upon embrace two paragraphs? I was out serving upon a committee when the amendment was presented.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It did. It embraced the last two paragraphs of section 25.

Mr. KING. I desire to move to strike out the last paragraph, consisting of lines 22 to 25 on page 26, and lines 1 to 12 on page 27. I shall not debate the matter, because it has been discussed so fully heretofore.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator has moved to strike out the second paragraph.

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. NUGENT. That was embraced in my motion.

Mr. KING. As I understood the motion of the Senator from Idaho, however, it embraced two paragraphs.

Mr. NUGENT. It embraced two paragraphs; yes.

Mr. KING. That motion was defeated. Now I am addressing myself to one paragraph, with the hope that my motion will prevail; that whereas some of the Senators were satisfied with the first paragraph, and therefore declined to support the entire motion of the Senator from Idaho, they would be so much dissatisfied with the last paragraph that they could support my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment of the Senator from Utah to strike out the last paragraph of section 25.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is upon agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, referring to section 26, there is an amendment pending, offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], beginning with the words "The board and," in line 25, page 27, to strike out the remainder of the paragraph. That was discussed considerably, I think, the other day. I want to offer an amendment perfecting it before the amendment is voted on.

On line 5, page 28, I move to strike out the word "proper" and insert the words "just and reasonable."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 28, line 5, it is proposed to strike out the word "proper" and insert the words "just and reasonable," so that if amended it will read:

From time to time determine the just and reasonable rate of compensation to be paid for such service.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee whether or not the objection which was made to this provision was discussed under the head of its being a subvention or a subsidy to be paid by the Government of the United States to those engaged in the shipping business?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That proposition was presented in the discussion; and we also inserted, as the Senator will remember, an amendment in line 7 reading "within the limits of appropriations made by Congress." That proposition was discussed in connection with it.

Mr. KING. Under the present law would not the Postmaster General have the authority to make contracts for the transmission of mails by vessels?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No. He has authority to make contracts for carrying the mails at so much a pound—I think it is so much a pound—and he has had foreign mails carried, with the result that of the little over $3,000,000 that we have paid for carrying the mails in vessels we have paid about two and a half million dollars to foreign ships. That is what his reports show.

The purpose of this section is just this: In the first part of the section, to which no objection has been made, we direct that wherever it is practicable our mails shall be carried in American ships. This part of the section authorizes the Postmaster General and the Shipping Board to determine—as we have put it now—what is a just and reasonable compensation for carrying the mail over American lines, on American ships, within the limits of the appropriations made by Congress. They may find that in order to secure the establishment and maintenance of a desirable line of regular ships that will carry the mails of the United States—in addition, of course, to the other business they will do—it will require the expenditure of a little larger than the ordinary sum of money to have the necessary service rendered in connection with those mails. They are authorized to do that, and I will say frankly to the Senator that it is the purpose and the intention to have the board and the Postmaster General give what they consider proper encouragement to American lines to carry these mails and establish and maintain these lines. You may call it a subvention, you may call it a subsidy, or whatever you please; it is an aid to the upbuilding of an American merchant marine.

It has been suggested that we are taking unusual steps in this bill. We are. It is an unusual situation that confronts us. We would rather, at this time, go a little further than may be necessary than not to go far enough. In my judgment, this is the opportune time for placing an American merchant marine upon a substantial basis. If we do not do it now, the chances are that we never will. When we get it on a substantial basis, if we find that we are giving too much encouragement, we will cut it down.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KING. I would like to ask the Senator whether or not, under the provisions of the bill, the Government is compelled to utilize American vessels for the transportation of the mails regardless of the charges which may be made by the American vessels?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They are required to do it wherever practicable, and the Postmaster General is to fix the compensation according to the service rendered.

Mr. KING. There is no hard and fast rule; they are not compelled to do it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no.

Mr. KING. There is some discretion left?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes.

Mr. NUGENT. Before the Senator from Utah takes his seat, I desire to ask him if he does not think this section provides, in fact, for a subsidy, to the extent of the price to be paid for carrying the mail?

Mr. KING. I think there can be no question about it. All of the odium which attaches to the word "subsidy"—and there has been a great deal of odium necessarily and properly attached to it—applies to this section, and I, among the few who will vote against the bill, shall vote against this provision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] to strike out the last paragraph of section 26.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I desire to give notice that I shall reserve a separate vote upon this amendment in the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

EUROPEAN FINANCE AND AMERICAN EXPORTS.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I want to say just one word with regard to the question of finance in Europe, and I shall detain the Senate only two or three minutes.

Suffering humanity in Europe needs the surplus of American production with which to put the working millions of Europe back to work.

To extend such credits should not be regarded merely as an act of humanity or charity but as a matter of enlightened self-interest.

The productive power of Europe remains and the people of Europe can repay every dollar with fair interest which may be loaned to pay for material for productive purposes.

The Government of the United States is not expected as a Government to tax the people of the United States in order to make these loans, and no intelligent American ever thought of doing so. The American people will not be taxed on European loans. These loans merely represent commodities sold at war prices to be repaid with interest.

But under proper conditions English, French, Italian, German, Austrian, and other securities of Europe could be sold to the investing public of the United States at a fair rate of interest, and thereby enable our exporters to finance further American exports. Unless these credits are extended by means of the sale of European securities to the investing American public our export trade must be cut off to the extent of about $4,000,000,000 per annum, which is about the present rate of our excess exports.

I say Europe is not bankrupt. When France sells to her own citizens her own bonds the wealth of France is neither added to or taken from. France is reacting now and will steadily grow better.

I favor opening the doors for the sale to the American investing public of British, French, Italian, German, and Austrian securities in order to offset the balance of trade due to our present excess exports. As an economic fact America is obliged to extend these credits or cut off the foreign trade until Europe reacts from the dislocations of war.

Many people think that the loans to Europe are a tax on the American people. These loans will be paid back with interest and will not be a tax on the American people.

There is much misunderstanding about the loans to Europe, partly due to appeals to charity, such as that made by Mr. Davison. The effect of such appeals is to break down European credit precisely as an attempt is now being made to break down American credit for the benefit of those who have credits for sale in the United States and in Europe.

The United States Government should provide a mechanism by which to safeguard and market European securities in order to provide the credits and enable Europe to buy American commodities until Europe is in good running condition again.

Mr. President, Europe lent billions of dollars to the United States after our great war for reconstruction purposes and for building American railways, and we paid it all back with interest and discounts and commissions, and with large merchants' profits besides. Europe can and will do the same thing. They are intelligent, industrious, good people, and under democratic government will show the same great development in productive power which America has shown. Mr. Edward A. Filene, of Boston, is entitled to great credit for his efforts to bring order out of chaos through the American Chamber of Commerce and the International Chamber of Commerce along these lines. These efforts, however, are merely persuasive; it will require the cooperation of government to bring the needs of the people of Europe in concrete form before the American investing public. The United States Government is better qualified than any other power in the United States to protect the investors in the United States who might buy foreign securities. Great Britain does this, and the United States ought to protect its own investors, which it can do without any cost.

Mr. Filene's efforts were not sufficiently appreciated by the administration of the Treasury Department and did not result in any concrete matter of bringing European securities properly safeguarded before the American investing public. The representatives of European business men returned to Europe disappointed. They were the finest body of business men in the world, representing Great Britain, France, Belgium, Italy, and so forth. What is needed is a concrete method authorized by law and worked out in detail to bring European securities before the American investing public, which can absorb all that is necessary of these securities to supply the needs of Europe and, what is equally important, keep alive our export trade, which has been ruined under the stupidity of American mismanagement.

The total banking power of the world was fifteen billions in 1890 (Mulhall; see the report of Comptroller of the Currency for 1919, p. 16), while the American banking power of 1920 alone amounts to forty-eight billions.

The American people have the power. The American people have the good will. The American people need such a plan and merely require the mechanism. The Washington Post in an editorial this morning thinks the United States could not absorb three-quarters of a billion per annum, and speaks as if to offer such securities was an underhanded scheme to take advantage of somebody. Any bonds offered this country from Europe would have to be good bonds. If the German bonds underwritten by France, Great Britain, and Italy were offered this country, they would be good securities, and it would be to our great advantage to have the investing public of America buy them and thereby furnish the credits with which to finance our own exports. We need not consider the humane aspect. It is a common-sense, cold-blooded business proposition, absolutely for our own interests, regardless of the interest of Europe.

We must remember, however, that the interests of the world are bound together, and, as far as I am concerned, I want it distinctly understood that, while I was in favor of using every energy of defeating German soldiers on the battle field under their military leadership which threatened the liberties of mankind, now that the evil is removed and military dynasties are ended I say, "In the name of God, let us have peace," and let us regard the German people as poor human beings, like ourselves, the children of the Great Father, entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Our own welfare requires us to deal with them in a spirit of humanity.

What reason have we to question the honor or the will or the ability to pay of the British people? They are the greatest manufacturers and merchants and sailors in the world. They will pay every dollar; they always have done so; they always will do so.

If the men of Belgium were willing to die rather than break faith, who shall question their willingness to pay whatever they borrow? They, too, are great manufacturers and merchants.

When the French people were willing to die to the last man and last woman on the battle field rather than submit to wrong, who shall question their honor in repaying what they may borrow from us? They are the most ingenious, the most industrious, the most thrifty people in the world. They will pay every dollar they owe.

And what about Italy? Where will you find a nation with a higher record of integrity? The Italians are a wonderfully brave, resourceful, and upright people; they pay their debts; they know how to pay them, for they are industrious, thrifty. They have genius as merchants, as manufacturers, and in agriculture as well; there are no better people in the world than the Italians, and no nation in the world ever made such a record for courage and virility as those who established the Roman Empire and taught the world the art of government. For 10 consecutive years before the war 3½ per cent Italian Government bonds were sold at 10 per cent above par. No one has a right to question the ability of the Italian people to meet their obligations, nearly all of which are held by the Italians themselves.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Oklahoma if he is referring to Government credits?

Mr. OWEN. I am not. I am referring to private credits, through the investing public of the United States. I do not believe the Government of the United States ought, as a Government, to extend credits.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am very glad to hear the Senator say that. I know that from some influential sources the proposition has been put forth quite recently that the Government should furnish commercial credits for the purpose of supplying Europe, and also the proposition has been made that the Government should guarantee German loans. Acts of that kind in time of war, and for war purposes, might possibly be justified constitutionally as a part of the war powers of the Nation, but I did not assume that the Senator from Oklahoma would hold that any such authority as that existed as a proper governmental function in time of peace.

Mr. OWEN. It could only be done, I assume, by act of Congress, and I think everyone would be opposed to that, because that is not a proper use of the power; but to have the Government of the United States provide a mechani[illegible] through which the securities of Europe might be offered to investors in the United States would be an advisable thing, because unless we do have those European securities digested in the United States it will be impossible to keep up our exports as we have been doing heretofore.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think that is undoubtedly a proper governmental function and one deserving of proper attention, but so far as the extension of governmental credit is concerned——

Mr. OWEN. I do not think anyone is in favor of extending governmental credit.

Mr. POINDEXTER. There are, I am sorry to say, a good many people who are in favor of it. I notice that Mr. Davison, for instance, of New York, as he is reported in the press a few days ago, advocates half a billion dollars of Government credits. The Senator from Oklahoma says it could not be done except by act of Congress. I fail to understand how it could be done even by act of Congress, because I fail to understand how it could enter into the legitimate functions of the Government.

Mr. OWEN. I do not believe in time of peace it would be properly within the legitimate functions of the Government. I agree with the Senator in regard to that.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we passed over section 29, on page 30. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] desires to offer an amendment to that section.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to strike out all of section 29, after the word "act," line 16, page 30.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 30, line 16, after the word "act," strike out the rest of the page, down to and including line 7, on page 31.

Mr. McCUMBER. I appreciate, Mr. President, how difficult it is to get a real vote upon the merits of any motion to amend, due to the fact that Senators are busy in their committees and absent themselves, and only come back to vote, and necessarily they will follow the advice of the committee on those votes, as we all do. I want to read the provision which I move to have stricken out:

> No agent or employee of a common carrier shall check baggage, issue bills of lading, or otherwise arrange for through carriage of property between ports or places in the United States, including Districts, Territories, and possessions embraced within the coastwise laws, when all or any part of the carriage is in a foreign vessel, and no person in the capacity of agent or otherwise, directly or indirectly, by means of a ticket, understanding, order, or any form of contract whatsoever, shall sell or contract to sell to any person the right to travel by water, or by land and water, either directly or via a foreign port, or for any part of the transportation, on a foreign ship, between ports or places in the United States, including Districts, Territories, and possessions embraced within the coastwise law. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction, be fined in any sum not exceeding $1,000.

During the summer months there is considerable travel, both by Americans and Canadians, through the Northwest Territory and up to Alaska. Under the provisions of this section, if I wished to go from St. Paul to a point in Alaska by way of the Soo Line, for instance, I could not get a through ticket from one point to the other, but I would be compelled to get off at Portal, we will say, in North Dakota, on one side of the line, hire a drayman to get my trunk over to the other side of the line, wait 24 hours for the next train, and then take that train to go on to Alaska.

That kind of a provision is not helping the American railroad and it is not helping American shipping any. All it does is to inconvenience the American traveler, because if his business or his pleasure is such that he desires to go by a Canadian road he will do so, even though he has to submit to the extra inconvenience of buying tickets from one point to another.

Let us take a Canadian in St. Paul or Minneapolis who wants to go to Alaska. Possibly he has visited Banff and Laggan and the Canadian mountains and he would like to see some of our American scenery along the Northern Pacific or the Great Northern. He might desire to stop off at some of our beautiful parks, like the Yellowstone Park or the Glacier Park, and then go on to Victoria, and from Victoria take a Canadian vessel to some point in Alaska. He could not purchase a through ticket. He could get, perhaps, as far as Seattle. When he got to Seattle there might be a Canadian boat which he could take from that point to some point in Canada, but he could not get a through ticket to Alaska, because he has to travel part of that time through his own country. It so happens that most of that travel would be along the inland waterways, and that would take him some thousand miles, or nearly so, through Canadian territory. I do not know how often we run our American boats from Seattle, or from any other point, but I would not want to go there and then have to wait a week for the next American boat. If there was a Canadian boat going right along at the time, I should want to leave there, and I would take the Canadian boat, if it was necessary, even though I had to go to the extra trouble of getting off at a certain point and buying another ticket and transferring baggage, and so forth.

I do not think the general coastwise provisions ought to apply to travel between Alaska and the United States, where it is almost necessary over some of the lines of road that you go through Canadian territory. I can see nothing to be gained by it except inconvenience.

I know the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] says that that is a part of the provision of law to-day, and that this is simply to prevent an evasion. If the law reads so that it will compel me to get off at a point on one side of the line and then go across to the other side and buy another ticket in order to get through that territory, I say it ought to be changed.

So, on the other hand, I have traveled many times between St. Paul, Minneapolis, and Seattle by the Northern Pacific and by the Great Northern Railways. I might want to take a trip to Alaska by way of the Canadian Northern or the Canadian Pacific; I might desire to stop off at the beautiful Lake Louise, at Laggan, or at Banff for a day or two and go on to the place to which my baggage is checked. I can see nothing to be gained for American commerce by inconveniencing me and making it difficult for me to travel from a point in the United States to a point in Canada, or a point in Alaska beyond Canada, where I am compelled, if I go to those places with a stop-over privilege, to pass through Canadian territory.

I think if the law is evaded it ought to be evaded by any possible way it can be. I am a strong supporter of our coastwise trade and of passengers and freight carried in American vessels, but we are compelled to go through Canadian territory very often, and to me it is just as unreasonable as though you would prevent me, if I wanted to go to Great Britain and France, and there was an American line which went to France, from going through Great Britain and taking another British ship across the channel to France, but should compel me to go to France first and then arrange to go from France back to Great Britain.

If I thought there was any real good to be subserved to the American cause by a provision of this kind, I certainly would support it; but I can not understand any benefit to be obtained through it. About all I can see is an immense inconvenience to the traveling public who go to Alaska, either by way of the American roads to Seattle or by way of the Soo Line or the Great Northern line up to Winnipeg or Banff or other section of the country. It seems to me we should not impose those penalties on our own people.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, as I understand the coastwise shipping law now, being chapter 20 of the act to amend the law of 1898 relating to navigation, it prohibits any goods from being carried between ports of the United States by foreign vessels, and prohibits the carrying of passengers between any ports of the United States by foreign vessels.

If that law is indefinite and does not include the possessions of the United States, I do not know that I have any objection to it being made clear upon that point; but certainly if so administered it would prohibit the carriage of property or passengers between a port in the United States, say San Francisco or Seattle, and a port in Alaska or Hawaii or the Philippine Islands, but it does not prohibit an American from traveling to Vancouver on an American boat or an American railway and there purchasing a ticket and going from a Canadian port to Alaska upon a British ship. It seems to me the amendment, if that is the idea, is too broad.

I have no objection to protecting in every way the American coastwise traffic, and American coastwise traffic including the possessions; but it does seem to me that if a passenger desires to go by rail on an American railway or a Canadian railway to Vancouver, he ought to have a right to buy a ticket through from the Canadian port of Vancouver to an Alaskan port or any other port in our possessions. It appears to me that this is going beyond the real necessities of such law.

It must be remembered that the American railways always maintain agencies, not only in Canada but in other foreign countries, and there they sell tickets on Canadian railways and Canadian steamships in connection with American railways to American ports, both within the continental United States and our possessions. It seems to me that the amendment ought not to be adopted in such broad language that it will hamper travelers and compel them to break their journey and recheck their baggage or make new bills of lading for the transportation of goods through a foreign port.

With that in view, it seems to me that I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, in the act of February 17, 1898, Fifty-fifth Congress, it is provided in section 8 that—

> No foreign vessel shall transport passengers between ports or places in the United States, either directly or by way of foreign ports, under a penalty of $200 for each passenger so transported and landed.

In construing that provision the Attorney General rendered an opinion which, it seems to me, is entirely contrary to the language of the act itself. He said it must apply to a voyage entirely by water by vessels between ports of the United States. It seems to me perfectly plain, and it was the declared intention in the discussion in connection with the bill, that all the passenger travel, as well as the freight travel, between ports in the United States by vessels should be confined to American vessels. That provision was in the interest of an American merchant marine and the building up of the American coastwise trade. It was not passed with a view to any special circumstance or any special situation, but simply because the Congress that passed it believed that it was in the interest of the United States to have its coastwise trade, both passenger and freight, confined to American ships.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Does the Senator understand that it is the intention to prohibit a passenger from traveling from Seattle to Vancouver and there buying a ticket and traveling on a British or a Canadian boat to some of the possessions of the United States?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Not at all. We are not attempting to do that.

Mr. KELLOGG. Very well. Then, if a passenger may do that, why hamper him so that he may not check his baggage through on that boat?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The question of changing our coastwise laws is a different question from this. If it is proposed to do that, then, of course, we would consider that upon its merits. Personally I would be against that, as far as that is concerned.

It is no special inconvenience to an American traveling, especially for pleasure, as has been pointed out here, to change trains or to change boats, and I am willing personally to put him to that inconvenience if by so doing I encourage our own shipping. I think that every American citizen ought to be willing to subject himself to a little inconvenience in order to encourage and build up our merchant marine.

Take this situation, and it is a concrete example that illustrates what we are aiming at here: We have a ship line from Seattle to Skagway. Those are American ports, Seattle under American jurisdiction and Skagway under American jurisdiction. We have a direct competitor with our shipping in Canadian shipping. It seems to me that whenever we can legitimately give an advantage to our shipping we ought to do it.

I am not interested in the Canadian shipper. He does not need any solicitation upon our part. He will look after his own interests, and he is doing it. He is protesting against this legislation now. Why? Not because it injures us, but because it injures him, because it interferes with his business and interferes with a business that he has built up under a system of subsidies or subventions, which his Government does not hesitate to grant in the interest of his shipping.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, will the Senator explain to me how it is in the interest of American shipping to inconvenience me if I want to go by way of the Pennsylvania road to Chicago, from Chicago to St. Paul by way of the Milwaukee road, and by the Great Northern road from there on to Winnipeg, where I may have some business, and then I want to go on to Victoria, where I may have business, and from there on to Alaska? How are you hurting American shipping if you allow me to check my baggage right through or allow me to go through on a train that crosses over the boundary and goes on without compelling me to get out and to recheck my baggage for the balance of the way? Wherein is the one injured or the other benefited?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let us turn it around the other way. What injury is it to the American citizen who wants to go to Winnipeg and stop a day or two to get off and get a ticket, and then on to Seattle or some other point, so far as that is concerned?

Mr. McCUMBER. It is quite a little if he has baggage and a lot of other things to attend to. He may get a considerable difference in his rate of transportation if he gets a through ticket and a return ticket which will carry him on without the necessity of pulling his baggage off at all these points.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; and there is one thing that I am objecting to. They do get cheaper tickets. Why? Because the railroads in Canada give rebates and exceptional rates. We have no control of that by the Interstate Commerce Commission. We control our own carriers, but we can not control theirs, and in order to get business they have practices that we are not permitted to follow.

But that is not really the proposition in which I am interested here.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do.

Mr. THOMAS. If this proposed legislation is desirable, why would it not be well to apply it to that situation; that is to say, to apply the same rates to Canadian railroads?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should be very glad to do it.

Mr. THOMAS. It is not done and it does not interfere with traffic nor, I think, sensibly diminish or affect the revenues of our roads.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I would be glad to do it; I should like to do it; but I am not dealing with that problem now. Take a concrete situation, for instance, the traffic to Seattle and Skagway. If a man wants to go by the Canadian Pacific to Seattle, it is very easy to do so; he can go to Victoria and then buy a ticket for the boat to Seattle. He is not prohibited from doing that; he is not interfered with in doing it at all. If a person wants to go to Skagway from St. Paul or Minneapolis, he can buy a ticket to Seattle. There are American boats there; and there would be many more American boats and there would be a much better service if we could free ourselves from the clutch that the Canadian Pacific, through its Government-aided line, has on the business to our ports. The Senator says we might have to wait awhile for boats. We may have to wait some little time, but I do not think we will have to wait very long for boats if we would give the proper encouragement to our people to establish American lines.

I have here the Dominion of Canada report relating to mail subsidies and steamship subventions as controlled by the department of trade and commerce for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1918, with traffic returns for December 31, 1918, and I find on the first page of that report that they pay on the Pacific coast to a line from Victoria to Vancouver and Skagway $12,500 a year cash out of their treasury.

Mr. THOMAS. For carrying the mails?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They call it a subsidy or a subvention. They are required to carry the mail free. I think that is the reason; that is the general provision, at any rate; but the amount is paid as Government aid to assist in the maintenance of that particular line to do American business. Mr. President, we will not stop that, so far as that is concerned, but what we do object to is the situation that is permitted, for instance, in the city of Seattle, where the Canadian Pacific maintains an agency. When a traveler desires to go on one of their boats or upon their line from Seattle to Skagway, they will sell him a ticket from Seattle to Vancouver or Victoria, and then, at the same time, in the city of Seattle, they will sell him a ticket from Vancouver or Victoria to Skagway. Then he rides to Victoria or Vancouver on the Canadian boat, gets off that boat and boards another boat there, and goes on to Skagway. That is a clear evasion of our laws. All that this provision seeks to do is to prevent that practice. It does not prevent travelers buying tickets to Vancouver and then when they get to Vancouver buying tickets on to Skagway.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. McCUMBER. For information let me ask the Senator a question. If a Canadian, an American, or any other person should happen to be at Edmonton and desire to go to Montreal, he can go there by the way of a Canadian railway or he can take the Soo and then take an American railway all the way through on the American side from Portal, in North Dakota, to Montreal. Now, if he buys his ticket over an American railway is he penalized by the Canadian Government? Does the Canadian Government prohibit him from checking his baggage from Edmonton on to Montreal, part of the way over a Canadian road and part of the way over an American road?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Probably not; but I am not interested in what they are doing along that line.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not so much interested in what they are doing as I am interested in the convenience of people who travel; and if Canada is not imposing any such restrictions upon our people or upon our roads why should we, then, impose such restrictions upon them and upon our own people?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, they are imposing all sorts of restrictions upon our shipping in Alaskan waters, and they are using every possible means of securing the shipping connecting Alaska with continental United States.

Mr. McCUMBER. I am not dealing with the shipping proposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I am dealing with. We are dealing with the shipping proposition in the pending bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. No; the Senator is going further than that. He is dealing with transportation by both land and water.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. McCUMBER. And it is the provision affecting travel by land that I think is the most improper and inconvenient portion of the section.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am willing to cut out the provision in reference to land transportation; we can cut that out to meet the situation the Senator has in mind. What I am aiming at is to prevent the evasion of our coastwise laws. If we are to change those laws, that is another proposition; let us do it; let us consider that question upon its merits; but so long as we have a law that seeks to restrict transportation by water between ports of this country to American vessels, let us see that that law is not evaded and take the other question up on its merits as an independent proposition.

Mr. President, the sole purpose of this provision is as I have stated. We simply want to protect our shipping; we do not want to cause too much inconvenience to American travelers; and I do not think there will be very much inconvenience; I do not think there will be any inconvenience. I believe that every American citizen will be glad to suffer what little inconvenience there may be in order to encourage and build up American shipping. If there is any reason why we have not the shipping between our ports and Alaska to-day it is simply because of the different methods used by the Canadian Government to promote their own interests and to develop and maintain their shipping. I do not criticize them; I admire them for it; I admire them for what they do; I admire the activity which they manifest. Whenever any legislation is pending here that affects their interests representatives of their Government come here at once; they send letters to our State Department and become active to prevent our passing legislation in our own interest. I should like to see us merely take a leaf out of their book and look after our interests as they look after theirs.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it is very easy to surround this matter with a glamour in favor of maintaining American shipping. I wish I had the large map of Alaska here which I have in my office, for it would give a much better idea than Senators can have without a map of the location of Skagway, the port to which the Senator refers.

The Canadian Government has given a small subsidy for carrying the mail from Vancouver and from Victoria, the capital of British Columbia, to Skagway. Skagway is in American territory and is an American port, but from Skagway it is only 30 miles to the summit of the White Pass. From Skagway there runs a narrow-gauge railroad—the first one built in that section and the one which gave us our entrance to Alaska—over the White Pass down to White Horse, on the Lewis River, the main tributary of the Yukon. That railroad is about 150 miles long, but a little less than 30 miles, constituting that portion from Skagway to the summit of the White Pass, is in our territory. There would be no traffic at Skagway if it were not for the traffic that comes through there from the Yukon territory—from Dawson and eastern Alaska. As I have said, that was the original route of our entrance into Alaska. When the first stampede to Alaska occurred travelers went from Skagway over the White Pass. A citizen of my State built the wagon road there, but that was almost immediately superseded by the White Pass Railroad, a narrow-gauge road, built by Canadians.

Now, I will ask Senators to follow me for a moment. When a traveler goes by the Inner Passage, as it is called, from Seattle to Skagway, the first stage of the journey from Seattle to Vancouver is, I should say, between 100 and 200 miles. Then he must traverse British Columbian territory for a considerable distance up to the Panhandle of Alaska. He passes that, and goes by water through the narrow passage between the islands to Skagway, which is at the foot of the White Pass. When he gets to Skagway, if he desires to reach the interior, he has to go over the White Pass Railroad, over 100 miles of which, as I have said, is in Canadian territory. At the end of the railroad he will strike White Horse, as the place is called, on the Lewis River, the main tributary, I repeat, of the Yukon River. At that point steamboat navigation begins down to Dawson, the capital of the Yukon territory, a distance of between 400 and 500 miles, all in Canadian territory. Then when the traveler reaches Dawson there are still between 150 and 200 miles before he reaches American territory at Eagle, on the Yukon River.

Going down from Dawson the first station he reaches of any account is one called Fortymile. The town of Fortymile is on the Yukon River in Canadian territory, and the miners and the mines back of it on Fortymile Creek and its tributaries all have their outlet at the little steamboat landing called Fortymile. That is the only route by which our people can get into eastern Alaska in the winter. The Canadians have a stage route which in the winter they run in connection with their little narrow-gauge railroad from White Horse to Dawson. It is the only way by which our people can get into the interior easily and rapidly. Practically all the traffic and business of the Yukon territory, which is a part of Canada, and practically all of the traffic and business of interior eastern Alaska pass through Skagway, so that the traffic and commerce there is 90 per cent Canadian. The traffic furnished by Americans there is that of the people who desire to get into eastern Alaska by that route, it being the most convenient.

There is no other direct railroad route to navigation on the Yukon. The Copper River route goes up the Copper River to the mouth of the Chitna, and from there branches off to the copper mines. From the mouth of the Chitna River up to the head of navigation on the Tanana River, near Fairbanks, the distance is probably between 200 and 300 miles.

Our Government made a great mistake when they inaugurated railroad building in Alaska by not following that route. There was a good broad-gauge railroad built from the sea at Cordova up to the mouth of the Chitna and to the copper mines, and the Government made a great mistake by not adopting that line and building from the mouth of the Chitna River to Fairbanks, a distance of 200 miles. They could have built that road within the time that they have been building on the western side of the country and for all the money they have spent up to date.

What have they accomplished with the other end of the line? Instead of adopting that line, they adopted the line from Seward. They bought from the Canadians a dismantled railroad, half completed, unfit for real traffic, and they had to rehabilitate it from Seward up to the east end of Turnagain Arm—over 100 miles. They had practically to rebuild it. Then they had to build on the north side of Turnagain Arm, cut into the solid rock for a distance of nearly 100 miles until they got to Knik Arm, as it is called, and up there they have laid out a town. They have built the railroad up to that town near the mouth of Knik Arm or Knik Bay, and they have built a branch up to the Matanuska coal fields; but aside from that branch they are as far from the ocean to get to the interior of Alaska as they were when they started.

In other words, the whole distance from Knik Arm, which is the innermost part of Cook Inlet, is uncompleted, and I think we have spent between twenty and thirty million dollars, and it will probably take five or six years more before we get a road to the Tanana River by that route. So I say our Government made a great mistake when they did not start the road from Chitna. For the money that they have expended they could have had the road completed from the mouth of the Chitna over to Fairbanks.

As it is, this Skagway route is of great value to us. We need it. Nine-tenths of that Skagway route—I mean the land-and-river route—is in Canadian territory, and we get the full benefit of it. Now, you can not wonder if you know the situation there. As I said, while Skagway is on American territory, its whole trade and commerce come from Canada, from the Yukon country. If Seattle and the shipping interests there were limited to the traffic that could be gotten in the neighborhood of Skagway in American territory, they would not get enough to pay for running one boat a year. The traffic that comes there is mainly Canadian traffic, and that route is a great advantage to us; and now what is it that Seattle wants, and what is it that the shipowners want?

Here is a route, really an entrance into Canada, from which we get most of the benefit. We get the benefit of most of the Canadian traffic from Skagway. Here they say that you can not check your baggage through, and you must not buy a ticket on the railroad that will take you through. Now, is there not enough penalty in the law?

This coastwise law that has been quoted says that freight shall not be carried in a foreign ship from one American port to another under penalty of forfeiture. That is, the whole cargo, or that part of the cargo that is shipped from one American port to another American port in a foreign ship, according to that law, will be forfeited to the United States.

Now, we come to the matter of passengers. The first law that we passed was approved on the 19th of June, 1886. That law provided a penalty of $2 a head for anyone traveling in a foreign ship from one port to another port in American territory. By the law of February 17, 1898, Thirtieth Statutes, that was changed so as to provide a penalty of $200 a head for every passenger carried in a foreign vessel from one port of the United States to another.

The hardship of this law was called to my attention some years ago by a friend of mine who got stalled in the island of Hawaii. I think he was compelled to wait there two weeks for an American vessel. He wanted to go back to San Francisco. He waited two weeks. No American ship came. A foreign ship came, and he was so anxious to get home that he paid the $200 penalty. The penalty is inflicted on the ship, but, of course, the ship would not carry him unless he paid that penalty. They would not carry him for his mere ticket and then pay a penalty, and he had to pay $200 in order to get back home.

We are not seeking to change that law; but what is this? It is a hamstringing amendment, in the interest of Seattle, to require that you can not check your baggage, you can not arrange transportation, in American territory. Why, we have ticket agents in this city for foreign steamship lines, for Canadian railroad lines and, I think, for Mexican lines; but no one would think of ostracizing them or forbidding them to sell tickets here. The object of this provision is to forbid them selling tickets or checking baggage at Seattle on these boats; and I submit that, with the coastwise law as it is, as I have quoted it, we have restrictions enough. In view of the benefits that we have from the Skagway route, in view of the business and traffic we get from Canada in all that Yukon territory, and in view of the fact that it gives us an eastern door to Alaska, I submit that this proposed legislation is outrageous.

I want to say further that if it comes to the question of protecting American shipping I am ready to go as far as anyone. I have voted for some of these amendments that almost went against my grain. I voted for two provisions in this bill that are practically subsidies. There is a subsidy in giving them immunity from excess-profits taxes. I voted for that. There is another subsidy in giving the department the privilege of sending all our mail in American ships and paying them whatever the department may agree upon. I even voted for that. I am willing to try it; but this plan of inconveniencing American citizens in the way of travel—and I have been over this route to Alaska that I have described to you—this plan of inconveniencing American citizens in the interest of a few vessel owners at Seattle seems to me monstrous. I have traveled on the Yukon River over 2,000 miles. I have been over this narrow pass. I have been down the Lewis River from White Horse down to Dawson. I have seen the conditions there. I know that that route, from Skagway on, is a great help and benefit to us, and it is the one route that brings traffic to the American boats that come to Skagway.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, no one who knows the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] would question for one moment his intense patriotism and his devotion to American interests, and my high regard for him and the broad and patriotic view that he has taken of this measure in all its aspects makes it hard for me to press this committee amendment, and makes it difficult for me to oppose the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER].

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senator's own sense of justice has a good deal to do with it, also.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President, I do not see any injustice in it. I may not be able to look at it like my friends who take the opposite view; but, as I say, it is the view of the Senator from Minnesota, and his earnestness in the matter and what I know of his devotion to American interests, and especially his interest in Alaska and Alaskan matters, that makes it hard for me to press this amendment and oppose the proposal submitted.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield to me, I have been such a friend of Alaska that most of the legislation relating to Alaska that has been passed for 10 years I prepared and succeeded in passing here, and Senators who were here at the time will remember that I had to swear to pass some of the bills.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; but when the Senator started to swear the opposition faded away, and I was glad that he did it, sometimes. Yes; the Senator has been a real, genuine friend of Alaska. He has, as he says, put through a great part of the legislation of the last 10 years of great interest to that country.

Mr. President, the situation, as the Senator has described it, with reference to Skagway and the Yukon River and the way to get into Alaska as it exists at the present time, is correct; but in conferring with the Secretary of the Interior and those having charge of the Alaska Railroad, they are very confident that the Alaska Railroad will be built into Fairbanks by 1922. Then we will have, if they are correct, access by railroad from the terminal ports to Fairbanks on the Yukon; but I can see no special force in the argument even from the situation that confronts us there now. It is true that to go by way of Skagway and down the Yukon River to get into our territory we must go through a long stretch of Canadian territory; but they can not get into their territory, especially through their steamship lines, without going through our territory. It is not a very great distance, that is true; and then we go along the Yukon River through their territory a much longer distance.

Now, I want to refer just for a second to the suggestion of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] about selling tickets to points in Canada by rail.

This legislation does not prevent that. They can sell a ticket from Washington City, for instance, to Winnipeg, and from Winnipeg on to Vancouver, and from Vancouver to Seattle. That is all by land. This only prohibits it where a part of the trip is by vessel. Then they can not sell transportation on the vessel.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Mr. President, is it not absolutely necessary, in order to get into any part of Alaska, to take part of the trip by water?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, yes; but I got the impression from the Senator's statement a while ago that he had the idea that if this bill passes we could not sell tickets from points in this country to land points in Canada, and so forth.

Mr. MCCUMBER. Oh, no.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is all right, then.

The Senator suggests that all of these foreign steamship companies have agents here in Washington selling tickets to all parts of the country, and he asked if we wanted to ostracize them in Seattle. We do not have agents here in Washington selling tickets for transportation between points in the United States by water. The only place where that is done is in Seattle, and that is what we desire to stop.

Now, Mr. President, I am going to leave this proposition to the Senate. I think the Senate understands the situation, and I am going to leave it to a vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to call up section 37, on page 53.

Mr. LODGE. That is the section as to which I desired to make some inquiry of the Senator from Washington, because it is a very important and far-reaching section. It reads:

That in the judgment of Congress articles or provisions in treaties or conventions to which the United States is a party which restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminating customs duties on imports entering the United States in foreign vessels and in vessels of the United States, and which also restrict the right of the United States to impose discriminatory tonnage dues on foreign vessels and on vessels of the United States entering the United States, should be terminated, and the President is hereby authorized and directed, within 90 days after this act becomes law, to give notice to the several Governments, respectively, parties to such treaties or conventions that so much thereof as imposes any such restriction on the United States will terminate on the expiration of such periods as may be required for the giving of such notice by the provisions of such treaties or conventions.

The imposition of discriminating tonnage duties was the policy of this country from the foundation of the Government down to 1815, and it was a policy which was believed to be of great advantage in building up the carrying trade of the United States, which during that period was enormous.

In 1815, after the treaty of Ghent, the same negotiators made a treaty, the treaty of London, which contained this clause:

No higher or other duties or charges shall be imposed in any of the ports of the United States on British vessels than those payable in the same ports by vessels of the United States; nor in the ports of any of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe on the vessels of the United States than shall be payable in the same ports on British vessels.

The same duties shall be paid on the importation into the United States of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's territories in Europe, whether such importation shall be in vessels of the United States or in British vessels.

That is the substance of it. It destroyed the tonnage discriminations which up to that time had been the settled policy of the United States.

That treaty was extended in 1818 for 10 years, and in 1827 was made indefinite. I recall very well that Senator Frye, who gave a great deal of his long public life to efforts to build up the American merchant marine, always said that that provision in the treaty of London in 1815 was the beginning of the decline of the American merchant marine.

That same clause is found in other treaties. It extended from our relations with Great Britain to other countries very naturally. I think there are some 22 such treaties, but I am not perfectly sure. I have not had opportunity recently to look them all up.

The change which is proposed here, I need hardly say, is a very important one. It is a return to the old policy of the country at the beginning of the last century, and it requires the termination of these clauses, of which I have read one, in all the treaties.

I have not had time to examine this bill as I ought to have done, and I am seeking, after this long preface, to find out from the Senator from Washington the grounds on which the committee rested this change of policy. I am not discussing it at all in a hostile spirit, but it is of such importance that I should like to be informed, and I think the Senate ought to be informed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I shall give the Senator briefly the reasons why the committee proposed this amendment. The Senator is mistaken in the suggestion, however, that it means a return to the discriminating-duty policy. It puts us in a position where we can return to it if we think it is wise to do so.

Mr. LODGE. That is correct. I was speaking hastily and a little too strongly. It opens the door for a return to that policy, which has been advocated by both political parties.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is unshackling us. The Senator from Massachusetts has stated correctly when the policy was begun, and he has stated correctly the situation when it was started. Our merchant marine under the policy of discriminating duties, which was adopted by the fathers, was built up very rapidly. Whether that was the sole cause or whether it was the substantial cause, there may, of course, be room for argument. Nevertheless, the fact is that we had very little merchant marine when this policy of discriminating duties was started, and it was started by the fathers with the deliberate purpose and intention of building up the American merchant marine.

The American merchant marine was built up, and in 1815, when the treaty was made, we were carrying about 90 per cent of our foreign commerce under our own flag. There may be differences of opinion as to the effect of the treaty and the policy inaugurated by the treaty. Personally, I have no doubt in my mind but that the policy begun then was largely ultimately the cause of the decrease in our merchant marine. But I am not going into that; I am not going to discuss that.

As the Senator from Massachusetts said, both political parties have urged that we return to the discriminating-duty policy. We have placed provisions of this kind in several of our tariff bills. In the Underwood-Simmons tariff bill a provision specifically providing for discriminating duties was inserted. It was nullified by the decision of the Supreme Court, based largely upon the fact that nearly all of our trade was covered by treaty. The provision in the Underwood-Simmons bill expressly provided that it should not apply to countries with whom we had treaties, so there were very few countries left for it to apply to. As the Senator said, I think we have some twenty-odd treaties.

The Republican Party in 1896 declared specifically in its platform for a return to the policy of discriminating duties. So while it is not a party question, it is a proposition which has been advanced by both political parties, and the principal argument which has been urged against it of late years has been because of the treaties which we have.

The sole purpose of this amendment is to provide for the termination of those treaties; in other words, to unshackle us, and to put us in a position where, if we deem it wise to adopt the policy of discriminating duties, we can do so. We can not do it now. We are bound; we are tied hand and foot, so far as we are concerned.

What about other countries? This war has turned things upside down. It has done away with many of the commercial relations of the different countries of the world, and especially the countries of Europe.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to suggest to the Senator that there was another reason, in addition to the one he has assigned, why it was thought by many impracticable for us to return to the old policy up to the time of the beginning of the World War.

It was a fact that we had no merchant marine to speak of, and if, with our small ocean fleet, we had undertaken to impose discriminating duties, we would undoubtedly have been met by a crushing retaliation on the part of the nations upon whom we depend for the bulk of our ocean transportation. That situation does not exist now, and what we could not have done with any success under the conditions which existed before the war, we can do now, I think, with safety.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think there is much force in the suggestion of the Senator from North Carolina. We are not seeking a war of retaliation, but, Mr. President, we are not running away from it. As the Senator said, we are in a better position now than we ever were to meet a war of retaliation. I do not anticipate retaliation. I believe that when we get these treaties nullified we will proceed at once with the other countries of the world to initiate and formulate new treaties under which our rights will be a little better protected than they are now. There is not any country on the face of the earth, in my judgment, which wants to go into a contest of retaliation with us.

But, Mr. President, as we are now, we are practically helpless, and I am going to call the attention of the Senate to the situation which has developed during the war, which emphasizes that position.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, does the Senator approve of legislation which, in effect, repeals or abrogates treaties, some of which, as I understand, have been in existence for a long time, in a bill of this kind? This is a sort of a rider upon a general bill, and, as I understand the situation, it has the effect of modifying existing treaties.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if the Senator will allow me, it is a provision for terminating one clause in certain cases, as was done under the La Follette bill, and there are other instances. It is a perfectly recognized proceeding, and the treaties themselves provide for methods of termination. It is entirely in accord with our rights. There is nothing violative of treaties in it. In fact, I think it shows every possible courtesy.

Mr. KING. I, of course, understand that this is not a violation of our duty; that is to say, that we are not transgressing our power. We have a right to denounce or repeal any treaty; but it did seem to me that the proper and the courteous way would be to have a specific bill challenging attention to certain treaties, and repealing them.

Mr. LODGE. Where that has been done, it has always been done, I think, in this way, in a bill which made necessary the modification of the clause in a treaty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We are not going as far as we did in the La Follette bill.

Mr. LODGE. Not nearly so far.

Mr. JONES of Washington. In the La Follette bill we passed a provision of law directly contrary to the provisions of a treaty, and expressly abrogating them. Here we specifically give notice as to the treaties we provide for. We are doing this in the law, in an entirely proper sort of way. We could do it in another way if we wanted to. We could go on and pass discriminating duty legislation, and that would abrogate the treaties, but in a way that would be contrary to the spirit of the treaties, which, in many cases, require a year's notice.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. President, it has been some years since I went into this question, but if I recollect aright most of the contracts with reference to not granting discriminating duties are very limited, especially the one with the English Government. I think there is but one treaty out, and that is a treaty which was made with Japan. I think the balance of them are trade agreements. They do not stand on the basis of a treaty or have the integrity of a treaty. They are mere trade agreements between the countries, except the treaty which we made some 15 or more years ago with Japan. There may be another exception, but I think that is the only treaty, and if I recollect correctly, the trade agreements with the British Government relate only to continental Great Britain, and not to its colonies.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, there is only one question that occurs to me in connection with this matter. It will be noticed here that the President is authorized and directed within 90 days after this act becomes a law to give notice. In other words, within 90 days after this law takes effect he must give the notice. Most of these treaties provide in their terms for the method in which they are to be denounced. In other words, they prescribe the period of notice. I inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], who is an expert in these matters, and also the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], whether it would be in good taste to change that feature of the treaties and denounce them, contrary to the period provided in the treaties for denouncing them.

Mr. LODGE. The period provided in the treaty is 12 months.

Mr. NELSON. If the Senator will allow me further, suppose the treaty requires that a notice of six months or a year shall be given?

Mr. LODGE. I was going to tell the Senator just what it did require. It was made for 4 years and extended for 10 years in 1818. In 1827 it was continued indefinitely by special treaty for that purpose. Article 2 provides that it shall be competent, however, for either of the contracting parties, in case either should think fit any time after the expiration of 10 years—that is, after the 20th of October, 1828—on giving due notice of 12 months, for either contracting party to annul and abrogate this convention. The period of notice is 12 months.

Mr. NELSON. The point that occurs to me is, would it be proper to provide for 3 months' notice instead of adhering to that provision of the treaty?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator misapprehends the section.

Mr. LODGE. It simply requires giving the notice required by the treaty.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is provided that—> the President is hereby authorized and directed, within 90 days after this act becomes law, to give notice to the several Governments, respectively, parties to such treaties or conventions, that so much thereof as imposes any such restriction on the United States will terminate on the expiration of such periods as may be required for the giving of such notice by the provisions of such treaties or conventions.

Mr. LODGE. It is entirely proper in form, and is the usual way to do it. I have not looked up the treaties, but I think the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] will find that this particular clause is in a large number of treaties of amity and commerce. It is not the most-favored-nation clause. It applies only to England's possessions in Europe, but it is not the favored-nation clause.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no; not at all. As I said, it has been so long ago that my recollection of the matter is not clear, but my recollection is that it was by way of trade agreement and not direct treaty rights arrived at.

Mr. LODGE. I think the Senator will find it in a number of treaties.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. My memory has been refreshed by a friend in the last few minutes in reference to the English treaty. It was contained in the treaty of Ghent, which was made about 1815, but it was accepted and did not become operative until 1847 or 1848.

Mr. LODGE. There were two treaties made in 1815. One was made at Ghent and was the famous peace treaty. There was a second one, made at London, which went into operation at once, so far as this clause was concerned. They spoke of its termination, but extended it in 1818 and again in 1827.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It is my recollection that the discrimination, in duties at least, in part ran on far beyond that period.

Mr. LODGE. No; this covers the whole of the treaty of 1815—the convention of commerce and navigation—and provides that the respective ratifications shall be binding and obligatory upon the United States and His Majesty for four years from the date of the signatures thereof.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Then it was renewed.

Mr. LODGE. Then it was renewed in 1818 for 10 years, and expired on the 20th of October, 1828, and was succeeded by the treaty of 1827, which made it indefinite, and it has been in force ever since. I am very sure it was imported from that into many other treaties.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have here Document No. 2, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, in the form of a letter from the Acting Secretary of State, giving the different treaties that have clauses of this kind in them, and with reference to Great Britain it makes the same statement that the Senator from Massachusetts has made. It says:

> The treaty of July 3, 1818, was continued for 10 years by the fourth article of the convention of October 20, 1818, and indefinitely extended by the convention of August 6, 1827.

Then it gives the different treaties of the different countries. I think there are some twenty-odd, as the Senator from Massachusetts has stated.

Mr. LODGE. I think there are 22.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Senators can find it by getting the document to which I have referred.

We had some very interesting testimony before the Committee on Appropriations day before yesterday covering this very situation and disclosing to my mind even more cogent reasons than we had before for action upon our part along this line. Mr. Page, of the Tariff Commission, came before the Appropriations Committee and gave some testimony that I want to read to the Senate. It is not very long, and I think Senators will find it very interesting, as it bears directly upon the necessity of this action. He says:

> There has been no time for several generations when this work—

Referring to the work laid out for the Tariff Commission—> was of more far-reaching importance than it is now. Practically all of the commercial treaties and conventions that held the nations together six years ago have been ended either by war or denunciation. I must modify that statement to some extent; it is an exaggeration to say that "practically all" such treaties have been ended, but it is proper to say that the whole structure and fiber of commercial regulation through treaties and agreements have been mutilated to a degree which leaves it little more than chaos. Thus, in 1918 the French Government officially announced its intention to denounce all "commercial conventions containing the general clause regarding the most-favored nation and the consolidation of tariffs as well as treaties and agreements concerning commercial travelers and the exercise of a trade industry."

This report from the Secretary of State shows that France has announced her denunciation of the treaty between this country and France with reference to these commercial relations. Mr. Page continues: > to treaties with allied or neutral States, mentioning that treaties with enemy States do not require denunciation. Pursuant to this statement some 20 or more conventions of commerce and navigation were denounced. Notices were sent to Great Britain, Canada, Norway, Spain, Greece, and other countries.

> It applies—

This announcement—

Now, notice this:

> Similarly, Spain has given notice of denunciation of commercial conventions to Sweden, Switzerland, Netherlands, Norway, and Denmark.

And notice this:

> Italy gave notice to Spain, France, Japan, Roumania, Serbia, Switzerland, and Greece.

The countries of Europe are unshackling themselves so far as each other is concerned. They are not breaking the shackles from this country, except that France has given a notice denouncing her treaty with us. She is preparing herself for the whole world trade in the contest that is coming on; but you will notice that those countries are denouncing the treaties among themselves, at any rate, in Europe. Wherever they consider the treaty with us to their advantage, I have no doubt they will let it stand.

Mr. THOMAS. May it not be that in so doing they are just qualifying themselves for membership in the League of Nations?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not want to get into that discussion this late in the day.

Mr. Page continues:

> Similar notices have been given to one or more countries by Norway, Greece, Sweden, Bulgaria, and Great Britain.

Great Britain is unshackling herself wherever she feels bound.

> The rebuilding of treaty relations in regard to commerce will be in some respects the most important work of the near future.

It has been suggested that if we denounce these treaties, there will be retaliation, and that we will have all sorts of complications with these other countries. Two nice young men were down here from the State Department the other day to see me, splendid fellows, I have no doubt, and they said they were afraid we would get into trouble if we passed this provision. They were afraid that it would cause an offense to Great Britain and these other countries. They were afraid that those countries would begin to impose restrictions upon us, and they said, "Do not do it." But listen to this. They are not waiting to denounce these treaties. Listen to what they are doing:

Perhaps equally important as the terms of the treaties in affecting commerce are the terms of tariffs and allied matters of commercial restriction. Careful watch will need to be maintained on the legislative activities of foreign countries during the next few years while their new policies are in process of formation. Indications multiply of the growth abroad of a sentiment of restriction and monopoly. This might be illustrated by the attitude of many public men in the United Kingdom toward the intraimperial preference.

Listen to this:

Already the discriminatory export duties on tin in the Straits Settlements, on hides and skins in India, on palm kernels in Africa, are materially felt by American business men. This reactionary policy in "free trade" England prepares us to understand the more extreme proposals that are gaining currency in other European countries.

In other words, they are already imposing restrictions and regulations with reference to the trade over which they have control to benefit themselves.

Mr. Page stated a little further on in the testimony before the committee, of which this was merely a summary, that in the matter of tin they give a decided preference when the tin is brought into England or Great Britain, and give us no benefit of it when it comes here.

Now, Mr. President, that shows what they are doing, and it shows the necessity that there is upon us to place ourselves in a position where we can deal with these people. If we are unshackled, we can say to Great Britain, "We will do this or that; we will give you this or that favor if you will relieve our people from these discriminatory duties." That we can do if we have some way to meet them, which we have not now.

Mr. THOMAS. Did I correctly understand the Senator to say that Great Britain had abrogated these treaties?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; not so far as we are concerned. She is abrogating some treaties with certain European countries, but she does not want to have this treaty with us abrogated. She is all right under it. Our hands are tied to meet her discriminations.

Mr. THOMAS. I did not thoroughly understand that, and hence my question.

Mr. LODGE. I think that the statement of the head of the Tariff Commission, Mr. Page, seems conclusive that at least we should put ourselves in a position where we can be free to meet the discriminations which are being made against us by Great Britain certainly, and by some other countries, not with a view necessarily to our making any retaliatory measures but at least leaving us free.

Mr. JONES of Washington. With that statement of the Senator from Massachusetts and with these facts before the Senate, I do not think I will take the time of the Senate further. I might call attention, however, to the message of the President the other day, Document No. 272, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, sent down here May 17, 1920, with reference to the oil situation. I find a statement like this with reference to the British Empire.

The policy of the British Empire is reported to be to bring about the exclusion of aliens from the control of the petroleum supplies of the Empire and to endeavor to secure some measure of control over oil properties in foreign countries. This policy appears to be developing along the following lines, which are directly or indirectly restrictive on citizens of the United States:

1. By debarring foreigners and foreign nationals from owning or operating oil-producing properties in the British Isles, colonies, or protectorates.
2. By direct participation in ownership and control of petroleum companies.

If we abrogate these treaties we will have a club in our hands to meet that situation that England is developing with reference to the oil situation.

I shall take no more time, however.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not pretend to know very much about this subject. The discussion of it has been very illuminating, and if the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Massachusetts are of the opinion that this legislation under existing conditions is wise I shall not oppose it.

I merely wish to say before a vote is taken that I can not consent to the suggestion that the decline of our merchant marine began with the negotiation of the treaty of 1815. In saying that I, of course, want to express the most profound respect for the opinion of the former Senator from Maine, Mr. Frye, my acquaintance with whom was very slight, but of whom I always entertained the very highest opinion. The golden age of the merchant marine was in the thirties, forties, and early fifties, at a time when this treaty was in force, and beginning long after the period of its original ratification. There is no question but that Great Britain has been, and I think very wisely, husbanding all the oil resources of her immense dominions.

There is no question that the contest for the world's trade will be fiercer after the war than it was before, hence producing those antagonisms which we are told by high authority make for the plans and purposes of war. I want to see my country in a position to hold its own against any and all nations of the world in any such line of competition. So far as the oil resources of the United States are concerned, however, it may comfort some of the Senators upon this floor to know that in the shales of Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, and Wyoming there are many more times the number of gallons and barrels of oil than have ever yet been taken from the bowels of the earth, and this immense and limitless reservoir of petroleum only awaits the touch of a commercial wand. I think that is coming, because the method for its extraction is, by experimentation, rapidly reaching the point where the stores of oil in the shales will become commercially available.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I simply quoted from memory what I had heard Senator Frye, who had given great attention to the subject, say. I suppose it may be said of the statement, as the Frenchman remarked, "No generalization is completely true, not even this one"; and I have no doubt that it was one of those broad statements that can not be held to comport accurately and absolutely with the facts throughout all time. I have not looked at the figures for a long time, but I think the Senator will find that during the period of the Napoleonic wars, say, the first decade of the nineteenth century—owing largely to other causes, undoubtedly, which were produced by the general war in Europe—the American share of the carrying trade of the world was larger than it has ever since been. I may be mistaken about that, but it was a situation about which England felt very badly at the time. There was a famous book written, which made a great sensation in that day in England, called "The Frauds of Neutral Flags," because they considered that we were taking away pretty much all of the British carrying trade.

It may have been merely coincident with the general decline; but certainly the great period of American shipping was in the thirties and forties, and, perhaps, even reaching as far as the fifties. We then had the immense advantage, of course, of abundant and cheap material from which ships were built.

I am glad to hear what the Senator from Colorado says about the shales; it is a great relief in contemplating the future, but at the present time the oil from wells is undoubtedly passing, by a settled policy, practically into the hands of England. Mesopotamia has passed into her hands, as has also Persia, and a similar course is being pursued in many other countries, the oil from wells being, I take it, very much cheaper than it is now possible to get oil from shales.

Mr. THOMAS. That is true.

Mr. LODGE. But, as the Senator has said, when the price of oil from wells reaches a certain point it will then be taken from the shales, and in that way we shall have an immense supply.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to section 37, the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there was a committee amendment, section 22, on page 24, which was passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. CALDER. On behalf of the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], I submit the amendment to the committee amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of section 22 the following proviso:

Provided, however, That whenever the board shall determine, as provided under this section or any other section, that trade conditions warrant the establishment of a service, or additional service, under Government administration where a service is already being given by persons, citizens of the United States, the rates and charges for such Government service shall not be less than the cost thereof, including a proper interest and depreciation charge on the value of Government vessels and equipment employed therein.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that amendment appears to me to be desirable, and I consent to its adoption so that it may go to conference.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if that amendment would not conflict with the idea of the establishment of new trade routes?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; I do not think so. The amendment only affects Government routes established in competition with a service already existing, as I gather from the reading of the amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I merely wish to be sure that we do not overlook the matter of establishing new routes. I very much hope that nothing will get into the bill which will prevent that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Florida may be sure that that will be looked after. He can not be stronger in favor of that than am I.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment to the amendment is agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The next amendment which was passed over is section 23.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I wish to make a motion to strike section 23 from the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Let me suggest to the Senator that the same purpose will be accomplished by having a vote on the adoption of the amendment. This is an amendment to the bill submitted by the committee, and the question will be on its adoption.

Mr. THOMAS. On the adoption of section 23?

Mr. NELSON. There was an amendment proposed to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; that has been agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I shall not detain the Senate in a further discussion of section 23. I addressed myself to that section several days ago. The purpose of the amendment is to extend the coastwise laws to the Philippines, which, of course, involves an ocean route some 10,000 miles long. I do not think it would be either wise or advantageous to do so.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I discussed this question at some considerable length several days ago, and I am not going to take very much time on it to-day; but there are some facts which I have here to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate, which emphasize, to my mind, the necessity and importance of this legislation.

I had a statement relative to the shipping of the Philippines, which seems to have gotten misplaced; but I can state, in a general way, what it shows, although I will not be able to give the exact figures. The statement shows that before the World War broke out our shipping in the carrying trade from the Philippine Islands to this country and back was less than 100,000 tons; my recollection is that it amounted to only something over 40,000 tons; while the shipping under the British flag, in the same business, was from 600,000 to 700,000 tons and the Japanese shipping amounted to some 500,000 tons.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will yield, I desire to inquire if he can inform me of the reason for such a condition of affairs as he has stated?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The main reason for it, of course, was that before the war we had practically no shipping under the American flag. A further reason is that the Japanese Government is behind its lines, gives them a large subsidy, and encourages the building up of Japanese shipping on the Pacific, and that the Canadians subsidize their lines across the Pacific, which is an aid to the British in developing their shipping. Those are the facts.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question. Does he not believe that the reason why we only had about 100,000 tons of shipping in the Philippine trade, while Japan had 500,000 or 600,000 tons, and England probably not quite so much, is to be found in the fact that practically the only ocean transportation the islands had before the war was furnished by Japan and Great Britain, and that those two countries probably gave better transportation rates and better transportation conditions for that part of the commerce of the islands which was taken to their respective countries than they gave to that part of it which they brought to this country? In other words, practically our only means of transportation with the Philippines was purchased from either Japan or Great Britain, and they were our competitors.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true.

Mr. SIMMONS. They were seeking that trade and we likewise were seeking it. They each secured about six times as much of it as we did. Does not the Senator believe that that was because these competitors of ours charged greater rates and imposed harder terms for transportation when they brought Philippine products to this country than when they carried such products to their own countries?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, they gave every favor possible to promote their trade.

Mr. SIMMONS. Does not the Senator think that just so long as that condition exists the United States will fail to get a reasonable part of the trade of those islands?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I do not think there is any doubt about that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am a member of the committee and I know that the provision of the bill which the Senator is now discussing stipulates that before the Philippines shall be made subject to our coastwise laws the United States shall provide ample transportation facilities between this country and the Philippine Islands.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is true; we were very careful to cover that phase of the situation.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from North Carolina knows better than I the history of tariff legislation as applicable to Philippine products; but under our tariff laws sugar and tobacco, which perhaps are the principal commodities of the Philippines, are prohibited from the markets of the United States except in a limited quantity, mentioned in either case; and the tariff laws of the United States have applied, with those exceptions, to the Philippine Islands quite as much as to the remainder of the world. Does the Senator believe that, so long as we treat the Philippines in that way, we are going to get much of their trade, no matter what our shipping facilities may be?

Mr. SIMMONS. Well, we will likely not get any very great amount of trade in those commodities in excess of the amount that we admit free. The Senator is correct.

Mr. THOMAS. Possibly, if we throttle her with our tariff laws and then attempt to encourage her traffic by extending the coastwise monopoly of our shipping to her ports.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator will remember, however, that at the time that provision was adopted the limitation to which he refers measured about the amount of importations from that country to this country. Practically the amount of tobacco and sugar that has been coming to this country from the Philippines has been coming free. Of course, if that trade increases, the excess will have to be covered in the tariff act.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. RANSDELL. I want to make just this observation: I can not see why we should have a different rule for Porto Rico and the Philippine Islands. Porto Rico was a dependency of Spain for a long time, and all the business that she cares to carry on with Spain now she carries on in Spanish vessels. She is only obliged to transport her commerce with this country in American vessels. We do not tie her hands as far as her trade with other countries is concerned, and the hands of the Philippines would not be tied by this provision in all of their commerce with other countries—with Japan, with Great Britain, or with all the rest of the world. They would be free to send their goods in the ships of those countries. It is only that portion of the Philippine commerce that would come to the United States and would go from the United States to the Philippines that would be included in this measure.

Mr. THOMAS. I agree that the rule, perhaps, is the same, but my objection is fundamental. I think it should apply to Porto Rico just as well as to the Philippines.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I appreciate that the Senator's objection is fundamental, so I am not going to take further time to discuss the matter, except merely to say that the committee feel that here is a marine commerce that belongs to this country. We can take it, and we ought to do it. We propose to furnish full, ample, and adequate shipping facilities from the islands before the coastwise laws apply, and that is all they ask. I talked with the Commissioner from those islands just the other day, and I said to him, "If we should furnish you ample and adequate American shipping, would you be satisfied to have our coastwise laws applied?" He said, "Yes; personally, I would; and I think it would be a good thing."

Mr. President, I consider this one of the most important sections of the bill.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I desire to inquire what is the pending question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is the amendment of the committee known as section 23. The Senator from Colorado has withdrawn his motion. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment known as section 23.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed to add at the end of page 11, as a new section, the following:

That where steamship lines and regular service have been established and are being maintained by ships of the Government other than ships of the board at the time of the enactment of this act, such lines shall not be maintained in competition with privately owned lines, except to the Panama Canal Zone, and such lines shall not operate to ports other than in the Panama Canal Zone and the island possessions of the United States, except to carry passengers, United States mail, or freight belonging to the United States Government.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, this amendment is offered so as to prevent the Panama Steamship Co., operating a Government-owned line between New York City and Panama, from entering into competition with privately owned steamship lines to other ports or with ships owned and operated by the Shipping Board. At present there are four American-owned lines which operate Shipping Board vessels engaged in the trade to the Isthmus of Panama and the West Indian ports. The Panama Steamship Co., the Government-owned line, is contemplating entering that service. In my judgment, that should be forbidden.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I hope the amendment will be defeated. It seems to me, from the amendments being offered by the Senator from New York, that it is the desire to tie the Shipping Board both hands and feet against establishing new lines unless they can get the permission and consent of somebody that happens to be operating a line at the present time.

As I understand the object and purpose of the bill, it is to try to build up an American merchant marine, and to get rid of the old monopolistic tendency that prevailed for years in handling our shipping industry. If, in every instance where there is a possibility of the Shipping Board coming in conflict with some private interest, we provide that the Shipping Board, regardless of whether or not it is a proper policy, shall refrain from doing so, we shall very much cripple the Shipping Board in carrying out its function and its purposes under the policy of the bill as I understand it.

It is true that the Senator has cited certain routes where the Shipping Board has established a line, or is contemplating it; but his amendment not only reaches to that particular trade route, and would not only interfere in that instance, but it would interfere in any other instance where there might be a service established, regardless of how inefficient that service might be. I think the adoption of these amendments that hedge about and curtail and restrict the Shipping Board will thwart and defeat the object of the bill if it is to build up a merchant marine, and to build it up free of monopolistic control.

I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the Senator is entirely mistaken in regard to the object of this amendment. The amendment is only aimed at, and under its very terms can only be interpreted as aiming at, a policy recently inaugurated by the Panama Steamship Co., a Government-owned concern, which proposes to operate its vessels in competition with Shipping Board vessels.

The amendment says:

That where steamship lines and regular service have been established and are being maintained by ships of the Government other than ships of the board at the time of the enactment of this act, such lines shall not be maintained in competition with privately owned lines, except to the Panama Canal Zone.

Now, I might cite the case of the United Fruit Co.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. NUGENT. Does the Senator's amendment apply to privately owned steamship lines that were placed in operation subsequent to the time the Government line was established?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. NUGENT. Then, after the Government has, at great cost to the people, built up a business, and if it is found that it is profitable, under the Senator's amendment the Government would not be permitted longer to continue the operation of its line, but must retire in favor of a privately owned line of ships.

Mr. CALDER. I misunderstood the Senator's question. If the Senator meant to inquire from me if the Government established the line itself first, then I answer "yes"; but what I had in mind was the line to Panama. Of course, our Government-owned Panama Steamship Co. has had in operation the line to Panama for a number of years, but my amendment clearly excepts the service to the Panama Canal Zone. The Panama Steamship Co., I will say to the Senator from Idaho, has just announced a service to Kingston, Jamaica, and to Colombia, places where they never operated before. We have to-day four American steamship lines operating to these ports, one of them, the United Fruit Co., operating by allocation Shipping Board vessels.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, the company to which the Senator refers is paying to the Shipping Board the charter price for those vessels, however?

Mr. CALDER. Oh, yes; but to-day we have four privately operated lines, all of them operating Shipping Board vessels, I am informed, which now would be required to compete with the Government, having no capital investment, having no overhead charges to charge up to the cost of operation; and certainly if the Government goes into the business of cutting rates, the Government can drive all of these privately owned lines out of operation.

Mr. NUGENT. The Senator does not think the Government would do that, does he?

Mr. CALDER. Oh, well, the Government has and the Government can carry freight to the Panama Canal Zone cheaper than a privately owned and operated line, but this does not attempt to interfere with that. It simply prevents the Panama Steamship Co., a Government-owned line, from going into competition in new fields and operating where Government-owned lines and where Shipping Board vessels could be operated; but it does not prevent the Shipping Board from instituting new lines to any part of the world.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator this question: Will his amendment apply where the Government has established a trade route and is operating ships, and a private company thereafter establishes also a steamship line?

Mr. CALDER. No; there are no such lines to-day. There is no Government-owned line operating anywhere except to Panama. There are no other Government-owned lines.

Mr. NUGENT. Then is it not the intention of the Senator through the medium of this amendment to require the Government to withdraw its ships from an established route when a private shipping company so desires?

Mr. CALDER. No; it is not. My amendment will prevent the Panama Steamship Co. from extending its operations into new lines where previously it has not operated, and driving out Shipping Board vessels under charter and under allocation to privately owned and operated lines.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, since I made my remarks a few moments ago I have had an opportunity to read the amendment of the Senator from New York. I was only speaking from a very casual idea of it as I caught it from the desk.

This amendment is even more objectionable than I first apprehended when hearing it read. It provides that the Government can not establish a trade route where heretofore Government vessels have been operated, whether under a contract at a stated price—of course, that is not in the amendment, but that is what it means—or whether it is a route that the Government itself has established.

One of the most ordinary contracts made by the Shipping Board is a contract that they shall operate, and be paid so much for operating. The Government, in its anxiety to establish the trade route and to get in touch with the new trade, allocates a ship or a given number of ships to a company, and the Government assumes all of the risk, carries all of the burden, furnishes the property, and pays the operating company a certain percentage for its operation. Where the Government has done that, assumed all the risk, exercised all the enterprise, and the only enterprise on the part of the company has been to make the money which they get out of operating it, this amendment provides that after the enactment of this law the Government can not continue to engage in carrying on shipping on that particular trade route. The Government had established the route. If there were any losses in the initiative, in the beginning of it, in creating the trade, the responsibility would be carried by the Government entirely, the company making all the money out of it. Then we say, "Forsooth, because you have been operating this business and enjoying that commission and running no risk, now we propose to turn that trade route over to you."

So I say, Mr. President, the amendment is more objectionable than I first apprehended it to be.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the Panama route by rail was built and worked under treaty. It was a Government operation, and the ships were operated in connection with the Panama Railroad. The Government did not start out to do a general merchant business through the West Indies. They created that line simply to take care of the railroad which they were obliged to keep open, and when they took over the railroad by becoming the principal stockholder, of course, they kept up the steamship line to it.

It does not seem to me that it is a very important question, but this line, maintained by the Government for a particular purpose, so as to have always a line to the canal and the railroad crossing the Isthmus, which was of the utmost importance, proposes apparently to go into a general merchandise business. I do not think it is very important, but that certainly was not the purpose of the creation of the line.

Mr. TRAMMELL. There is nothing stated in the amendment about this particular railroad.

Mr. LODGE. I was only speaking of the history of the line.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am speaking about the application of the amendment.

Mr. LODGE. It grew up as a necessary support to the Panama Railroad, which, as the Senator knows, for many years was the only means of transportation across the Isthmus.

Mr. CALDER. There are at present four American steamship companies maintaining a regular service from New York to Colombian Atlantic ports. The four companies are the United Fruit Co., Caribbean Steamship Co., Tropical Steamship Corporation, and Columbus Steamship Co. Of these companies the Caribbean Line operates privately owned and Shipping Board vessels, and the Tropical exclusively Shipping Board vessels. None of the four companies are securing full cargoes either way for their vessels; consequently there is more than sufficient tonnage actually in operation than the trade warrants. Owing to the larger size of the Shipping Board vessels, they particularly have a great deal of space available both ways on practically every voyage.

The entry of the Panama Line is not only absolutely unwarranted, but they are deliberately violating the provisions of the shipping act by entering into competition and reducing the established rates in order to secure business. Furthermore, the Panama Line, a Government-owned corporation, which has since its inception confined its activities principally to the transportation of Government supplies for the Panama Canal, is now entering on a policy of not only competing with private capital and enterprise but against Shipping Board tonnage. What prospect is there for private capital and enterprise after they have invested their money in American steamships and spending a great deal of time, effort, and expense in successfully capturing trade routes formerly dominated by foreign lines, when it is confronted with Government competition of the most obnoxious type? What possibility is there for these American steamship companies to strengthen their resources and establish themselves firmer in these trades? How can they be expected to invest further capital in American steamships?

So, Mr. President, the Panama Steamship Co., organized to operate just to the Panama Canal Zone, a day or two ago extended the operations of one of its vessels to Cartagena and other points in Colombia, its first trip out. Some of these other lines operating Shipping Board vessels are fearful that the continuance of this Government competition will destroy them and put them out of business completely.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Does the Senator know whether or not these steamship companies have leased those vessels from the Shipping Board and are paying them a stated, stipulated sum for their use, or, upon the other hand, are they operating under the customary contract made by the Shipping Board, that the Shipping Board assumes all risk and they receive a certain percentage?

Mr. CALDER. I can not answer the Senator's question. All I know is that two of these four lines operate Shipping Board vessels exclusively. I do not know whether they pay regular charter fees or not, but I know they operate Shipping Board vessels, and here we have a condition where a Government-owned line is entering into competition with other Government-owned vessels. It ought not to be permitted.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Will the Senator yield for another question?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. TRAMMELL. As a matter of fact, if they had those ships allocated to them, based upon one of their operating contracts, under which the Government assumes the risk and responsibility, and they absolutely are secure in making certain commissions, and if that is true of the Panama route, does the Senator think it is right for the Government to preclude itself from their operation and turn them over to those individuals; or does he think the Government should have the advantage of it?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I am absolutely opposed to the Government entering into a business of this character. The Panama Steamship Co., a Government-owned line, operates to the Panama Canal; it carries freight and passengers for the Government and for private business, and to say that this company, never authorized in the beginning for this sort of business, shall be allowed to continue to compete with privately owned American vessels and Shipping Board vessels throughout the whole of the Caribbean is, to say the least, a reflection on the business integrity of the United States Government.

Mr. SIMMONS. Do I understand the Senator to say that his amendment is only intended to prevent ships owned by the Panama Corporation, which is a Government-owned corporation, from competing with privately owned ships which are operating some of them in part privately owned and some owned by the Shipping Board and chartered or leased to this corporation, and that that is the only purpose?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; that is the only purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I doubt very much whether the amendment which the Senator has framed will accomplish exactly that purpose; but if that is the only purpose——

Mr. CALDER. That is the only purpose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it is not an objectionable purpose. I do not see why ships of the Panama Co., owned by the Government as an incident to the Panama Railroad, and whose functions were intended to be confined to certain territory and to certain business, should compete with private companies. I can see, if those ships are permitted to operate between Panama and New York, that they would come into competition with these other ships which are owned by the Shipping Board and operated for that board by some private company. If the Senator is willing that the matter should go to conference, to be changed so as to make it certain that only the purpose he announces here is accomplished, and nothing more, I shall not have any objection to the adoption of his amendment.

Mr. CALDER. I agree with that. That is just exactly what I want to do, and I agree that it shall be modified in any way at all to cover just that question.

Mr. NUGENT. As it is quite apparent that the bill is not to be passed this afternoon, I suggest to the chairman of the committee that action on this amendment may go over until to-morrow.

Mr. LODGE. I do not see why we should not pass the bill this afternoon.

Mr. NUGENT. There are a considerable number of amendments, I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts, still to be proposed to the measure.

Mr. LODGE. I hope we shall stay on, then, for a time.

Mr. NUGENT. That is entirely agreeable to me.

Mr. LODGE. I think we had better continue in session and try to finish the bill if we can. We have not been having late sessions or long hours, and I think the bill ought to be gotten out of the way to-day if possible. I should be very sorry to have it go over.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I suppose we are about ready to take a vote on the amendment, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Assistant Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Calder	Knox	Phelan	Thomas
Chamberlain	Lodge	Ransdell	Trammell
Curtis	McCormick	Reed	Underwood
Gronna	McNary	Sheppard	Wadsworth
Harris	Nelson	Sherman	Walsh, Mass.
Jones, Wash.	New	Simmons	Warren
Kendrick	Norris	Smoot
Keyes	Nugent	Spencer
King	Overman	Sterling

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

Mr. LODGE. It will evidently be impossible to obtain a quorum this evening without considerable delay, and I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, May 21, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, May 20, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou, who hast ever been the inspiration of men to great thoughts and worthy achievements in science, literature, art, statesmanship, religion; in Darwin, his predecessors and contemporaries; in Dante, Shakespeare, Milton; Washington, Jefferson, Lincoln and others; in Holy Writ which lives in our hearts as the "Book of Books"; continue Thou, we beseech Thee, to work in and through us to still greater thoughts and achievements for the good of mankind. Illustrated in the life and teachings of the Jesus of Nazareth. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ALLOTMENTS TO CROW INDIANS.

The SPEAKER. The conferees on the part of the House on the bill providing for allotments of lands to the Crow Indians have resigned on account of absence from the city, and the Chair appoints in their stead Messrs. CAMPBELL of Kansas, SINCLAIR, RANDALL, GANDY, and WEAVER.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. O'CONNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including an editorial from the Literary Digest.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by including an editorial from the Literary Digest. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 354. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to Paul E. Slocumb Post, No. 85, Grand Army of the Republic, Bloomington, Ind., necessary tents and cots for use at the State encampment to be held at said city May 25, 26, and 27, 1920.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

The SPEAKER. By order of the House, to-day has been substituted for Calendar Wednesday. The call rests with the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I call up the war-risk insurance bill, H. R. 13558, which was being considered at the time of adjournment on Wednesday, May 12.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the bill (H. R. 13558) for the purpose of improving the facilities and service of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and of further amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act as amended. This bill is on the Union Calendar, and the House automatically resolves itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. LEHLBACH] will please resume the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. All time for general debate has expired. The Clerk will report the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is hereby authorized to establish throughout the United States and its outlying possessions such regional offices, not exceeding 14 in number, and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to said bureau.

That there is hereby appropriated out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $1,000,000 for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, in view of the discussion had on last Wednesday with regard to section 1 of the bill, and in accordance with suggestions which I have received from other members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, I wish to offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Page 2, line 2, after the word "section" insert the following: "That this section shall be in force and effect for a period of not exceeding two years from and after the passage of this act.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I will say that in offering this amendment the thought of the committee was that it was neecssary to establish these offices immediately, and it was not the intention of the committee that they should continue indefinitely. As the House is well aware, the purpose of section 1 is to coordinate the Bureau of War Risk Insurance with the Public Health Service and the Vocational Board and to bring the various offices to be established into one building, so that they will cooperate in the service and come in close contact with the soldiers of the country, in order that a more efficient service may be rendered by the bureau.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. If that language is not added to this section, how long will it be in force and effect?

Mr. SWEET. That same question was asked during the general debate. There was a great deal of speculation about it. It would continue until Congress determined otherwise.

Mr. WALSH. Is the gentleman offering this as a limitation?

Mr. SWEET. Yes. In other words, it will require affirmative action on the part of Congress to continue these regional offices.

Mr. WALSH. And the gentleman's idea is to establish them for only two years?

Mr. SWEET. To establish them for two years; and they may be continued by Congress if matters work out properly and they render a service which makes them worthy of being continued. But if Congress takes no action these regional offices will be discontinued at the end of two years from and after the passage of this bill.

Mr. WALSH. Has the gentleman any apprehension that these regional offices will not work out as satisfactorily as the committee felt when they reported the bill without this amendment?

Mr. SWEET. No. But I will say this, that there is great need for the establishment of the regional offices at the present time. And when the work becomes better coordinated, then and in that event, perhaps, it will not be necessary to continue the regional offices.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. As I understand the gentleman, at the end of two years this section becomes obsolete, and if there is necessity for the continuance of it affirmative legislation, additional legislation, will be required?

Mr. SWEET. It will take affirmative legislation by Congress.

Mr. CANNON. And if this amendment is not adopted, or some other similar provision, it will continue until Congress legislates to abolish it?

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. TINCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. TINCHER. Can the gentleman furnish any information as to the proposed locations of the 14 regional offices?

Mr. SWEET. It is proposed at the present time that they will be established in the same cities where the offices of the Vocational Board and the Public Health Service are established. There are 14 of these offices.

Mr. TINCHER. I understand that the idea of the committee and the department having the administration of the office is that if we establish the 14 regional offices it will have a tendency to coordinate the service. At present there are 435 regional offices constituting the Members of the House of Representatives, so that the soldiers get the service by writing to the Congressmen. Had not the 14 regional offices ought to be located close to the Capitol, so that the Congressmen who serve the soldiers now may have access to them?

Mr. SWEET. I think not; the object of locating the regional offices throughout the country is to get in close contact with the soldiers, sailors, and marines.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. SWEET. I ask for five additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINCHER. I was in hopes that the committee in ascertaining the necessity for the 14 regional offices would obtain some idea as to where they would be located, so, as a Member of this body I might determine whether the locality I represent would have any greater coordination than it has at present.

Mr. ESCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. ESCH. It is very likely that the 14 regional offices will be located in these cities: Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Atlanta, New Orleans, Cincinnati, Chicago, St. Louis, Minneapolis, Denver, San Francisco, Seattle, and Dallas. Those are the cities in which are located the rehabilitation and vocational boards.

Mr. TINCHER. Allow me to ask another question on the bill. We appropriate a million dollars here to operate the offices. As I understand, the Secretary of the Treasury or the Executive will fix the fees. Is there any limitation as to the amount that the officers of these regional offices will receive in salary?

Mr. SWEET. No; that is left discretionary with the Treasury Department.

Mr. TINCHER. I suppose it is fair to presume that they will spend the million dollars in the next two years in acting in their intermediate capacity between the central office here and the regional offices for the soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. SWEET. That is true.

Mr. TINCHER. I suppose that when the administration says that they want so much for the boys, we have to give them what they want. But I do wonder that you expect to coordinate the service by this legislation?

Mr. WASON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. WASON. That million dollars includes not only the salaries of the men in charge but the rental of offices and things necessary to do the work in these offices.

Mr. SWEET. Everything that pertains to the establishment and maintenance of the offices.

Mr. WASON. It does not mean that it will all be expended for salaries.

Mr. SWEET. No.

Mr. TINCHER. I did not mean to intimate that the bill provided that, but the department would use it that way. I do not know that it will, but it will provide elegant places for 14 men for two years for use in that way.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. This now provides for 14 regional offices, "and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to said bureau." Would the gentleman amend his amendment by striking out "and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to said bureau"? In other words, you might have 500 offices, and you might have enough to make a regiment of officers. I should be very glad if the gentleman would strike out that language and let the 14 regional offices be established.

Mr. SWEET. That, as the committee views it, would do away with the efficiency of the regional offices. It is necessary to have the suboffices established to work in conjunction with the 14 regional offices. The thought of the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau was that there would probably be one established in each State; not necessarily where the regional offices are established, but in each State where there is no regional office.

Mr. CANNON. If the gentleman will allow me, that doubles the difficulty of getting rid of this great number of offices. The gentleman knows that I am in harmony with the desire of the friends of this legislation. The gentleman perhaps knows more about it than I do, but I know more than he does about the difficulty in getting rid of these offices. It took a decade to get rid of the pension offices.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. CANNON. I will take five minutes and then yield to the gentleman. I should be very glad if the gentleman would let these 14 offices be established and then find out the necessity for more. If there is any necessity for suboffices we can establish them, but we will never get rid of them if you establish 40 or 50 of these offices in the various States. I say again that it is easy to make an office, but it is difficult to get rid of it. Every suboffice would have to have its rent or occupy a Government building, it would have to have its staff, and with the various cities that have been mentioned it would be easy to get in touch with them. In the suboffices they might have a public health surgeon, they might have a vocational man—it is the broadest kind of discretion. I would be glad if the gentleman would in his amendment limit it to two years, and then strike out "and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to said bureau." Would the gentleman accept an amendment of that kind?

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I can not accept an amendment of that kind, for it seems to me that it would defeat the very purpose and object of establishing the regional offices and suboffices. The main purpose is to get in touch and come in close contact with the soldiers, sailors, and marines in this country. By establishing the 14 regional offices there will be many places where there would not be any direct contact with the soldiers any more than you have now with Washington, thus making the suboffices a necessity. For that reason these suboffices should be established, in order that efficient service may be rendered to those who are entitled to the benefits under the war-risk insurance act. At the gentleman's suggestion, I may say largely, I have offered an amendment here limiting the life of this section to two years. It will take affirmative action on the part of Congress if these regional offices and suboffices are continued. This is important at this time in order that, through the suboffices and the regional offices, the soldier may become well acquainted with the benefits to which he is entitled, in order that he may be advised as to his rights, and in order that his papers may go into the department in proper shape, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas makes the point of order that there is no quorum present, and the Chair will count. [After counting.] One hundred and seven Members present, a quorum.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in calling attention to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] for the committee, it seems to me that it is open to two objections. The first is that under the guise of a limitation of two years, which it carries with it, it practically reaffirms this legislation for one year longer than it would did it not contain this alleged limitation. In other words, it pledges us to carry this on for two years instead of one year, such as the regular appropriation would call for.

The principal thing to which I desire to address myself is this, that the trouble with the War Risk Bureau and its administration, so far as I have observed—and my observation has been as considerable as probably any Member of the House outside of the members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce—is that its methods have changed so frequently and its personnel has changed so frequently that no one could keep up with it. Therefore we have had difficulty in getting information for our constituents, and they have had difficulty regarding their applications and the amounts issued to them. It seems to me that we ought to establish something definite here. If we are to run this for two years and get it started and then break it up in pieces and start something else, we are going to have the same old trouble over again that we have had in the last two years, or since the bureau was started.

The point I make about this matter is in connection with an amendment I intend to offer to strike out the words pertaining to the establishment of the regional offices. I think all of this work can be done from the Federal office here in Washington, assuming that it has a stable personnel and that it has a definite method of accomplishment, assisted by the several offices in the different parts of the country for the purpose of affording information. I am entirely opposed to the principle of subdividing the main office into 14 regional offices and then subdividing those offices again into suboffices too numerous to mention. I believe it to be the best policy for the administration of this bureau to have one central office here in Washington, to have such number of suboffices as are necessary, and to eliminate the regional or middlemen offices. For the reasons I have named I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], and in opposing it I serve notice on the committee that I shall offer an amendment to strike out all language pertaining to the establishment of the 14 regional or middlemen offices, which I hold to be entirely unnecessary, cumbersome, and useless.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. If I understood the gentleman correctly, the idea of having 14 regional offices is that they might be established in the same cities where the Public Health Service now has its offices, and that the regional offices might be put into the same building with the Public Health Service. The suboffices, of course, will not necessarily be in cities where there are any Public Health Service offices.

Mr. SWEET. The chances are that they will cooperate with the Public Health Service and also the Vocational Board. At the present time the Vocational Board and the Public Health Service have several offices established throughout the United States working in conjunction with the regional offices.

Mr. WALSH. I was just wondering if you are going to limit the number of regional offices and then put no limit upon the suboffices whether it would not be better to eliminate the regional offices altogether and permit the War Risk Insurance Bureau to establish several suboffices wherever they please, because that is what it amounts to.

Mr. SWEET. How are you going to coordinate the service if you abolish the 14 regional offices to be established? At the present time you have 14 regional offices in connection with the Public Health Service and the Vocational Board. Already steps have been taken to place these offices in one building in each of the cities where the regional offices are to be established.

Mr. WALSH. But the principal purpose of this work is to adjust the insurance features of the war-risk insurance act, is it not?

Mr. SWEET. And the questions of compensation and allotment and allowance. Of course, the allotment and allowance features of the war-risk insurance act are dying down, but on the other hand compensation is growing and so is the insurance.

Mr. WALSH. Insurance does not have very much to do with the Public Health Service. They are not experts in insurance matters.

Mr. SWEET. But whenever a man is totally and permanently disabled he has to go to the Public Health Service to be examined for the purpose of being rated, to determine whether he is permanently and totally disabled.

Mr. WALSH. One of the chief difficulties of this great bureau has been that it was organized so quickly, under such great emergency, that it is top-heavy and began to tumble down around the heads of the people in charge of it. Now you propose to permit a scheme to be put into operation to diffuse all this lack of coordination over 14 regional offices and as many suboffices as the officials may wish to establish. You are just going to increase the opportunity for tying up this matter in endless red tape, according to my view. I know that this committee, and particularly the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], are very well informed with reference to war-risk insurance matters. This committee is probably the only committee in the House that has any comprehensive grasp of these problems, and I assume that all of these matters were taken into consideration.

Mr. SWEET. They were.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to be assured, however, that by establishing 14 regional offices, and then giving them a free hand for as many suboffices as they may decide to establish, we are going to promote efficiency.

If the gentleman can give me such assurance or such explanation, I wish he would do so before we vote upon this amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Texas, a member of the committee.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I may say this to the gentleman from Massachusetts. It is not contemplated, I understand, to create more than one suboffice in a State and probably not in a State where there is a regional office. I do not think the committee would have any objection, however—I know I would not—to an amendment limiting the number of suboffices. I would not myself have and I feel certain there will not be more than 40, probably not that many, of these suboffices.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think an amendment after the word "suboffices," reading "not exceeding one in any State," would in any way hamper this service?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all. I really think there would not be that many established; but I rather think, I will say further to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that if we say there can not be more than one established in a State they would probably take that as an invitation to establish at least one in a State.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. I know the gentleman appreciates the ease and facility with which these bureaus and offices grow and increase here in Washington. Now, that same habit will be formed if we spread it out throughout the country.

Mr. RAYBURN. I say I am very agreeable to the amendment if the gentleman would limit it to not more than 48. I think there are groups of States in the United States where there ought not to be even one in each State, and that one suboffice could attend to the work of two or three States.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will.

Mr. BARKLEY. If we limit these suboffices to not exceeding one in each State, do not we run the risk of further handicapping the bureau in some States where they might need a suboffice and in another State they might not need one at all? For instance, Rhode Island might not need an office. They might be able to attend to the business——

Mr. RAYBURN. I will say this, that I rather think it would be probably unwise to say there should not be more than one in each State; but I rather think the House ought to limit the number.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree to that. I think it would be unfortunate to say there should not be more than one in each State, for there might be some States where there ought to be more than one and half a dozen States where they might not need any.

Mr. WALSH. What does the gentleman think if we said "not exceeding 48 in number"?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that in all probability would be better than to say not exceeding one in each State. There are States in the Union that you must have a regional office in one part of it and need a suboffice in it, and they are a thousand miles apart, at least one State.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman give the real reason for the need of these 14 additional regional offices added to the suboffices in each State?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, the suboffices will be rather like post offices. They will only receive and transmit. The regional offices are supposed to be concerns that have men in them who understand this law and everything in connection with it, so that information to the soldiers can be gotten from them and not go to the trouble and the waste of time of sending here for that information, or, in other words, that the regional office, say, in San Francisco will be a clearing house for information to the service men in that section of the United States.

Mr. WELLING. Well, now, does the gentleman expect to transfer from the Washington office all the records of these men to the regional office in San Francisco?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. WELLING. Will they not have to come to Washington eventually in any case?

Mr. RAYBURN. Eventually they will, but the man can be examined, he can get all the information about getting out his papers for an increase in compensation——

Mr. WELLING. Can he do that at the regional office?

Mr. RAYBURN. He can, yes; if he went to the regional office.

Mr. WELLING. I meant in the suboffice. Can he get all of that examination at the suboffice in the State?

Mr. RAYBURN. Well, I doubt very seriously whether you are going to get physicians at these different suboffices at the little they are going to pay them to do this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. May the gentleman have another minute?

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask for another minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is on the committee that reported this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. CANNON. Is the gentleman going to offer the amendment of which he spoke, not exceeding 48 offices?

Mr. RAYBURN. I understood the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] was going to offer that amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. There is one thing about this matter that we are going to have to admit after we have passed this bill, and that is that we understood what we were doing and that we passed it with our eyes open. It has been inferentially, at least, admitted by a number of Members that it is a needless waste to create these 14 new regional bureaus. It has been inferentially admitted at least that it is unwise to pass a law that would permit at least 48 subbureaus to be created and put upon the country, and yet we are all sitting here knowing it is something that we ought not to do, knowing that we are placing this bureau upon the country; we are all sitting here and letting it pass. We started out in the very first clause of this bill by appropriating a million dollars to launch these 14 extra new regional bureaus on the country, and my colleague from Texas——

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment—and my colleague from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] admits that there will be probably at least 48 subbureaus put upon the country and the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] the other day admitted that it took us 40 years to get rid of the pension agencies that were created after the Civil War, 40 long years, and it is going to take us 40 long years more to get rid of these agencies which we are now proposing to create. For one I am not going to create them.

I for one am going to vote against it——

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment, I want to get through, I have but five minutes, and then I will yield.

Do you know that these bureaus are absolutely unnecessary and eventually will cost about $10,000,000 annually? Do you know that most of the men to-day who may want this insurance or who have claims or may be entitled to the benefits under this bill have kept up their insurance or already made their application? A great many of them think they can do better with private institutions. Of course they can not, but they think that. They have got the right to believe that, and have a right to so act, but if it is a bad proposition as asserted by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], if it is a bad proposition as asserted by the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], why is it we will sit here and let it pass? Why do not these gentlemen get their forces together and knock the enacting clause out of this bill, and stop it? That is the only way to stop it. We can stop it a lot easier now by taking the enacting clause out of the bill than we can after putting these 14 bureaus on the country with 48 subsidiary bureaus which will come as soon as we create these 14 new regional bureaus. We have plenty of machinery to handle the business now, without these bureaus. We can do much by handling the matter in each locality by our postmasters.

Are you going to vote for it? That is something that you are going to have to answer to your constituents and I am going to have to answer to mine. We are going home to them and tell them that we tried to meet the present situation, knowing that we owe $28,000,000,000, knowing that our country is a debt-paying country, knowing that the only money that the United States Government has to pay its debts with is the tax money that we take out of the pockets of the people. We know all that, and yet we are going home to face our constituents and say to them we tried to cut down their tax, and we tried to save their money, and tried to keep enough money in the Treasury to pay our debts, and yet we are going to say that we voted to create 14 new regional bureaus and 48 new subsidiary bureaus all over the United States when it is unnecessary. Are you going to do it? I do not know what you are going to do. I know I am not.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] would have made the speech that he did, contending that the proposed method of suboffices will mean extravagance, if he had read the hearings and the plans in contemplation by the Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. We must realize that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance has a great task to deal with in settling these compensation and insurance claims, and that it is wisdom and economy on our part to provide the proper machinery. Take the Post Office Department, for example: For years we required the postmasters in every city, village, and hamlet of the country to send to Washington for every bit of supplies, stamps, and things of that kind that they needed every time they wanted them. Now, during the present administration, Postmaster General Burleson very wisely suggested to the Post Office Committee that we enact legislation that would permit him to establish central accounting offices in each State in order that these smaller offices may get their supplies from local centers and not have to come to Washington every time they wanted a bit of supplies.

Now, what is the situation at the present time as to these compensation claims? A soldier who is disabled or injured in the war has to make his application. That application is sent to Washington. Frequently it is not executed properly, frequently the proof accompanying it is not adequate, and then in such cases it has to go way back to California, or the State of Oregon, or some other State, as the case may be, and be fixed up again; and maybe the second time when it is sent to Washington it still does not meet the situation, and it has to be sent back again. And all that means delay and expense. And yet it is entirely right and proper that the director should require careful and adequate proof to establish claims. And so the director intends to establish these regional offices, not for the purpose of taking final action upon claims, because if that were the purpose I would not favor it, because there would be danger of making 14 different kinds of administration of the war-risk insurance act, and I would not favor it; but the director does not intend that; he does not intend that any of these regional offices shall make any awards or payments, but only that they make up the cases and, after they have made them up, send them to Washington, and there let final award be made upon them. This is not the same thing as was the establishing of the different pension bureaus that has been mentioned in this debate, because they disbursed the funds. Under this plan the funds will still be disbursed from Washington, and not from the regional offices.

Now, the director very clearly stated the plan in his testimony, as follows:

> I do not understand that it is proposed in the so-called Wason bill that there should be a decentralization so far as paying the claims or the making of final awards is concerned. It is simply an administrative convenience for the Government.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I think it will work for economy rather than for extravagance, and I favor the plan.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, sundry messages in writing from the President were communicated to the House of Representatives by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, who also informed the House of Representatives that the President had, on May 18, approved and signed bills of the following titles:

H. R. 12537. An act to provide for an examination and report on the condition and possible irrigation development of the Imperial Valley in California;

H. R. 9044. An act authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to accept on behalf of the United States the donation by Sedgwick Post, No. 10, Grand Army of the Republic, of its memorial hall property in Bedford, Taylor County, Iowa, for Federal building purposes; and

H. R. 11927. An act to increase the efficiency of the commissioned personnel of the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Coast and Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service.

BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Of course, we are all anxious to do everything in a legislative way that may possibly be done to expedite the settlement of these claims with the War Risk Bureau, and I have been somewhat impressed with the argument that has been made in favor of the establishment of these 14 regional substations. But I have not been satisfied, according to the evidence that has been presented or the argument that has been presented, as to the necessity of establishing these suboffices.

Now, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], in answer to a question as to what function they would perform, said that they would be receiving offices, so to speak. I imagine that under that character of function that they would only exercise some preliminary filing effort toward getting a settlement of the claim, and if these regional institutions were established in each State and a substation were established in each State, whenever an application was filed with one of these substations—and I would like the attention of the chairman of the committee on this proposition—would not it then be necessary for the application filed in one of these substations to be transmitted to the regional station for any final action?

Mr. SWEET. It would not.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What necessary or useful function, then, would these substations actually perform?

Mr. SWEET. They would come in direct contact with the soldier and assist him in making out his papers. At the present time, as every Member of Congress knows, when a letter is written by a soldier and he is asked to sign the application he does not fill it in properly, as a rule, or does not sign it properly, and it must be sent back to him to be properly made out. What is the result of that kind of service? The result is that you are harming the soldier. He becomes discontented, and he complains about red tape and everything of that kind, and justly so.

Now, then, when you have the establishment of these suboffices they come in personal contact with the soldier, and his papers are properly prepared; they go into the regional office in proper shape, and thus the whole matter is expedited.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Under the suggestion made that we would probably establish one of these substations in each of these States—take the State of New York, for instance, that contains a number of large cities, and the substation would probably serve the adjacent territory to that particular city. All of these claims in the other parts of the State will have to be filed with the regional station, so that it would be performing only a limited function, even if it carried into effect the purpose stated by the gentleman from Iowa; and instead of making for expedition, in my opinion, judging from the way this Government operates its work, it would make for delay—the establishment of these substations. It seems to me that while there might be some good argument in favor of the 14 regional stations, the creation of these additional suboffices would serve no useful purpose and would only entail some additional expense and delay. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

Mr. WALSH. The Chair declared it carried, did he not?
Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Nobody voted on it.
Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.
Mr. GARD. Did the Chair announce that the vote had been had and carried?
The CHAIRMAN. The Chair did not. The Chair said, "The ayes seem to have it." That is as far as the announcement got. The ayes have it, and the amendment is agreed to.
Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.
The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. WALSH: Page 1, line 6, after the word "suboffices," insert "not exceeding 48 in number."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer a substitute for that amendment.
Mr. GARD. I want to offer a substitute to the amendment on the Chair's desk now.
Mr. WALSH. I want to speak, Mr. Chairman, on my amendment before it is bowled over by the gentleman's substitute, as I suppose it will be.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.
Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in view of the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK], it seems, if we permitted 48 of these separate agencies to be established, they would be limited to taking care of the needs of the various districts in which this bureau would operate, through its regional offices, because New York and Pennsylvania and, possibly, a large State like Texas would have to have two or three of these substations, whereas the smaller States might not be required to have any. Unless there is some serious objection to limiting the number, which I have not heard from any member of the committee, it seems to me we ought to put some limitation on here and not permit this great network to spread out and give opportunity for increasing red tape.
Now, my personal opinion is that there is no serious disadvantage in requiring the soldier to send his application direct to the home office in Washington, and if he is not competent to fill out this blank himself one of two things ought to be required, either that the blank should be simplified, so that any soldier of average intelligence and common-school education would understand its requirements so that he might fill it out, or else that he ought to be at liberty under authorization provided by legislation to go to a postmaster and have his application filled out in accordance with the requirements, and let the postmasters have the forms on file in their offices. This would simply mean, in my judgment, that you would go to the suboffice, and the liability of mistakes on the part of officials at suboffices would be just as great as it will be down here in the home office of the War Risk Insurance Bureau. They would be no more free from mistakes than the rest of us are.
Mr. HUSTED. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from New York?
Mr. WALSH. Yes.
Mr. HUSTED. Is it not probably true that the vast majority of these applications, as fast as they are received, will be sent in and passed upon?
Mr. WALSH. I should think that must be so, but I suppose there will be claims arising from time to time that it will be necessary to file and upon which action will have to be taken. But you are increasing the liability for mistakes. Suppose a mistake is made in a suboffice. It comes to the regional office and may be overlooked, and then it may have to be sent back later to the suboffice, and then back to the regional office, and then transmitted to the soldier after having been sent again to the suboffice where the soldier made the application. It seems to me there is hardly any necessity for permitting this great network of offices and officials to be established, and I doubt if it will result in decreasing the force down here by 300 clerks. It will increase the amount of correspondence. All these applications will have to come back here for final action. They will have to send letters in duplicate and in triplicate to the regional offices and to the suboffices and then to the soldiers, and I fear we are laying a foundation for building up a great organization here which will require a tremendous number of clerks.
Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?
Mr. WALSH. Yes.
Mr. LAYTON. To make this proposition a comprehensive one in every way, let us have a suboffice in every county in the United States.
Mr. WALSH. Well, under the language, of course, if not amended, that would be permissible.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana moves to strike out the last word.
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do so, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of supporting the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. I think it is a very wise amendment, and the chairman of the subcommittee [Mr. SWEET] is in accord with me and with the gentleman from Massachusetts upon this subject. The hearings disclosed that the director is also in agreement with this amendment. He was asked by Mr. SWEET the following question:

At this time have you made any estimate as to the probable number of suboffices that would be established in order to properly take care of this matter?

And the director answered, "Approximately one to a State," but later said he would not like to have it limited to each State particularly, because of the difference in the size of the States and the difference in the necessities of each State.
Mr. Chairman, I have been, in studying this question, at first of the opinion that we ought not to have these regions or these substations. If there is one thing that has been brought to the attention of Members of Congress more than any other it is the fact that there is great confusion in taking care of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. I went into these hearings under the impression, Mr. Chairman, that this would add to the confusion. But when the man in charge of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, who has made a study of this question, who has been confronted day after day with its difficulties and troubles, says to us that it is absolutely necessary, that it will serve the purpose of clearing up this confusion, and that it will aid the service man, I think we ought to listen to his appeal.
Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I will.
Mr. WALSH. Of course, it has not been necessary up to this time, and the present director has made wonderful progress in clearing up the confusion and eradicating inefficiency, and is bringing the matter up to a high standard in that regard. Now, I should like to ask the gentleman if he thinks it is absolutely necessary, as far as the efficiency and the service rendered to the men, that this should be done in just this way, and that this wide discretion be vested in this officer?
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Of course, I do not say it is absolutely necessary, but I say that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, who has this in charge, says that this will greatly expedite the making out of the necessary papers, and in his opinion will clear up the confusion that has existed.
Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?
Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Yes.
Mr. HUSTED. I think in all probability it would have been an excellent thing if a system of this kind had been established in the beginning; but it seems to me that the period has now passed when the congestion of business in the department should lead to very great confusion. It seems to me it is rather late in the day now, when probably most of these applications have been sent in and passed on, when the amount of business is on the decline instead of on the increase, to create a great system of offices throughout the country, which will involve a large amount of expense, and which will be very difficult to get rid of after they are once established. I do not see why they should not be able to carry on this work at the present time without any more of these offices.
The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired.
Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment. This being a purely administrative convenience, not simply for the bureau but for the convenience of those who are beneficiaries of the law, it seems to me we ought not to limit the number of these subagencies. Some Members call them subbureaus and other suboffices. They are nothing of the kind. Nothing of the sort is involved.
Mr. WALSH. That is the language used in the bill.
Mr. SIMS. Suboffices, yes; wherever they are established; but it does not mean a great clerical establishment, with large overhead charges and all that sort of thing. As I say, I think you ought not to limit the number. It is a mistake to limit the number. The number ought to be governed by the necessity for these subagents, and the necessity ought not be determined by the needs of one State. It might not be necessary to have a subagency or suboffice in some particular State at all.

Now, take Bristol, Tenn., which is on the line between Tennessee and Virginia. A subagency there could serve all that part of Virginia and all that part of Tennessee adjacent thereto. A subagency at Chattanooga could serve all northern Georgia but could not very well serve southern Georgia. One at Nashville, Tenn., could serve northern Alabama and that portion of middle Tennessee and southern Kentucky. One at Memphis would be just as convenient to Arkansas and Mississippi as to Tennessee. There would be four suboffices in one State that would do as much business and be of as great convenience to several other States as suboffices could possibly be in those States.

Now, this is an administrative matter and should be left to the director, who has to administer the law, and which does not place any additional expense upon the Government.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Is it the gentleman's idea that the soldiers or their representatives are to make personal calls at these suboffices, or that the representatives of the several suboffices will make personal calls on the soldiers?

Mr. SIMS. Often the applicant or the person in need would call up the subagent by telephone, because he would be near enough to do it, and the subagent can call up the regional office and get quick service. Now, take a hospital case, where tuberculosis or something of that sort develops, and the soldier needs quick action. It should not be necessary to have to write to Washington, back and forth, simply that there may be a greater number of employees here in Washington.

Mr. WALSH. The suboffice will have to write to Washington.

Mr. SIMS. That is not necessary at all. If he has not the information immediately at hand, he can get it from the nearest regional office.

Mr. WALSH. They will have to get final authority from Washington.

Mr. SIMS. To get final action, I know; but all this preliminary work calls for expedition and will provide quick relief to those who need it, and it can be had in this way.

Mr. WALSH. As you increase offices and suboffices you decrease efficiency and expedition.

Mr. SIMS. No; not at all.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman's amendment provides for not exceeding 48 offices, does it not?

Mr. SIMS. Yes; I so understand it.

Mr. CANNON. Will there have to be one in Rhode Island and one in Delaware?

Mr. LAYTON. There ought to be one in Delaware.

Mr. CANNON. It leaves the director some discretion.

Mr. SIMS. Certainly. Now, as we do not know how many will be needed, and as we assume that the director will not establish unnecessary agencies, why should we undertake here, without knowledge, to limit the number of subagencies, when these subagencies are intended to reduce the congestion of service here and to prove a great convenience to those who need quick advice and quick action?

Mr. LAYTON. How does the gentleman like my suggestion of having one in every county?

Mr. SIMS. That might be absolutely unnecessary, and would not help anything, and it would increase the expense. The Director of the War Risk Insurance Bureau knows better what to do than we do, and if we undertake to interfere with the administrative details and place limitations on same we will never have an institution that will function best in the public interest.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 1.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment that I would like to offer as a substitute for the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama will be recognized later.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Ohio moves to strike out section 1. I make the point of order that there is an amendment already pending.

Mr. BEGG. I will withdraw that and move to strike out the last two words. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have naught but good words to say for the Bureau of War Risk as it is at present functioning. I also want to say that I do not believe this present expansion is in keeping with good business or of necessity. It is a fact that 75 per cent of the older war-risk insurance beneficiaries have dropped their policies, according to the testimony of the war-risk officers before the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department.

The proposed increase of offices in the different States in the country is for no other reason than to establish or appoint solicitors to go out and resell this insurance to these boys who have dropped it. I do not believe that the Government ought to go into the business of soliciting insurance. We have made it available for the boys; it is at their option if they want it. I do not believe it is incumbent on this Government to send men about the United States to sell insurance. Nor do I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] that there will be more efficient and quicker action if we have suboffices in the various States than there is at the present time. Tuberculosis does not strike a man overnight. He has plenty of warning and an opportunity to get his case before the department at Washington. Every time you multiply the offices through which a communication goes you hold it up. You hold it up one or two days if you handle it in the most expeditious way you can in passing through every single office.

It is not a fact that the Director of War Risk Insurance wants this to handle the business they have now, for they have only 25 per cent of the original insurance. Last February the insurance department had enough business to keep them occupied or busy for only 11 days in that month. They could have discharged 60 per cent of their force and transacted the business if they had not gone outside of the realm of their own department. That is the testimony of the head of the insurance division, and can be read to the committee if necessary.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEGG. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. The insurance would be a very small portion of the work of these offices.

Mr. BEGG. It is the same thing—duplicating what you have in Washington, and you have got to have one man specialized in every department. It is the rankest kind of folly, and it will not do the soldier any good. It will not do a single bit of good in the world except to build up a giant bureau at the expense of the taxpayers, without any benefit to the soldier. I want to say to you gentlemen who talk about saving money that it seems to me that if anything is brought up to save a nickel, not in a partisan line, but to do anything that ordinary business would tell you to do, the proponents always come up with the same cry that this is an emergency and you will be helping the soldier. Why, gentlemen, I have settled 300 cases through the War Risk Bureau and never have been held up any length of time, and I have not any cases pending there now. We furnished as many boys from my district as any district in the United States in proportion to population. There is nothing to this, only an ambition on the part of the director—and I do not criticize that if he can get away with it. But he wants to build up a big machine and resell the 75 per cent of insurance and make a reputation for himself. That is a laudable ambition. But are we going to sit idly by and pay the bill when there is no necessity for it? They have 14 regional offices and that is enough; that brings them near enough so that they are within an overnight mail to any spot in the United States. I think that is sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. BANKHEAD as a substitute for the amendment of Mr. WALSH: Page 1, lines 6 and 7, strike out "and such suboffices as may be deemed necessary in the best interests of the work committed to said bureau."

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, my object in presenting this amendment is one, I think, that is really in the interest of the men who are to be served by this proposed legislation. I do not propose to vote against the provision of the section creating 14 regional offices, but when you go ahead and provide, as in this section, for the establishment of a large number of suboffices in the country, it seems to me you only thereby increase the red tape, increase the delay that will result in the application of these men for adjustment of their matters with the War Risk Bureau. The functions that these substations will perform are stated by the members of the committee to be that they will assist in preparing the papers for final decision either by the regional bureau or here in Washington. One of the main purposes, as stated in the report, is to centralize these offices with the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, the Bureau of Public Health Service, the Federal Board for Vocational Education, the Red Cross, and other organizations. It seems to me if that is the purpose, the coordination sought, the activity ought to come in there in one central regional bureau. But if you go ahead, gentlemen of the committee, and put in suboffices over yonder in some States—48 in the United States—it seems to me that that will entail additional delay in the securing of the settlement.

Of course, that substation will not have any official papers; it will not have the reports of the doctors and all that sort of thing; and final decision will rest either with the central office in Washington or with the regional substation. It will be only an adjunct, so called, and it seems to me entirely unnecessary. I fear that the result of it, instead of being to secure expedition in the settlement of these matters, will be delay, because the more circuitous you make the route that any official business of the Government has to take the longer will be the delay in securing definite and final adjustment. That is borne out by the experience of all of us.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Alabama is familiar with the work of the Vocational Board on account of his being on the Committee on Education?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. I understand they have 14 of these regional offices. Do they have any suboffices outside of the 14 regional offices?

Mr. BANKHEAD. None that I know of.

Mr. BLACK. Certainly their work is nothing like as great as the work of the War Risk Insurance Bureau.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Oh, I think it is much greater now, as shown by the investigation recently held by the Committee on Education.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. It could hardly be said that it has more, because every man who has taken vocational training is subject to the War Risk Insurance Bureau, and a great many others that have not taken that training.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I predicated that statement upon the assumption that there had been a larger percentage in proportion to the number of claims coming under the war-risk insurance adjusted than under the Vocational Board. Mr. Chairman, this is all that I have to say in respect to this. It seems to me these substations are not going to perform such character of useful work as would justify the danger of delay involved. It seems to me they could be safely stricken from the bill.

Mr. DEWALT. Mr. Chairman, when this matter was brought to the attention of the subcommittee that framed this bill there was considerable discussion as to the advisability, first, of establishing regional offices. Whatever doubt there was in regard to the matter was resolved in favor of the establishment of these 14 regional offices. The unanimous testimony of all those who appeared before us, who had concern with the War Risk Insurance Bureau, convinced the subcommittee that it was absolutely necessary for the expedition of business to have these 14 regional offices. Mr. Jones, who is at the head of the War Risk Insurance Bureau, then proposed that substations in the various States and localities be established. My recollection is, and I am not disclosing now anything that is to be held secret by the action of the committee, that we determined that while substations might be necessary, the number thereof should be limited by the amount of the appropriation, to wit, the sum named in the bill. It follows as a matter of pure economics and business that there can not be more substations and regional stations established than could be paid for by the amounts carried in this bill, to wit, $1,000,000.

The next question arises, What is the necessity for these substations? I address myself now particularly to the inquiry of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Let us illustrate, if we can: There were 4,000,000 men, or thereabouts, who were either drafted or who volunteered in the Army. It is estimated that at least three-quarters of those men either took out insurance or are entitled to allotments, or their dependents and relatives are entitled to benefits under the war-risk insurance act. Merely by the statement of that fact it would therefore appear that there is a tremendous amount of business for this War Risk Insurance Bureau. When you consider that possibly 3,000,000 of people in the United States are personally interested as being the primal beneficiaries, that each one of 3,000,000 perhaps may have three or four dependent upon him, you multiply the number so that you have nine or ten million people who are interested in this subject.

Mr. BEGG. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. I will ask the gentleman to pardon me just now, because I desire to pursue this argument. Therefore you have an enormous amount of business. It is not only in regard to vocational education, but it is in reference to allotments and in reference to insurance, in reference to benefits which accrue to those people and their dependents under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act. Why have these substations? That is the inquiry of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]. Let us illustrate again, as I said before: Pennsylvania has a territory which is 300 miles or more in width, and possibly 240 miles running from north to south. It has a population of about 12,000,000 people. New York State has a territory equally as large and a greater population. If the percentage of enlistments and drafted men is taken into consideration, you can at once see that there are an enormous number of people, taken on the percentage basis, who were in the Army from those two States. Take into consideration the territory that these two States cover, and that there is but one regional office. Let us say that it is located geographically in the center of the State, and let us place it at Harrisburg. The men who are concerned in the matter must send their documents to Harrisburg, or if they are to be examined as the law requires they must go to Harrisburg from Pittsburgh, let us say, a distance of over 200 miles.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time may be extended for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEWALT. Take the large center of population that there is at Philadelphia, I think now ranking as the fourth largest city in the United States. Consider the great number of individuals interested in the subject, who of necessity must apply personally in respect to a great number of these matters. The object of having regional offices I have already explained. The object of having these substations, limited by the amount of the appropriation, is to bring these men in closer touch with some one who understands the business and who can help them out. The reply to that might be made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD]: "The substations have nothing to do except to help these men in the formulation of their papers and that sort of thing." That in itself is a great help. The reply then might be further made: "In any event, the papers must be eventually sent to Washington." Again that is true, but let me refer the gentlemen to this potent fact. We have a revenue service in this Government, and we have in each district in the State of Pennsylvania what might be called a substation in the revenue service. We have one general revenue collector in the city of Washington. There is not a State in the Union that does not have three or possibly more substations.

In Pennsylvania I think we have a half dozen or more. What is the purpose of it? The purpose is to expedite business and to help the transaction of necessary minutiæ. It is an administrative function, and therefore I appeal to the members of the committee here, sitting as a Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, that the judgment of the subcommittee and the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be taken upon this subject, and that the number of substations and the number of regional stations be limited only by the amount of the appropriation.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Under what division of section 1 does the gentleman interpret any limitation upon the number of substations that can be established?

Mr. DEWALT. None, except that $1,000,000 is carried for that purpose—to carry out the provisions of the act.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the gentleman realizes that they can establish substations under section 1 that would cost $5,000,000, if they so desired.

Mr. DEWALT. I can not agree with the gentleman.

Mr. HUSTED. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DEWALT. Certainly.

Mr. HUSTED. Does the gentleman think much advantage would be gained to the ex-service men where they mailed the application 10 miles to an office in charge of its receipt or a thousand miles? In other words, if he lives in the northern part of the State of New York, would there be much advantage gained in mailing it to New York City or mailing it to Washington?

Mr. DEWALT. I do not think so.

Mr. HUSTED. Does not the gentleman think even if these regional offices are established and these substations are established that most of the men will to-day be so situated that they will have to mail their applications anyway?

Mr. DEWALT. It is not only the mailing facilities, let me remark to the gentleman—and I also agree entirely that it would not make very much difference whether the applicant mailed his papers to New York City or to Washington—but these regional offices are established for the purpose of the examination of the applicant, and so forth, and therefore the personal attendance of the individual must be given to the party who takes his application.

Mr. HUSTED. I think under the conditions as they exist to-day that the applicant has not got to go very far to establish his physical examination. Under the existing facilities he can be examined physically without very great disadvantage. Now, so far as this system to aid the applicant in the preparation of his papers, why, he would not be at all advantaged by mailing to a station located at a shorter distance. I think the gentleman will himself admit that.

Mr. DEWALT. I admit that for the purpose of mailing the gentleman is correct.

Mr. HUSTED. I therefore say the only man advantaged by this bill would be the man who happened to live in a city where this office was located. I assume this man would gain some advantage possibly, but it seems to me it is going a little too far to establish this very expensive system in order to benefit only the men who are fortunate enough to live in the town where the offices are located.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on my substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Alabama——

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have that again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman suggests that the amendment being a perfecting amendment, it be again reported——

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I suggest that the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama strikes out language which I seek to perfect by way of an amendment, and that the vote would come on that perfecting amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair suggested, that will be the procedure if the gentleman from Massachusetts desires. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SWEET. I ask that the amendment be again read.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

There was no objection.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I will say that I have no objection to this amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the motion of the gentleman from Alabama to strike out certain language.

Mr. CANNON. Let that amendment be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. CANNON. That ought to be adopted.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the noes appeared to have it.

On a division (demanded by Mr. BANKHEAD) there were—ayes 30, noes 28.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. SWEET and Mr. BANKHEAD) reported that there were—ayes 51, noes 61.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment at the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the words "regional offices, not exceeding 14 in number, and such." Also, in line 1, page 2, strike out the figures "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$500,000."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, as the bill now stands we have written into it the continuance of the suboffices to the number of 48, which, to my mind, is a very wise provision; but with 48 suboffices created, with 1 general supervisory office in the city of Washington, it seems to me there is absolutely no necessity for the establishment of a great middle class of offices known as regional offices, 14 in number, because it is my opinion that the best work of the bureau can be done by the central office in Washington and by 48 suboffices throughout the United States in such places as they may be established, and eliminate the 14 regional offices and also eliminate the necessity of a great appropriation of $1,000,000, which is to be continued for two years. I realize the matter is of great interest, and I am very glad to have the gentlemen confer with one another. The matter is something that seems to me very important, and I know all want to do what is best for the interest of the man, the soldier, who has this policy of insurance, or who may be entitled to the benefits of this act, and those benefits, to my mind, can best be established by an efficient central office here in Washington, by 48 suboffices scattered wherever they may be necessary throughout the United States of America to furnish information to the man who wants information. But to establish 14 regional offices, to have 14 middle-class offices who are not responsible either to the suboffice or to the final office, but rather a sort of intermediate clearing house, seems to me to be entirely unnecessary and tend to accumulate the great bulk of red tape and unnecessary things with which these men are required to comply.

I believe that the very best interests of the service man will be subserved by affording him a substation whereby he can get immediate information or can get information in a short time, and then by having an efficient administration of this bureau in Washington. I think we have at present an efficient administration, but we should continue an efficient administration, and to do that the establishment of the suboffices should not fall upon the expenditure of $1,000,000 but could be cared for by an appropriation of $500,000 per annum.

It is in view of these two things, in view of what I believe to be finally to the best interests of the service man, that I offer the amendment striking out the language as to the regional offices and reducing the appropriation.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I desire to support the amendment. It seems to me if you give any discretion whatever to the 14 regional offices you will have conflicts in decision. You will have a boy in one section of the country drawing compensation in a larger amount than another boy in another section; that is, if you give any discretionary power to the 14 different regional offices or if you give them authority to finally dispose of any cases.

Mr. SWEET. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. When I finish this sentence. On the other hand, if you do not give any discretionary power to the 14 offices, what is the use of having them? You might just as well have your substations carry out the formal part of the application and send it direct to headquarters, because if there is no discretionary power on the part of the 14 offices to finally settle a proposition it will but delay to have the various applications go through one of the 14 offices and finally to headquarters for final disposition.

Now I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman that these regional offices, as I understand it, are not vested with discretionary power in passing upon and finally adjudicating a case.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I accept the gentleman's statement. Then there is absolutely no reason on the face of the earth for having the 14 regional offices. If you are going to have the substations, they will be closer to the one who is making the application, and when he gets his application in proper form, inasmuch as it must come to Washington to be finally disposed of, what is the use of flagging it on the way? If it must come to Washington before it is finally approved and finally adjudicated, let it come on the first and fastest train and direct to headquarters and there be finally disposed of.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SIMS. There are already eight of these regional offices established.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then there are eight too many.

Mr. SIMS. The other six are simply to correspond with the number of Public Health offices, because where the Public Health has a regional office the work goes on together and it is expedited, and the director knows more about it than I do and more about it than I suppose the gentleman from Texas knows. And the only purpose is to collate this different work of these different public offices and save expense and expedite the service.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The director may know more about it than we do, but he is not legislating. That is a brand new philosophy, for, according to the gentleman's argument, he would reduce expenses by increasing offices and officers. According to the gentleman's argument, we might say that inasmuch as we have subtreasuries we ought to increase them. The fact that we have regional offices is not an argument why they should be increased. The question, and the sole question, is whether or not they are efficient; whether or not they will make the service more efficient and more prompt. If they will not do so, there is not an argument that could be brought under the shining sun that will have weight in determining this question. As a matter of fact, this amendment reduces the appropriation by $500,000 and at the same time makes the service more prompt and efficient.

Now, I repeat that I believe if you establish these 14 offices one of two things will happen. The bureau will come in a little bit later with the request that they be given discretionary power, or, if they are maintained without discretionary power, you will have a delay of two or three weeks, while these applications, having been made out at the substations or the local Red Cross headquarters——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for three minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The application will be made out at the substation or at the local Red Cross headquarters, where a great many of them are made out at the present time, or through the post offices. This is more convenient for the soldiers making the applications than these regional offices will be. Therefore they can better serve the boys who will make the application.

Mr. BLANTON. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to my colleague, along the line of his argument, that most of the complaints that have been lodged before the Committee on Education on the hearing that it has been having with reference to the rehabilitation matter, was to the effect that these various offices, say, the one in New York, did not have authority, and that after the application is passed on it could not take any definite action and wind it up.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am glad the gentleman suggested the dilemma. I said at the beginning of my argument that that would be the result. If you create offices, they will be asking for discretionary power to make them of value. Then you will have conflicts. You will have one boy drawing $10 and another one drawing $50 a month, because they are in different regions. If you do not have this discretionary power, what on earth is the use to have them at all? They will serve no useful purpose, and they will delay the application of the soldier and cause him to be more dissatisfied than he is at the present time.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. The gentleman is aware that the director said:

> From the Bureau of War Risk Insurance point of view I regard it as most essential that this authorization be given the bureau in order that the work committed to that bureau might be facilitated.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I can not help it. You can argue until you are black in the face, but there is not a man in the United States who can convince me or any man, from the standpoint of reason, that you can put an application in the post office at Dallas and stop it at New Orleans for two or three weeks and get it to Washington and have it disposed of sooner than if you mail it from Dallas direct to Washington. The director can say what he pleases. He may establish more offices and eliminate this distribution. He can not argue that there is any use for the regional offices.

The principal complaint throughout the country has been the delays in the final disposition of the applications of the disabled soldiers. Let us not increase these delays by establishing new places of delay, and all at further expense.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

I recognize it is a very easy matter for Members to object and find fault with any bill that proposes to create new offices or to give additional authority to offices already created. It is a very natural impulse, that affects all of us, because it is the course of least resistance. But the thing I feel we ought to look after in the passage or rejection of this measure is whether it is in the interest of the men who have been injured or who are entitled to the benefit of the war-risk insurance as it has been passed and amended from time to time.

Now, we know that the Public Health Service, the Vocational Educational Board, and the Bureau of War Risk Insurance are all three functioning and cooperating together in the administration of the law for the benefit of the ex-service men. They are all correlated, and they are seeking to obtain quarters under the same roof in the various locations where they are in order that they may cooperate more effectively for the benefit of the men.

There are 14 districts throughout the United States for the Public Health Service. There are 14 places where the Public Health Service has headquarters throughout the United States. There are certain functions that are necessary in the administration of the war-risk insurance act, which are being performed by the Public Health Service. Most of the examinations that are being held to determine matters of compensation, hospital treatment, insurance, and things of that sort, are being conducted by the Public Health Service and by the physicians who are under the jurisdiction of the Public Health Service. Already the Vocational Educational Board, having divided the country into 14 districts, are combining their forces and their offices under the same roof with the Public Health Service in order that they may correlate their work and cooperate more effectively.

The object of the creation of these 14 regional districts is that the War Risk Insurance Bureau may have their men under the same roof, so that they may act in cooperation with the Public Health Service and with the Vocational Educational Board, so that these three agencies may be operated for the benefit of the ex-service men without the duplication of rents and expenses and without delay, and so that wherever possible they may cooperate on short notice.

Mr. GOOD. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GOOD. Can the gentleman point to a single instance where there is any coordination between the examinations conducted by the Public Health Service and the examinations conducted by the Vocational Educational Board? If so, why does each organization have separate offices in separate buildings, with a separate corps, a separate staff of physicians, and everything of that kind, and send in reports to separate institutions?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is just the situation that these three boards are trying to obviate. Heretofore they have been more or less separated.

Mr. GOOD. They are separated now.

Mr. BARKLEY. They are trying to get all these offices under the same roof, and the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance testified before the committee that in at least three cities they have arrangements made for the Vocational Education Board and the Public Health Service to go into the same building.

Mr. GOOD. That is about the extent of their coordination, according to their estimate for appropriations for the coming year.

Mr. BARKLEY. They have not been able to get quarters in the same building as yet in every instance. They can not do it all overnight.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. JONES of Texas. It is not contemplated, is it, that the physicians at the regional offices will personally examine applicants at the offices?

Mr. BARKLEY. Not necessarily, unless it is in the immediate vicinity.

Mr. JONES of Texas. There will be local physicians to examine them.

Mr. BARKLEY. There will be local examiners, of course.

Mr. JONES of Texas. And inasmuch as their reports must come to Washington before final disposition of the cases, what is the necessity of having the papers stopped on the way?

Mr. BARKLEY. You might as well argue that a local postmaster could make an application for war-risk insurance or compensation and transmit the papers to Washington. You have already refused to eliminate these 48 suboffices, for the reason that they will bring themselves in closer contact with the men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask for three minutes in addition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to proceed for three additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. It seems to me it would be putting the cart before the horse to establish the suboffices and then abolish the regional offices. The suboffices are to be established throughout the different States. One of these regional offices, for instance, will have headquarters in Cincinnati, and its jurisdiction will extend practically over 9 or 10 States, and whatever suboffices are established in those 9 or 10 States will report directly to the regional office, and if they send to the regional office papers that are incorrect, that must be amended, or of which a new draft must be obtained, they will be sent back by the regional office to the several offices from which they emanate, and they will be corrected and completed before they are turned in to the Washington office by the regional office, and in that way, while there may not be any monetary saving, there will be a saving of time. This is an experiment, and we can not tell whether in the long run it will save any money to establish these suboffices, although the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance thinks it will; but even if it does not save any money, if it will assist some of these pitiful cases of cripples and dependents, and men entitled to the benefits of this insurance, to receive more ready and prompt action by the Government, it will justify our action here, whether it saves a dollar to the Federal Treasury or not. [Applause.]

I hope the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] will be defeated.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

Mr. GARD. I ask that the amendment be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be again reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 1, line 5, after the word "such," strike out the words "regional offices, not exceeding 14 in number and such"; also, in line 1, page 2, strike out the figures "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$500,000."

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GARD), there were—ayes 27, noes 19.

Mr. SWEET. I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa asks for tellers. Those in favor of ordering tellers will rise and stand until counted. [After counting.] Seventeen Members, not a sufficient number. Tellers are refused.

Accordingly the amendment of Mr. GARD was agreed to.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 2, after the word "section," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following language: "Provided, That the salaries of the employees of the suboffices shall be fixed in proportion to the number of soldiers furnished by the area within the jurisdiction of the suboffice, and no such employee shall receive annual compensation in excess of $4,000."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I spoke of this matter in general debate the other day. I am opposed to these lump-sum appropriations. I said then, and I still insist, that the House ought to fix some limitation on the salaries of officials. You are creating 48 suboffices throughout the United States. Unless they apportion the suboffices, give them an equal amount of work in approximately an equal territory, some employees will have lots to do and others not much work. If the salaries are all fixed the same, it will be an unfair proposition. Suppose a suboffice is established in New York or Pennsylvania, and another in a far western State where the population and the number of men furnished in the service are very much smaller than in those large States. The man who has the suboffice in New York ought to receive more compensation than the man who has the suboffice where the small number of soldiers were furnished. I do not know whether the House cares to fix these limitations or not, but some legislation ought to be had limiting the compensation of these suboffices. There is no use of criticizing the department for the salaries that they pay if Congress itself is unwilling to put a limitation on the salaries. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all of section 1 after line 2.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GOOD: Page 1, after line 2, strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, this matter was presented to the Committee on Appropriations on two different occasions in requests for a deficiency for appropriations. We did not see any merit in the proposition, and so the bureau goes to another committee. The Congress for more than 20 years has had to deal with a similar proposition. Originally there were 18 pension agencies throughout the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to waste the time of the House, but the distinguished gentleman from Iowa is speaking upon the most important matter before the House to-day, and he ought to have an audience. Members of the House will not know how to vote, and I make the point of order that no quorum is present.

Mr. GOOD. I hope the gentleman will not do that, as I have to attend a meeting within two or three minutes. There is a pretty good audience present now.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman does not care to have a larger audience, I withdraw the point, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GOOD. Originally we had 18 pension agents, each drawing $4,000 a year. The total cost of operating the 18 pension agencies in the United States was approximately $500,000 annually. Every year, a long time after their creation, an attempt was made in Congress to dislodge them and do away with useless service. But there were 18 powerful men in the 18 communities that had a tremendous influence politically, and there were $400,000 expended annually for clerks in these several communities.

Finally, about five years ago, Congress in its wisdom abolished the pension agencies and saved, according to the estimate of the Commissioner of Pensions, more than $250,000 a year. [Applause.]

Now, we are about to embark on the same thing. There is about as much reason for establishing 14 agencies here because there are 14 regional offices in the Bureau of Vocational Education and the Board of Public Health Service, as there would be in establishing 7, because there are 7 days in the week. They bear no relation to each other at all. [Applause.]

Mr. BEGG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Certainly.

Mr. BEGG. The gentleman knows that this does not only create 14 but 48 more offices.

Mr. GOOD. Yes; it creates subagencies, but I am speaking about the State agencies, and what I say as to them may also be said against establishing subagencies. When the director came before the Committee on Appropriations and asked for this in the first instance, what was the program? Simply this: That he needed to educate the boys throughout the country with regard to the needs of insurance. They wanted to have then a State agency in every State. That State agent would have insurance agents under him; as he explained it, they would perform about the same service with regard to the ex-service men in having them take and keep up insurance that the State life insurance agencies would perform with regard to their policyholders in the State.

More than that, they wanted a million dollars a year, as I recall, to subsidize the magazines and newspapers of the country to carry advertisements. When this bill was originally reported to the committee by the subcommittee it carried the advertisement proposition. The two go together. True, that item has been eliminated.

Now, I think section 2 of the bill is a very wise provision. You say you need the regional agents, and that you need the subagents. I say to you that the boy in the small town or in the country is just as much entitled to full knowledge with regard to this service as the fellow who lives in the town where you have the subagents or where you have the regional office. Give the postmaster in every place authority to furnish the information and give him the authority to do the work. Many of them do not now have anything much to do. A few years ago we had a Commission of Economy and Efficiency appointed by President Taft. That commission made a report. Judge Warwick, the present Comptroller of the Treasury, was a member of the commission, one of the ablest men, I think, in the Government service to-day. That commission made a report, and in one respect their report was that the first-class postmasters performed no useful service except a political service. They recommended the abolition of all these offices. But here is where you can give them something to do. Here is an opportunity for them to perform a real service, instead of finding more jobs and creating more places which we have been complaining about on this side of the House.

We have complained because the former Democratic Congress and this Democratic administration have been wasteful and extravagant in creating new offices and in creating useless positions, and we have said that we are going to cut them out and that we are going to reduce the number of useless employees. I want to do that very thing.

Mr. BLANTON. But the gentleman's side was only camouflaging when he said that.

Mr. GOOD. Yet here is a proposition to create more offices when we ought to be retrenching. I want these men to have the information. I am just as anxious as anyone that they shall have all of the information available, but if you are going to give them that information by personal touch of a representative of the Government, who can explain it to the boys, then you will need more than 48 offices; you will need an agency like the Post Office Department or some other agency. I think that is all taken care of in the second paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

Mr. GOOD. Oh, I want only two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that his time be extended for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GOOD. I call attention to section 2, which provides that, under rules and regulations such as the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General may prescribe, the Postmaster General is authorized to receive war-risk insurance premiums, and so forth. Remember, the Bureau of War Risk Insurance is under the Secretary of the Treasury. Under these regulations the postmaster is authorized to receive applications for reinstatement of lapsed or converted insurance. The post office is a great force, carried on at great expense, amounting to $400,000,000 a year. It reaches every hamlet, village, and town, and comes in personal touch with every man on the rural route. Why not use that agency, the most complete and perfect agency in the Government, the one that is conducted the most economically of any of the Government agencies? Let us use it and extend its functions, so it will perform the service and cut out these 48 suboffices and 14 regional offices.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that the information about the insurance is rather technical, and is it not true that the Postmaster General will have no information with reference to it? Would not the agents stationed in each State be best able to give to the various legion members the explanation required, and would not that whole program be beneficial to the boys?

Mr. GOOD. Why should the information be technical? Any postmaster of ordinary intelligence can perform that service. I think the information that would be furnished by the Secretary of the Treasury and the Postmaster General to them ought to be sufficient, together with all of the printed circulars that have been sent to the men——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. HUSTED. And all of that information could be fully set forth in circulars.

Mr. GOOD. Absolutely; and that has been done.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be again extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GOOD. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Does the gentleman know of any instance in which there has been any such technical information that a single boy has failed to get his insurance rewritten, if he wished it?

Mr. GOOD. Personally, I do not. I think very full information has been furnished, and when the director first came before the committee he stated the reason he was asking a million or two dollars for the advertisement was that resort to advertisements was on the theory that they did not have the addresses of a majority of the ex-service men.

Mr. DOWELL. Is it not true that the insurance lapsed in three-fourths of the cases?

Mr. GOOD. Oh, yes; in a great many cases; I am not sure of the percentage.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Iowa has again expired.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD]. It seems to me that if that amendment is carried it will very largely curtail the effect of this measure. As it is now, we have cut the appropriation by $500,000. The proposition originally was born in the American Legion and was incorporated in resolutions adopted by the legion in its Minneapolis meeting last November. True, we have not indorsed or incorporated in this bill all of the resolutions or recommendations of the legion, but we do believe that in its insistence upon having these suboffices and these regional offices it has presented to Congress a concrete, valuable proposition, one which will inure to the advantage of these soldiers. If we do not get those boys to insure, or if they do not retain the insurance which they have already taken, the beneficent plan of insurance to soldiers will practically fall to the ground; and as it falls to the ground hereafter there will be growing demands upon Congress for consideration of a different kind.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] says that there is no coordination and that there will be no coordination if you have these regional offices and suboffices. Let me add this proposition: Is not the Public Health Service under the Secretary of the Treasury, and is not the enforcement of the war-risk insurance act under the Secretary of the Treasury? If that be true, then the Secretary of the Treasury has the power to secure coordination as to those two services. We want to put all these agencies under the same roof, so that the boys will not be compelled to go from town to town in order to comply with the requirements of the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

Mr. GOOD. Does not the gentleman know that while they are under the Secretary of the Treasury, each is under a different assistant and that they are not able to agree with regard to many of the details of these various services?

Mr. ESCH. That is not a responsibility of Congress. That is a responsibility of the administrative officers. Congress fulfills its obligation when it puts under one department the coordination of the Public Health Service and the enforcement of the war-risk insurance act. I do not fear, if this is passed, that there will not be coordination. There certainly will be. Talk to the soldiers, and they will tell you their complaints against the administration of the war-risk insurance act and the vocational rehabilitation act—that they are sent to one town to be examined by a surgeon of the Public Health Service and then to another town in order to qualify under the war-risk insurance act, and still to another to get further necessary data. Why put them to all of this inconvenience if you can aid them with 14 agencies and have all under one roof, where all of the information needed for them to qualify can be readily obtained. I hope the amendment will not pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. GOOD) there were—ayes 39, noes 38.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The committee again divided; and the tellers (Mr. SWEET and Mr. GOOD) reported that there were—ayes 52, noes 47.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the Bureau of War Risk Insurance shall relieve from the payment of premiums on renewable term insurance the following persons, to wit: (a) Those who are receiving hospital care under said bureau, during the period they are receiving such care; (b) those who are receiving vocational training pursuant to the vocational rehabilitation act, during the period of such training; and (c) those who are temporarily totally disabled by reason of an injury or disease entitling them to compensation, during the period of such total disability.

That said bureau shall also provide, without charge therefor, hospital, dental, medical, and surgical care and treatment and prosthetic appliances for all honorably discharged commissioned officers and enlisted men disabled by reason of any wound or injury received or disease contracted while in the service of the United States and in the line of duty: Provided, That application for such care and treatment and appliances shall be made within one year from the date of the man's discharge or from the date this act goes into effect, whichever is the later.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. PARRISH: Page 4, line 19, after the word "duty," strike out the colon, insert a period, and strike out all of lines 20, 21, 22, and 23.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have made this motion to strike out lines 20, 21, 22, and 3 on page 4 of the bill for the reason that I do not believe that there is to-day a man, woman, or child anywhere in the United States who would for a moment stand for the pleading of the statute of limitations against a boy who has contracted disease or has been injured in the service. This bill as it is now written by the committee—and I have the greatest respect for the committee; I know that they have the welfare of these men at heart—provides that if they have contracted disease in the service or if they have been injured in the service, they must apply for treatment within one year from the passage of this act, and if they fail to so file their claims, then the great Government of the United States must plead the statute of limitations against them and say because they did not apply within one year they must go away and receive treatment elsewhere.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARRISH. I will.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Would the gentleman put any limitation upon it whatever?

Mr. PARRISH. I would put absolutely no limitation whatever upon the time in which a man who has been wounded in the service or received injuries in the service could come to the United States Government and receive treatment.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. That is preliminary to the real question. How about the men who have served in all the other wars?

Mr. PARRISH. Well, we have just passed a bill the other day, I will say in answer to my friend——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. In reference to these hospitals?

Mr. PARRISH. No; in reference to the men of the Spanish-American War by taking care of them if they are unable for any cause growing out of the war or——

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana rose.

Mr. PARRISH. Is there another question?

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. I do not want to take up the gentleman's time.

Mr. PARRISH. I feel sure the spirit that probably prompted the committee in adding this limitation to the bill was that they wanted these men to come in and get the treatment so they could get through with it; but I say to you that when this war was declared and when the emergency confronted the American people Congress said to the boys that they must come into the service. They were given no choice. We commanded them, and now since the war is over, since these men have gone and met the crisis and have received injuries or suffered wounds and have come back to this country, it is now time to let the boys have their way and say when they desire to take the treatment, and the Government ought to stand with open arms until the last day of time if it is necessary to care for the boys who have suffered injury in the service. It may be said that they ought to take the treatment within one year. It is said that there are something like 4,000 men in my State who contracted tuberculosis in the service. The hospital accommodations in the State are not sufficient to take care of them and many of them must secure treatment in some other States. A boy fresh from the firing line or the trenches, perhaps, braced with the courage that accompanied him when he went through that ordeal, may think himself equal to this fight against that grim reaper of death, and he may fight it out himself alone or fight it out with his family for 12 months from the passage of this act. But the time may come when he will find himself matched in an unequal contest and the time may come when he will have to fall back upon the great arm of his Government, and, in the name of God, gentlemen, are we going to say to him or them that we will plead the statute of limitations against him and say that he can not get treatment from the Government when he returns to it?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PARRISH. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. PARRISH. I feel that the Government, I feel that the people of the United States, would be hard to the very core if it should say to a man 10 years from now, if he could prove that his injury dated back and was the direct result of his service in the Army, that treatment should be denied such a young man. I do not think there will be many cases of that kind, but there will be many that will extend beyond the period of one year—I do not believe the Government would stand for one moment for the pleading of the statute of limitations and throw in a soldier's face that statute which would say that because he did not come within one year, forever hereafter he must be denied the help of this Government. I do not believe, my good friends, the framer of this bill—I do not believe that the members of this committee would stand for a moment for the pleading of the statute of limitations. It is a sad thing when the Government of the United States by reason of its statutes will plead a limitation against a man upon property rights. It does not do it very often, if at all, but it is infinitely a sadder thing for the great Government of the United States to plead the statute of limitations against an unfortunate man or boy who in the service contracted disease or fell with a wound that continued with him through life and treatment became necessary years afterwards. Certainly not. There are many cases of that kind, gentlemen of the committee, and I am very much in earnest when I say that we ought to strike from the provisions of this bill any kind of legislation or any kind of a provision that would allow a limitation to be hurled in the face of these unfortunate men. No; we do not want a limitation to be placed against them. We want him to know that the arm of the great Government that he has served in the hour of its crisis, when he has aided in holding aloft that flag which has never known defeat; we want him to know and feel that the Government is back of him and ready to support him, and that the heart of its people is too generous, too great, too powerful, too appreciative ever to say to any such man, no matter whether he comes in 1 year or 20 years, that he shall be denied treatment in the hospitals of this great Government. [Applause.]

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, after listening to the gentleman's statement I am convinced that he does not understand the full import of this particular section of the bill.

Now, according to prior law, anyone who is entitled to compensation is entitled to reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services. I call his attention to the exact wording of the law:

(6) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured person shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services and with such supplies, including wheeled chairs, artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances, as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary, which wheeled chairs, artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances may be procured by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in such manner, either by purchase or manufacture, as the director may determine to be advantageous and reasonably necessary: Provided, That nothing in this act shall be construed to affect the necessary military control over any member of the Military or Naval Establishments before he shall have been discharged from the military or naval service.

Now, that applies to men who are entitled to compensation. The question arose in regard to the men who have been injured in the service who come within the 10 per cent; that is, their disability was not rated 10 per cent but was rated less than 10 per cent, and yet their injuries were received while in the service and in line of duty. Now, this provision is placed in the bill for the purpose of giving those who were slightly injured, those who have a rating of less than 10 per cent, this benefit; and the committee thought that under the circumstances those who had been slightly injured and were not entitled to compensation should receive from the Government medical and surgical care and treatment.

I may say in this connection, in order that there may be no misapprehension as to the language used, I have an amendment to propose, which is to the effect that the provisions in this section are in addition to the medical care and treatment that are accorded men who are entitled to compensation.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What is the reason for putting the limitation on? If they are entitled to it at all, why limit them?

Mr. SWEET. There must be an end to these things, and for that reason, and because of the small number of slightly disabled men who would fall below the 10 per cent, it was thought best by the committee that it should be limited to one year from the date of the man's discharge, or from the date this act goes into effect, whichever is the later. Their injuries will be slight, because they will be rated at less than 10 per cent.

Mr. McDUFFIE. If the gentleman will yield further, does the gentleman think there should ever be an end to the Government treatment of soldiers who entered this war and were disabled as the result of their services in the war, even though 10 per cent?

Mr. SWEET. The moment a man's disability is rated more than 10 per cent he is entitled to medical and surgical care and treatment under the other provisions of the act. Whatever ailment they may have is purely temporary at this time, and in order that there can not be any question about the law we have limited it to one year in which to make application; and, of course, under the provisions of this bill it must be some injury or disability received or contracted while in the service of the United States in line of duty.

Mr. McDUFFIE. What is the gentleman's amendment?

Mr. SWEET. My amendment is—the one that I shall offer in a few moments—page 4, line 14, after the word "that," insert the following: "in addition to the care, treatment, and appliances now authorized by law."

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. For those who are being treated and cared for and who are injured more than 10 per cent there is not any reason for this provision at all, is there?

Mr. SWEET. None whatever.

Mr. PARRISH. Then what benefit will the amendment that you have in mind have?

Mr. SWEET. It will reach the disabled men who are rated less than the 10 per cent, because the other provisions in the law simply give medical care and treatment to those who are entitled to compensation.

Mr. PARRISH. Do you not think, as a practical proposition, that this limitation here will cause endless confusion throughout the country and that men who are enforcing this law will resort to this to cut good men off who need treatment? And do you not think that a man may be injured now to a small extent, but time may aggravate that injury as age comes on, and way out yonder in the future he may be entitled to treatment, when he does not need it now?

Mr. SWEET. If that is true, then the rating of his disabilities will be over 10 per cent and he will be entitled to the care and treatment heretofore provided for.

Mr. OLIVER. The gentleman's amendment, then——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLIVER. I am opposed to any time limitation; yet if the gentleman wishes to make it apply only to that class of cases indicated, it occurs to me he should prepare his amendment differently and let it read:

Provided, however, That this limitation shall only apply to those having less than a 10 per cent disability rating.

That, in my opinion, would clearly state the purpose of this proviso as outlined by the gentleman.

Mr. SWEET. My amendment means just that, and it is more liberal to the fellow who is injured.

Mr. OLIVER. No. Your position is that the man now drawing compensation who has a disability rating in excess of 10 per cent is never barred from applying for medical-aid treatment. This section, I submit, is not so drawn as to make it clear that the gentleman's interpretation will hereafter be adopted by those charged with its enforcement, and certainly the gentleman should now make it clear that the time limitation is only intended to those having a disability rating of less than 10 per cent.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think it would be very easy to cover that.

Mr. OLIVER. Certainly it will, and it should be done. I am not in sympathy with any time limitation. It should not be subject to the slightest difference of opinion as to the class of cases to which it is applicable.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would be easy to cover that by inserting in this paragraph the words provided for in this section and that "the application for such care and treatment and appliances provided for in this section shall be made in one year."

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask the gentleman if he thinks the proviso as drawn shows that it is applicable only to those having less than 10 per cent disability?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Clearly it would show that, with the amendment which the gentleman from Iowa proposes, if that is incorporated.

Mr. OLIVER. There is nothing now in the section which limits it to such class only.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; there is not.

Mr. SWEET. To cover that other proposition we prepared this amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PARRISH].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. PARRISH) there were—ayes 16, noes 30.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Page 4, line 14, after the word "that," insert the following: "In addition to the care, treatment, and appliances now authorized by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois ought to be added.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I move to insert after the word "appliances," in line 21, the words "provided for in this paragraph."

Mr. SWEET. After the word "appliances"?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. After the word "appliances," in line 21.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MANN of Illinois: Page 4, line 21, after the word "appliances," insert the words "provided for in this paragraph."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That section 19 of the act entitled "An act to amend and modify the war-risk insurance act," approved December 24, 1919, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 19. That the amount of the monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or insurance which has heretofore or which may hereafter become payable under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act, but which has not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same, shall be paid to the executor or administrator of such deceased person, but if no demand in writing has been made by such executor or administrator, then, in cases where the amount is $400 or less, the same shall be paid in the following order of precedence: First, to the widow; second, if decedent left no widow, or the widow be dead at the time of settlement, then to the children and their issue per stirpes; third, if no widow, children, or issue of children, then to the father and mother in equal parts; fourth, if either the father or mother be dead, then to the one surviving; fifth, if there be no widow, child, issue of children, father or mother at the date of settlement, then to the brothers and sisters and the children of the deceased brothers and sisters, per stirpes: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the decedent's estate of his funeral expenses, expenses of his last illness, board, rent, or other household expenses for which the decedent was liable, provided a claim therefor is presented by the person or persons who actually paid the same, before settlement by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out lines 15 to 21, inclusive.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM: Page 6, line 15, strike out all of lines 15 to 21, inclusive.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, the language contained in these lines would permit the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance practically to administer the estate of the deceased, and in his judgment or discretion to pay claims against the estate of the deceased. It goes beyond the statutes of many of the States. For instance, it would give priority not only to funeral expenses and expenses of the last illness, but as well to board, rent, or other household expenses for which the decedent was liable. Suppose the decedent left a widow surviving him. In the State of Illinois only the funeral expenses and the expenses of the last illness would be preferred claims against the estate, and the remainder of the estate would go to the widow, up to a certain amount allowed to her, under the law, for the support of herself and any minor children; and such claims as those mentioned in this section, for board, rent, and other household expenses would not be recognized as claims prior to her allowance or award under the laws of the State of Illinois. I apprehend that the same state of the law exists in other commonwealths.

The effect of this provision is to give the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance the authority to administer these small estates of less than $400 along more liberal lines than such estates could be administered in the various States.

My attention has also just been called to the fact that this provision, beginning with line 15, on page 6, may not necessarily be limited to estates of less than $400, and I submit that in case the estate is in the amount of more than $400 it would be necessary to have an administrator appointed under this section of the proposed act, and that therefore the Bureau of War Risk Insurance would have nothing to do with the payment of these claims, and this provision would be a nullity in the case of such estates. I think we may well leave it to the people who have claims against these small estates, which would be practically administered by the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, to find their own means of reimbursing themselves, and not place in the machinery of the office of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance a department for the administration of estates and for the determination of the question whether claims should properly be allowed and paid. I submit that these lines should be stricken out.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment of the gentleman will not be adopted. The amendment strikes out the proviso which reads as follows:

Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the decedent's estate of his funeral expenses, expenses of his last illness, board, rent, or other household expenses for which the decedent was liable, provided a claim therefor is presented by the person or persons who actually paid the same, before settlement by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

In case the amount is over $400, an administrator or executor must be appointed. If it is less than $400 and an administrator or executor is appointed, it is paid to the administrator or executor. This provision here is a clean-up section. Under the provisions of the law any insurance money is exempt and therefore can not be applied in the payment of claims. This provision is put in here so that any claim of that character will not be prejudiced when properly presented against an estate.

And further, under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act, it provides for the payment of funeral expenses, and it is necessary that this provision be left in the bill at least in part.

Mr. SIEGEL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MACCRATE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. In just a moment. In view of what the gentleman from New York and others said the other day, after looking over the section I have concluded to offer an amendment, which I will read at this time so that they will understand its full import, and I trust that they will withdraw the pending amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I purposely waited to see whether the committee had any amendment.

Mr. SWEET. I will say that the chairman of the committee apparently was not looking this way, or perhaps I was a little slow in obtaining recognition. My amendment is as follows:

Page 6, line 17, strike out the words "of his" before the word "funeral" and insert in lieu thereof the word "for."

Following that, on page 6, I move to strike out all after the words "funeral expenses," in lines 17 and 18, to and including the word "liable," in line 19.

So that the proviso will then read:

Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the decedent's estate for funeral expenses, provided a claim therefor is presented by the person or persons who actually paid the same, before settlement by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance.

I think this meets squarely the gentleman's criticism and objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. In view of the statement by the chairman of the committee, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment that I have offered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to withdraw his amendment. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SWEET. Now, Mr. Chairman, I will offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SWEET: Page 6, line 7, strike out the words "of his" before the word "funeral," and insert in lieu thereof the word "for."

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I intend to follow that amendment, if adopted, by another amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman strikes out the words "of his."

Mr. SWEET. Yes; strike out the words "of his" and insert the word "for."

Mr. MACCRATE. Would not that make it general instead of "his" funeral expenses?

Mr. SWEET. The language in this section is about the same as that which is now in force in another department.

Mr. MACCRATE. I have a case where the man's wife died, and they thought he was entitled to funeral expenses for the wife. Now, if you strike out "for his funeral expenses"——

Mr. SWEET. It can only apply to his funeral expenses because the present law relates to expenses of this character.

Mr. MACCRATE. Why strike out the words "of his"?

Mr. OLIVER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Within what time is the administrator or executor required to make the demand for the amount when less than $400?

Mr. SWEET. Within a reasonable time.

Mr. OLIVER. There is nothing stated in regard to it.

Mr. SWEET. I will say to the gentleman that this question was considered by the committee. If you put it 60 days or 90 days or 100 days, the Government could not settle within that period.

Mr. OLIVER. May not the War Risk Bureau delay payment until there is a renunciation by the legal representative of the right to claim the $400?

Mr. SWEET. No; because they are permitted to do it. The same provision is in force in the War Department for the payment of the balance due on settlements of accounts of deceased officers or enlisted men to widows or heirs, and so forth.

Mr. OLIVER. There is another objection to the section in its present form. It seems to presuppose the appointment of an executor or administrator, and only where there has been such an appointment would payment be authorized. Why not say, "If no demand is made by any legal representative of deceased within a reasonable time"?

Mr. SWEET. Then you ask the question, What is a reasonable time? And that is a question for the court to determine.

Mr. OLIVER. You make the amount payable absolutely to the executor or administrator in the first part of this section, and until a personal representative is appointed, of course, there could be no demand, and the director of the bureau might with propriety hold that until an administrator or executor was appointed no opportunity to demand payment could arise or be considered as waived. So it occurs to me that you should provide that in the absence of a demand in writing by an administrator or executor the War Risk Bureau could pay any sum due, not exceeding $400, at its discretion, to the parties named in the section.

Mr. SWEET. That would have a tendency to delay matters because the War Risk Bureau would be looking for a demand.

Mr. OLIVER. The purpose I have in view is to avoid any delay and to do away with any possible insistence that a legal representative must first be appointed before the right accrues for the bureau to pay over the sum to the beneficiaries named.

Mr. SWEET. After reading it over carefully, the gentleman must come to the conclusion that the War Risk Bureau can pay it after a reasonable time.

Mr. OLIVER. I have read it, and it provides first for payment to the executor or administrator, and then seeks where such representative makes no demand that it can be paid to certain parties specified.

Mr. SWEET. And if no demand in a reasonable time has been made by the executor or administrator——

Mr. OLIVER. That assumes that an executor or administrator must be appointed.

Mr. SWEET. Then the payment is to be made as specified. The question came up under the law as it now exists, and it was found that the laws of the various States were not uniform in this respect. We are endeavoring to frame the bill so that it will allow the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to distribute these small amounts without delay. With the gentleman's suggested amendment the War Risk Bureau would be required to delay until it could find out whether there was a legal representative appointed.

Mr. OLIVER. No; I wish to authorize payment, even though no administrator or executor may ever be appointed. As the bill is drawn it may be that they are not authorized to pay until it is first ascertained that an administrator or executor has been appointed and has failed to exercise the right given to demand it in writing.

Mr. JONES of Texas. In that connection, I wish to state that in our State there may be some instances in which administrators are not necessary and no administration is had. Under this provision how would the money be distributed—I mean in those cases where no administration is necessary?

Mr. SWEET. If there has been no demand by an administrator or executor, then the distribution can be made.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Very well. Now, in line 17 you insert the word "for," and it seems to me that you make the funeral services due to the estate.

Mr. SWEET. I have no objection to the insertion of the word "his," and I ask unanimous consent that after the word "for," line 17, to insert the word "his."

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think it ought to be "of his."

Mr. SWEET. Then I leave it as I offered it originally and withdraw my request.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What is the reading now of this section beginning with line 15?

The CHAIRMAN. The section reads exactly as it was, except in line 17 the words "of his" are stricken out and the word "for" inserted. The rest is just as it has been.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] has an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Page 6, strike out all after the words "funeral expenses," in lines 17 and 18, and including the word "liable," in line 19.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "for," the word "his."

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, that amendment has been adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not germane to the amendment now pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend in line 17, after the word "for," by inserting the word "his."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. CHINDBLOM: Page 6, line 17, after the word "for," insert the word "his."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "for" and inserting the word "of."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order, for that would be a reconsideration of the amendment offered a few minutes ago by the gentleman from Iowa and already agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is it in order to move to reconsider now, or will it be necessary to wait until the amendment is disposed of?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is pending. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to reconsider the amendment by which "of his" was stricken out in line 17 and "for" inserted in lieu thereof.

The CHAIRMAN. A motion to reconsider may not be made in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. JONES of Texas. A parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Is there any way to get reconsideration?

The CHAIRMAN. The House must consider these amendments when the bill is reported to the House. That suggests a remedy of itself.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I call attention to the language as the gentleman has changed it in line 17. He has stricken out the words "of his" and inserted the word "for." I submit, if you read that language carefully, you will see that it says this section shall not be so construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the estate for funeral expenses, and that either means the amount due the estate, or it does not mean anything. In other words, it changes the whole meaning of the original language. Under the original language the proviso was that the section should not be construed so as to prevent payment from the amount due to the estate "of his" funeral expenses, and when you strike out "of his" and insert "for," the language means that it shall not be construed as to prevent payment from the amount due the estate for funeral expenses. What does that mean? If it means anything, it means whatever may be due to the estate for funeral expenses. If you leave the language as originally written, it is all right, but when you strike out "of his" and insert "for" you will find that it does not mean anything or it means some amount due to the estate, and it destroys the language absolutely. The committee had the language right in the first place, but you have destroyed the meaning of the sentence by making the change.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman is right. Would it not meet the parliamentary situation if the gentleman should offer to amend by striking out the proviso and by drawing a new proviso to embrace the language he desires?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Perhaps that would meet the parliamentary situation. I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "for" in line 17 and insert the words "of his."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will inform the gentleman that the language is not as he apprehends it. As the language now stands in line 17 it is "for his funeral expenses."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then I ask unanimous consent to strike out the word "for" and insert the word "of."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that he ask unanimous consent that the vote may be taken again on the two amendments.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If that will meet the parliamentary situation, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. While we are floundering around on this proposition, I would like to suggest that you recall all that has been done, all of the changes that have been made, and stick to the original language, beginning with the word "provided."

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is what we are trying to do.

Mr. LAYTON. Because if a man is dead, somebody will bury him, but if one of these soldiers is in a home, or if he wants lodging or board, if he wants to be taken care of, it seems to me that is the most beneficent provision in the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken again on the two amendments amending line 17, page 6.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the vote be again taken on the two amendments in line 17. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will report the amendment, first, of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET], in line 17, and then the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], in line 17.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SWEET: Page 6, line 17, strike out the words "of his" before the word "funeral" and insert in lieu thereof the word "for."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the word "such," in line 3, page 6, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "an." Will the chairman accept that?

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman changes the word "such," in line 3, to the word "an," so it will read "paid by an executor or administrator." I have no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER: Page 6, line 3, after the word "by," strike out the word "such" and insert in lieu thereof the word "an."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, would a motion be in order to move to reconsider the amendment which has just been made to restore the original language of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. It would not be in order, not in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. CHINDBLOM: Page 6, line 15, after the word "Provided," insert "That any unpaid allotment shall be paid upon demand to the person who made such allotment: And provided further."

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, this section relates to the matter of allotments, family allowances, compensation, and insurance. By its terms the allotment is made by the soldier himself out of his own compensation due him from the Government. In other words, it is his own money which he has caused to be transferred to some beneficiary. In the event of the death of the beneficiary, the estate of the beneficiary may go to an entire stranger, to one in whom the soldier had no interest whatever, and the result would be that his allotment, which he had made out of his own pay for the benefit of a dependent beneficiary, would go to some one in whom he had no interest and for whom he would never have made any provision. I believe that where a soldier has made an allotment for the benefit of a beneficiary or dependent, and such beneficiary or dependent dies, the soldier should have the privilege to get the return to himself of that money which he has allotted to the dependent or beneficiary. That is the effect of this amendment, and I submit that the amendment should be adopted.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do.

Mr. McKEOWN. This is to cover the amount that is taken out of the soldier's pay and has not been paid?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Exactly. It is the amount taken out of the soldier's salary which has not been paid to the beneficiary, and if this amendment is not adopted the heirs of the beneficiary would get the money which the soldier had allotted.

Mr. McKEOWN. Would not the money be the soldier's until it was delivered to the beneficiary in the lifetime of the beneficiary?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not according to this act, because this bill says, page 5, section 19, that the amount of the monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or insurance which has heretofore or which may hereafter become payable and which has not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same, shall be paid to the executor or administrator, and in case of a small estate to certain heirs of the decedent.

Mr. McKEOWN. Under the gentleman's amendment it is to be returned to the soldier from whom it was taken?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes; to be returned to the soldier from whom it was taken and who made the allotment.

Mr. SWEET. If the soldier is dead, how is it returned to him?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the soldier is dead, it goes to his estate, of course.

Mr. SWEET. But this is a clean-up section, and deals with money due the decedent's estate.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. But the proviso beginning at line 15, on page 6, does not cover this kind of case.

Mr. SWEET. We have amended it so that it only applies to funeral expenses. That is all there is left in this last section.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I insist that there is nothing in this bill now which permits the soldier to demand and receive back the allotment which he has made to his beneficiary who has died.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman probably is aware of the fact that at the present time where allotment has not been paid to the beneficiary and the soldier has been discharged, almost daily the department is returning to the soldier himself such allotments upon demand.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They do in certain cases, particularly if a Member of Congress will take the matter up and see that it is done, but it may not always be done, while if this amendment is adopted as presented the allotment will always be refunded upon demand.

Mr. McKEOWN. If the gentleman will yield, I will say to the gentleman from Texas I have a case where they refused to return it to the soldier.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I just wish to call the attention of the committee to the language in the section.

That the amount of the monthly installments of allotment and family allowance, compensation, or insurance which has heretofore or which may hereafter become payable under the provisions of the war-risk insurance act, but which has not been paid prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same, shall be paid to the executor or administrator of such deceased person—

And so forth.

Now, that relates to the amounts that are due at the time of the death of the soldier or the person entitled to receive the same.

Mr. MacCRATE. Is not that prior to it? It is at the time of the death of the person entitled to receive them, and that is why their executor gets it and not the soldier.

Mr. SWEET. It is prior to the death of the person entitled to receive the same.

Mr. MacCRATE. Not of the soldier, however.

Mr. SWEET. That is so.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. I will.

Mr. BLACK. The gentleman from Iowa, it seems to me, has the wrong situation in mind. Now, for instance, this section relates to allotments and allowances that are due the decedent at the time of his death. There can not be an allotment or allowance due the soldier at the time of his death.

Mr. SWEET. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. BLACK. And therefore the gentleman from Illinois is striking at a matter that I had in mind, and when I can get time in my own time, without interfering, I think I can suggest an amendment which will probably correct the situation more nearly than the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. SWEET. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again read in order that I may get the full import of it.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. SWEET. I will be glad to yield.

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the section, this has to deal with the allotments and allowances to people other than the soldier, but the gentleman is assuming they are dead.

You are assuming they are dead. They have died. How can you provide that those allotments and allowances should be paid to the persons entitled to them when they are dead? That is what your amendment will do. This has nothing to do with the soldier's death, but with the allottee's death, and when the allottee is dead it provides what shall be done with the money accrued and not paid. It is part of the allottee's estate and should go to its executor or administrator, and if you do not provide for administration and letters testamentary then it shall go in the way the bill provides.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacCRATE. Certainly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman say that if a soldier should have made an allotment to a sister, made an allotment out of money due him from the Government, and the sister dies leaving collateral heirs, brothers and sisters, the allotment that was taken out of the soldier's pay should be paid to the brothers and sisters of the deceased sister rather than to be paid back to the soldier who demands it for himself?

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman, if the soldier has made an allotment to his sister, and the bureau has failed to pay that allotment, and the sister dies, there is no reason why we should change the testamentary law or law of distribution.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Suppose a soldier makes an allotment to his sister for the purpose of helping to support her, and she dies and leaves a husband, who has the right to the money—the soldier or the husband?

Mr. MacCRATE. At first blush it looks as if the soldier has the better right to the money, he having made the allotment to her. As I have heard the amendment read, it does not say that the soldier shall demand it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understood it, it was to be paid back to the person who made the allotment, and that is the soldier.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MacCRATE. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. If the soldier made the allotment to his sister, and the allotment was not paid to her through the agency of the Government, would not that money still be the money of the soldier instead of the allottee, because it had never been delivered? The Government is the agency by which the money is to be delivered to the allottee. The Government agency having failed to deliver that money in the lifetime of the allottee, is not the money still the money of the soldier?

Mr. MacCRATE. I am not ready to say that the money would be the allottee's.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to have, first, the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] in order to make this suggestion: It seems to me the proposition he has raised by his amendment could probably be cured if, in line 6, after the word "widow," you would insert "or husband," and insert the same after the word "widow" in the two following lines. The situation the gentleman has in mind has been brought to the attention of most Members of the House. For example, a husband, while in the Army, made an allotment to his wife, and upon that allotment the Government made an allowance. Now this section of the bill provides that if the wife in a case of that kind dies, with unpaid allotment and allowance due her, it would go to the children, if she left any, and if not it would go to the mother or the father. If we should insert the words "or husband" after the word "widow," then when the wife dies the husband would receive the allotment and the allowance.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I believe the gentleman directed his inquiry to me?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I respectfully submit that the gentleman's case is not covered by my amendment at all. I am referring to a case where the allottee has died and where the soldier has made an allotment in favor of an allottee.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; his wife, for instance, who is dead. Under this bill the husband would not get the money, although he is the soldier who in fact made the allotment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I do not think he should get the money if the soldier is still living. He should be permitted to get it back himself.

Mr. BLACK. In such a case as I have mentioned the soldier himself would be the husband.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Not necessarily. The allottee or beneficiary might be a sister of the soldier, might be the mother of the soldier. It might be a case where he did not want the father to get any part of it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Suppose he has half a dozen brothers who did not go to war, and he makes an allotment to the mother and she dies, why should the money be distributed to the other brothers?

Mr. BLACK. I think the amendment I have in mind might not reach all cases, but at the same time the trouble with the gentleman's amendment is that this allowance would go one place and the allotment would go another, and as the amount is small I have in mind trying to fix it so that both would go the same way.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. The allowance comes from the Government. I am not so concerned about what becomes of that, but the allotment comes out of the soldier's own pay. Let the allowance follow the ordinary rules of descent, but so far as the allotment is concerned, which is taken out of his money, let it go to him if he survives as beneficiary.

Mr. BLACK. I think the gentleman's amendment ought to be adopted, and I will offer mine later. It is plain to me now that there will be no conflict between the two amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 6, line 4, after the word "administrator," insert the following: "or if no executor or administrator is legally necessary."

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in offering this amendment is to take care of cases which I suppose arise in every State—I know they do in mine—where an estate is small, and therefore they do not want to go to the expense of administration proceedings. There is a statute in my State, and I know there is such a statute in many of the States, if not in all the other States, to the effect that where the heirs are of age, or those legally entitled to inherit the estate are of age, there may be such condition as to render administration proceedings unnecessary, in which event the courts are authorized, or the heirs themselves are authorized, to take charge and distribute the money according to the laws of descent and distribution.

Now, if the estate is only $400 and it is to be applied in a State where provision is made that administration proceedings are not necessary in all cases, why should they pay out $100 of the $400 on these proceedings? Let us assume a case in the State of Texas, because I happen to be familiar with that State, where the amount due is $300, and therefore would come within the provisions of this paragraph. Under the terms of our statute no administration proceedings are necessary. They could take the entire $300, if my amendment were adopted, and distribute it according to the terms of this section without any administration proceedings or expense whatever, whereas if this paragraph remains as it is, as I construe it, there must be an administrator or executor appointed upon whom a demand may be made, whether it is actually made or not.

I appreciate the fact that this paragraph provides that if no demand is made by the administrator or executor, it may be distributed without reference to the administrator or executor, but the very use of the language presupposes that an executor or administrator has been appointed, so that the demand may be made by the executor or administrator.

Now, I can see no objection whatsoever to inserting the language "that if no legal administrator or executor is necessary, then they may distribute it according to the terms of this section," just the same as if one had been appointed.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. If no administrator is necessary, as in many cases in Missouri, and the property is paid to the widow as her absolute property, why should it be limited to $300? If, under the laws of the State, the property goes to the widow without having administration, why should it not go to her if it is more than the $300?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I see no reason for depriving those of small estates of this privilege just because the larger ones are deprived of it, and there is a great deal more reason why, when the amount is small, you should not put them to the expense of administration proceedings. The amount may be $300 or $200 or $100. It may cost the whole amount.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the gentleman's request?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the amount is only $150 it will take practically all of it to have administration proceedings. Why not permit them to distribute it? The law of my State provides for it and it is provided for in the laws of the State of Missouri.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. In certain cases in my State of New York administration must go to the public administrator. In certain cases administration is denied under the statutes to certain classes of nonresidents and the public administrator would have to administer on the estate. In such a case as that there would be a small amount of money which would be eaten up by the administration expenses, advertisement for claims, and so on.

Mr. JONES of Texas. When you have an administrator he must give bond and he has to advertise and give notice to the respective heirs, and the whole thing is an expense that eats up a small estate. Anyone who has ever had any experience with the settlement of estates knows that a $300 or $400 estate is absolutely eaten up by proceedings.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. We have in the State of California a law somewhat similar to that spoken of by the gentleman from Texas, whereby a certain amount in cash is distributed without administration. It has worked admirably and well and no injustice is done under it, and the estate small in amount goes to the proper beneficiary, where it ought to go.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is testimony from another State. I think that those who are familiar with the laws of the various States will find that the law generally has been developed, after that fashion. As a matter of fact, the law is based on reason and on human experience and it is the result of centuries of effort on the part of the brightest minds to produce laws and rules and regulations that will work justice as between man and man. If such a law does not exist in a State, providing that no administration is necessary in the case of small estates, nevertheless the amendment can not hinder.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. It says that "if no demand in writing has been made by such executor or administrator." Does the gentleman think that would apply to cases where it was not required?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I had that in mind, but I am afraid the bureau might construe it otherwise. By adopting this amendment there can be no doubt whatever, and when the English language can make it a little clearer I think it might be made so. I think it is very doubtful that that construction would prevail.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SWEET. I take it that the gentleman is not opposed to this section as it stands?

Mr. JONES of Texas. No. The section is all right. I am not undertaking to interfere with the administration of the section.

Mr. SWEET. Read to me your amendment.

Mr. JONES of Texas. All right. After the word "administrator" insert the words "or if no executor or administrator is legally necessary."

Mr. SWEET. Yes. You use the words "legally necessary." That puts it up to the Bureau of War Risk Insurance or the Treasury Department to determine whether or not it is legally necessary. For instance, in the gentleman's State does the question of whether it is legally necessary turn on the question of the amount involved?

Mr. JONES of Texas. It does not turn on the amount involved; but in the case of estates small in amount an administration is rarely had, and in the case of estates of large amount they usually go ahead and have administration anyway.

Mr. SWEET. Would it be natural for the bureau to hold up matters in an estate if it was not legally necessary?

Mr. JONES of Texas. If it was not necessary, do you think the bureau would go ahead and demand that there be an administration? It does not make any difference whether there is an estate down there or not. Surely if the heirs are of age and there is no question raised as to how the money should go, surely the gentleman in charge of this bill would not insist on going to the expense of an administration.

Mr. SWEET. No; I am not insisting on that; but I want to say to the gentleman that while I really have no great objection to his amendment, I fear that complications will arise in making distribution in his particular State if the amendment he proposes is adopted.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have used my State simply as an enforcing argument.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. RAKER. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have two minutes more. I want to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Would not this apply now, that if that provision was adopted and the amount left at $400, and if under the law of your State that money could be paid over without administration, then the War Risk Insurance Bureau would be entitled to pay it over to those entitled to it?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think so.

Mr. RAKER. That identical question came up in a case where our State does not require administration where the amount is less than a certain sum. I took the matter up with the War Risk Insurance Bureau. They were perfectly willing to pay under our State law, but there was no provision in the Federal statute authorizing them to do so. It is clear that it can be done if we provide in this law that it may be done, when the State authorizes it to be done, where the amount is less than a certain sum.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not think the administration down here will be hypercritical or technical about these matters. I think if the State permits distribution without administration, the bureau will do that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not yet quite understand where the gentleman's amendment comes in or what it is.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Right after the word "administrator," in line 4, insert "or if no executor or administrator is legally necessary."

The foregoing provided that a demand should be made by the administrator or executor as a condition precedent to the application of the latter part of the paragraph, and I have provided that if there be no administration had and none necessary, then this will apply just the same as if demand had been made of the administrator or executor.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I suppose an administrator is not legally necessary at any time?

Mr. JONES of Texas. An administrator or executor is legally necessary in order to distribute the property.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, yes; in order to distribute the property.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That is the term that is customarily used in the statute.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman may be correct.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Even in the case to which the gentleman refers the payment can be made to the widow or other heirs only as provided in line 4, following the amendment of the gentleman, where the amount is $400 or less.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Yes; I think it ought to apply even where the amount is more, but I do not want to interfere with the plan of the committee on that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman's amendment does apply where it is more than $400. Where the amount is less than $400 the bill covers it. The gentleman's amendment would apply to amounts above that.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am glad the gentleman called attention to that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But I wish to call the gentleman's attention to this: The gentleman does not want to make it a question of fact for the department here to determine whether administration is necessary or not. As I understand it, he wants it determined according to the law of the State.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That might be made a little more accurate by adding to my amendment some such expression as this——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Since I have looked it over, will not the gentleman admit that under the bill the money can be paid up to the amount of $400 without administration?

Mr. JONES of Texas. I am afraid not; because it presupposes first a demand by the executor or administrator.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If no demand, in writing, has been made by the executor or administrator, and if there is no administration, no demand will have been made.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I have seen the bureau hang back on technicalities, and for that reason I am somewhat doubtful as to what they would do.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman a further question.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have great respect for the judgment of the gentleman, but I really can not see how it is possible for anyone to decide that under the language of this section $400 may not be paid, regardless of the appointment of an administrator or the issuance of letters of administration.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If the gentleman will read the first part of the paragraph he will see that in the first place it is made payable directly to an administrator or executor.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Then it goes ahead and provides that if no demand in writing has been made upon the executor or administrator——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Not made upon, but by the executor or administrator.

Mr. JONES of Texas. By the executor. Well, the very language presupposes that there is such executor.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think not. I think the very language of the bill supposes that in most cases of this kind there will be no administration at all.

Mr. JONES of Texas. The language as originally drawn says "by such executor or administrator."

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think it would mean the same thing, as far as that is concerned, but that has been changed. Plainly the only meaning that that part of the section can have is that if there is no administration the money will be paid to the parties named. If there are letters of administration issued the executor or administrator must make a demand for this under the law of his State.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I think that can be logically argued, but I do not think it is certain that that construction would be placed on it by the department. I know that the language of my amendment makes it clear that no man can construe it otherwise.

Mr. TINCHER. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that unless the language is absolutely clear the department will not pay it.

Mr. JONES of Texas. If you do not make it as clear as the noonday sun the money will not be distributed.

Mr. McKEOWN. It seems to me that this language is plain, and I do not see how they can construe it otherwise.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Well, even if the gentleman's position is correct, the language I have offered would be mere surplusage and would not affect it in any way. If you adopt this amendment and say that there will be full authorization for them to go ahead and pay over these small sums, they can do it. I am just as confident, if you defeat this amendment, that if you go down there and claim $200 or $300 you will be met by some bureau clerk who will say that you have got to have administration proceedings before they can pay the money.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. And if you adopt the gentleman's amendment the same clerk will say that you have got to go back to the State and bring in proof that there is no administration required.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I do not think that you will be met with that objection.

Mr. SWEET. This matter has been submitted to the Treasury Department and has the approval of that department.

Mr. JONES of Texas. That may be true; but the House has found it necessary to amend the bill in several particulars after the Treasury Department has approved of it. If we are going to accept bills because some department has approved of them, we might as well abolish Congress and let the departments act.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 6, after the word "widow," insert the words "or husband"; line 7, after the word "widow," insert the words "or husband"; in the same line, where the word "widow" occurs the second time, insert after that word the words "or husband"; line 9, after the word "widow," insert the words "or husband."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I know that we are all anxious to get through with this bill, and I will make my remarks brief in support of the amendment which I have proposed. A concrete illustration will probably do better than anything else I can say. For example, some time ago I had a young man in my district write me who had been a soldier in the Army. During his service his wife died, and I believe there was $90 allotment and allowance due her at the time of her death. This has been paid over under the present law to the husband as her legal representative. How would that money be paid under this section? It would not go to the husband, unless he qualified as executor or administrator, because this provision does not mention the name of the husband. In the case I have mentioned the money would have gone first to the child or children, and if there were none then to the father or the mother. I therefore think the proper language would be to insert the words "or husband," so that the money would go to the husband in such cases. Of course, the compensation in some cases would properly be paid to the soldier in his lifetime, and at his death to the widow. In some cases compensation will be paid to the dependent mother of the soldier, and when she dies any sum remaining due would not be paid over to the husband, because this language does not so state.

Mr. MacCRATE. May I suggest under the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois the soldier would have the right to bring it back to himself by demanding it.

Mr. BLACK. Yes; but that does not cover the case that I have in mind. That only applies to allotments, and this section covers a very much broader ground than allotments. I will give the gentleman a concrete case. We will say under this section of the law that gives compensation of $20 a month to a dependent mother—we will say that John Jones was a soldier and was killed, and his mother makes proof of her dependency and gets $20 award. Now, when she dies where does any sum remaining due her at time of her death go? Not to her husband, because the law does not provide for it; it goes to her brother or sister.

Mr. FIELDS. The husband in that case might be the stepfather of the soldier.

Mr. BLACK. He might be; and you can imagine exceptions to any conceivable case, but I submit that the words "or husband" should have a just and proper place in this section after the word "widow."

Mr. FIELDS. Does not the gentleman think it ought to go to the next of kin?

Mr. BLACK. Well, if we were writing the bill on that theory; but we are not. The word "husband" has the same application and the same element of justice as the word "widow." What we are really doing in this section is to write a descent and distribution law to apply to these sums of less than $400, and where no executor or administrator has made written demand for the money.

Mr. MacCRATE. Would it not be better to have the minor children come before the husband?

Mr. BLACK. We are dealing with a small amount, under $400. Of course, if it is over $400, it will have to be administered according to the probate laws of the States; but we are undertaking here to direct the payment of a small amount and to provide that it shall be paid over without the necessity of administration.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLACK. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Suppose the allottee dies and there is a husband and child 2 years old. You want to pay the money to the child. To whom would it be paid?

Mr. BLACK. To the guardian or to the father as the natural guardian.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. It would have to be paid to either the guardian who was appointed or else you have to go upon the theory that the husband is entitled to it?

Mr. BLACK. Undoubtedly.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Then why not pay it to the husband in the first place without any question?

Mr. BLACK. I think it should be. I think the word "husband" has the same reason for being there as the word "widow." It would be in harmony with the usual statutes of descent and distribution, which direct the distribution of the estate of a decedent who dies intestate.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that I think through inadvertence he did not insert the same amendment after the word "widow" in line 12.

Mr. BLACK. That is correct, and I thank the gentleman for calling my attention to it.

Mr. ROGERS. I think that should be included when it is voted on.

Mr. BLACK. Yes. I ask unanimous consent to modify my amendment by inserting the words "or husband" after the word "widow" in line 12.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the modification.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 12, after the word "widow," insert the words "or husband."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JONES of Texas: Page 6, line 2, after the word "person," insert "or if no administration on the estate of the deceased is necessary under the laws of the State in which the deceased had his domicile at the time of his death, then to such person or persons as may be authorized by the law of such State."

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Chairman, my amendment will obviate the objection made to the other amendment, that it would apply only to estates of $400 or less. In practically all of the States of the Union, where there are no debts that amount to anything and where the heirs are of age, no administration is necessary. If the State does not require it, I do not see any reason why the National Government should require that they go to the expense of an administration proceeding. Under the provisions as drawn here, if the estate is valued at more than $400, it will be absolutely necessary to have an executor or an administrator in order that the funds may be distributed, even though there might be other funds in the State of a man's domicile which were administered without the necessity of such administrator or executor. No matter what the amount of the estate may be, no administration is necessary in certain cases in the State where the man has his domicile, and I can see no reason why the United States Government should require that expense.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should not be adopted, because it would destroy the very purpose of the act. As the matter now stands, whenever there is any amount of money to be paid the bureau must be governed by the laws of the several States as to the mode and manner of distribution. This is to obviate that very situation, so that these little amounts of $10 and $15 can be distributed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance without unnecessary delay and the looking up of the laws of the various States of the Union.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. I suggest to the gentleman that the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] provides that if administration is necessary it must be resorted to; but most of the States provide that the widow has certain absolute property, and they do not require her to go to the expense of administration. Why should she, where it is five or six or seven or eight hundred dollars? You should not put a widow to the expense of going through a year or two of administration. If administration is necessary, it must be had; but if it is not under the law of the State, why not let the widow collect it without going to that expense?

Mr. SWEET. But that would require the bureau to look up the method of administration and distribution of property in every State.

Mr. IGOE. They have to do that anyway.

Mr. SWEET. Under this section distribution can be made without expense to the widow.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. Under the law of the State where I live there would not be one case out of fifty where there would be administration of these estates. I think the amendment should prevail. Sixty dollars is about the cheapest for which you can have administration.

Mr. SWEET. But we are trying to get away from that proposition.

Mr. TINCHER. But you have not gotten away from it. I know they do make us administer wherever they can. I just got through a case where a widow had to pay $60 in order to get what was coming to her. I tried to argue them out of it, and briefed the matter for them, showing that they ought to pay her the money without forcing her through administration; but I could not do it. I think we should eliminate that where we can, where it does not do any harm, and we should indicate to those people down there that we want them to comply with the State law. I do not think we ought to stand and quibble about it.

Mr. SWEET. The proposed amendment simply complicates matters.

Mr. TINCHER. I do not think it does.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. IGOE) there were—ayes 20, noes 40.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct on the part of persons who are receiving care or treatment in hospitals as patients of said bureau during their stay in such hospitals. Penalties for the breach of such rules and regulations may extend to a forfeiture by the offender of such portion of the compensation payable to him, not exceeding three-fourths of the monthly installment per month for three months, for a breach committed while receiving treatment in such hospital, as may be prescribed by such rules and regulations.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment as a new section 9:

That section 401 of the war-risk insurance act as amended is hereby amended as follows: "Provided further, That any person who between the 6th day of April, 1917, and the 11th day of November, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the military or naval forces, and who was accepted provisionally and directed or ordered to a camp, post, station, or other place, for final acceptance into such service, shall be considered to be in active service during the period while such person was complying with such order or direction, and during such compliance, and until his final acceptance or rejection for enlistment or enrollment into the military or naval forces, and shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of this act."

Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. SIEGEL. A point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SIEGEL. My point of order is that we have reached a point in the section where an amendment to the old section comes first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is entitled to have an amendment to the old section considered first; but how can the Chair know what is in the amendment until it is reported by the Clerk?

Mr. SIEGEL. The gentleman read it, and it readily appears that it does not apply to the old section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert as a new section, after line 9, page 7, the following:

That section 401 of the war-risk insurance act as amended is hereby amended as follows: "Provided further, That any person who between the 6th day of April, 1917, and the 11th day of November, 1918, applied for enlistment or enrollment in the military or naval forces, and who was accepted provisionally and directed or ordered to a camp, post, station, or other place, for final acceptance into such service, shall be considered to be in active service during the period while such person was complying with such order or direction, and during such compliance, and until his final acceptance or rejection for enlistment or enrollment into the military or naval forces, and shall be entitled to the compensation and insurance benefits of this act."

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. Will the gentleman reserve it until I can explain this matter?

Mr. ROGERS. I will reserve it.

Mr. SIMS. I understand the gentleman from New York makes the point of order.

Mr. SIEGEL. I will reserve it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York has offered an amendment to section 8, which has just beeen read, and as the Chair understands the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee it is a new section, and therefore the amendment of the gentleman from New York has precedence and will now be reported.

Mr. SIEGEL. This is intended to be offered in connection with section 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. SIEGEL: Page 7, line 3, after the word "hospitals" strike out the balance of the section.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know of any right, constitutionally or otherwise, which we have to say that a veteran who becomes a patient in one of these hospitals should be subject to the forfeiture of three-fourths of the monthly installment for three months because he may commit some breach of discipline in or outside the hospital. I think we have had entirely too much experience, and a sad one at that, in the way some of the soldier boys were treated in the hospitals of this country and how they were court-martialed for the slightest offenses. I do not believe for a single moment that this House is in favor of giving any such authority to any one man to deduct three-fourths of the monthly installment for three months for any breach of decorum that a man might commit while receiving treatment in the hospitals. I think it is giving entirely too much power and too much authority to any one man who might happen to be superintendent of a hospital or to some young lieutenant in charge. I turned over a letter the other day to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SWEET] showing how some of the boys had been treated in some of the hospitals only lately, and told of an instance how one of the boys had been kicked by one of the doctors in that place and how an investigation was to take place, and how they scattered the men who were patients in that hospital and shipped them to two or three hospitals previous to the arrival of the inspectors there. If those men were in charge of one of these hospitals and had the opportunity, they would immediately deduct three-fourths of the month's pay for three months. I think that that part of the section should go out. I think it is sufficient if a man should misbehave in the hospital that he is required to leave the hospital.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIEGEL. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the language in the gentleman's amendment prohibit the hospital authorities from using discipline in the hospitals sufficient to keep order?

Mr. SIEGEL. It will not interfere with it in the slightest degree.

Mr. McKEOWN. It would not affect order or discipline?

Mr. SIEGEL. It would not affect order or discipline in a hospital, because they will have supreme authority at all times to direct a man to leave it if he was not acting properly as a patient.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to support the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York. It seems to me that the first part of section 8, which reads: "That the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary in order to promote good conduct," and so forth, is proper and is sufficient, but the language which the gentleman from New York very properly opposes I think goes much further than that, and goes into something which I do not believe this bill has a right to say, since it provides a system of penalties ranging as high as the taking away of three-fourths of the monthly installment per month for three months for a breach committed while receiving treatment in such hospital. It again refers to the rules and regulations, and of course the rules and regulations would govern, but penalties in their proper instance belong to criminal statutes, and to say that a man who is in a hospital may, due to a misunderstanding by some hospital attendant, be penalized by having three-fourths of his pay held out on him for three months, is going entirely too far, and we are leaving a just provision, that is, providing for the proper consideration of the work of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and we are taking up something which has to do properly with the element of court-martial.

It may be all right in a military sense, but here is an instance where a man is ill in a hospital and receiving treatment, and it seems to me, and I submit it to the members of the committee in charge of the bill, that if he has treatment under the rules and regulations prescribed by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, we should not subscribe to the idea of penalizing a man because some subordinate might want him to lose that to which he is entitled.

Mr. SWEET. I am in accord with a great deal of what the gentleman says. I do not believe we should vest too much power in anyone who has charge of hospitals in the treatment of our disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines. But various reports have come to the committee in regard to the discipline at the hospitals where ex-service men are receiving treatment. In many instances they have left the institution without the knowledge or permission of the authorities.

There are no rules to restrain them from going away. In fact, they are there upon the same basis as any individual that enters a private hospital. Something must be done in order that they may receive proper care and treatment. For instance, boys have left some of the hospitals in the city and gone to New York, become intoxicated, and remained away a day or two. Perhaps they were suffering from tuberculosis or some other disease, and consequently they did that which was thought to be detrimental to their best interests. So something must be done in order that we may have proper discipline at the hospitals.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SWEET. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Is not the question of proper discipline properly cared for in the first paragraph of section 8, where you provide that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance may make such rules and regulations as may be deemed necessary to promote good conduct on the part of persons receiving care and treatment at these hospitals?

Mr. SWEET. Now, then, does the gentleman think that that language gives, for instance, the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance authority to penalize any of the young men in an institution if they do not comply with the discipline at that institution?

Mr. GARD. Yes; it would give him the right to penalize according to the rules and regulations.

Mr. SWEET. That would then leave the matter entirely in his discretion.

Mr. GARD. The matter has to meet the approval of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance——

Mr. SWEET. Is it not better to say in this portion of the bill what that punishment should be?

Mr. GARD. If you intend to inflict the punishment you must make it exact. You can not say it should be "about this" and "about that." It should be positive in the mind of somebody.

Mr. SWEET. According to your statement, you leave it wholly to the discretion of the director of the bureau?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I would leave it under proper rules and regulations. In other words, when you make a penalty you should make it definite, since it is associated with some criminal charge. And I do not believe anything will be gained by adding this to the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the gentleman from Ohio take the position that under the first sentence in section 8 the Bureau of War Risk Insurance would have the right to make rules and regulations penalizing these men by reducing their compensation?

Mr. GARD. No; I do not.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought that was the intimation left by your remark, that the Bureau of War Risk Insurance could not make any regulation that would penalize these men by the reduction of the compensation.

Mr. GARD. I do not think anybody would want to deny them the right to make rules and regulations prescribing proper conduct in the hospitals, but not to penalize the men.

Mr. SIEGEL. I would like to ask the gentleman what constitutional authority there is in Congress to put such a regulation over these men?

Mr. SWEET. A man enters a private hospital, and he pays for it. In this instance, where a man goes into a Government hospital, the Government is paying for his care and keep, and the Government should have something to say about the discipline which is for his betterment and improvement.

Mr. SIEGEL. The Government should not have any more power than the city would have when people enter a city hospital, and all you do in that case is to stop giving him the treatment. You do not penalize him by taking any amount of money away from him that he may receive.

Mr. SWEET. For instance, here is a man troubled with some disease, and he goes away and gets intoxicated, and then comes back and creates a disturbance, and does those things that are absolutely detrimental to the best interests of himself and the other inmates of the institution. There should be some way to make him comply with the rules of the institution. Proper discipline is absolutely essential.

Mr. SIEGEL. The answer to that is that the gentleman is assuming that the law that Congress has passed is not being enforced, and, in the second place, I do not think we have any authority to determine here constitutionally what that man should do outside after he leaves the hospital. All the power that we possess is to provide, or give somebody else the power to provide, regulations as to his actions inside of the hospital, and I will be the last one to have it spread all over this country that these boys are going to be subject to penalties of the same kind that has brought down upon the Army the rebuke of every fair-thinking man on account of the court-martial system.

Mr. SWEET. I do not think this is on a par with the court-martial system.

Mr. SIEGEL. It is the same proposition here. These boys are not prisoners.

Mr. SWEET. I am in sympathy with the gentleman's statement so far as courts-martial are concerned, but in many instances——

Mr. SIEGEL. I am speaking of the experience many of these boys have had in these hospitals, and I do not think this House should go on record in favor of any more penalties.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. SIEGEL].

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 25.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I ask for tellers.

The CHAIRMAN. Tellers are asked for. As many as are in favor of taking this vote by tellers will rise and stand until they are counted. [After counting.] Not a sufficient number have risen.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] reserves a point of order on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SIMS. I wish to explain this amendment. I hope before action is taken by the House the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. ROGERS] will withdraw his point of order. But if he will not do that, I do not believe it is good.

This amendment is to cover cases of volunteers, similar to those covered in the twelfth section of the Sweet bill, which became a law and was approved on December 24, 1919, amending section 401, which makes this provision:

> And any person inducted into the service by a local draft board after the 6th of April, 1917, and before the 11th day of November, 1918, who while in such service and before being accepted and enrolled for active military or naval service becomes or has become permanently disabled, or dies or has died without having applied for insurance, shall be deemed to have applied for and been granted such insurance.

Now, I have a concrete case in my district which is intended to be covered by this amendment. That case and other like cases will be covered by my amendment. A young man of Jackson, Tenn., in my district, went to Memphis to enlist in the Navy, and for some reason or other he was directed by the recruiting officer to Nashville, Tenn. He went to Nashville and enlisted and was examined and accepted and took out insurance, and then he was ordered, either formally or informally—I think it was a real formal order that he received—to return to Jackson until he was called into active service, which it was expected would be in a few days thereafter. He got on a train in charge of the Government at Nashville, Tenn., and when the train got out a few miles from the city there was a head-on collision with an incoming train, and about 50 or 60 people were killed, among them this young man and three or four soldiers from the district of my colleague from Tennessee [Mr. FISHER]. In the case of the young man from my district the insurance was actually applied for and given, and the boy's parents were the beneficiaries, but the legal department of the War Risk Insurance Bureau held that he was not in active service, and it has refused to pay the insurance ever since. The same applies to the other boys in the district of my colleague.

This amendment is intended to apply to such cases, where the sailor had done all he could and was obeying orders and not violating orders, but in so doing was killed, really in the discharge of his duty, because he was doing exactly what he was told to do by those in authority. It is intended to cover cases of that sort. We have legislated in this act by the Sweet amendment along the same lines, and the bill we are now considering is to amend the war-risk insurance act as amended. This amendment is in line with other portions of the bill we are now considering.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS. The Sweet law goes pretty far in the direction of fixing an early moment when a man becomes a soldier, and consequently under the benefits of the war-risk insurance act; it goes on the theory that the moment of induction into the service is the moment when a man enters the military service of the United States. The notice of induction which the soldier receives says that from and after the day and hour mentioned in the notice of induction he will be a soldier in the military service of the United States.

The Sweet law recognized that the date thus fixed by the War Department constituted the official beginning of the man's service.

Mr. SIMS. You mean the notice by the draft board?

Mr. ROGERS. It is the War Department's circular, although it is actually distributed among the draftees by the draft boards. Now, the question in my mind and the difficulty that I have with the gentleman's amendment is whether in fact these men were in the military or naval service of the United States. If they were, legally, I think they ought to come within the amendment of the Sweet Act. If they were not, I do not see how this country could treat them as soldiers or sailors.

Mr. SIMS. How could he be any more in it than he was unless he was actually called into active service?

Mr. ROGERS. That is a question of fact combined with a question of law. Has the gentleman any authority to show that in the opinion of the War Department or of the Navy Department these men were in fact in the military or naval service of the United States when they were injured?

Mr. SIMS. The legal authorities of the War Risk Insurance Bureau have held that he was not in active service. That is the distinction they drew.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not care what the War Risk Insurance Bureau has done about it at all. What I want to know is what the fact is, and whether or not in the view of the War Department or the Navy Department, as the case may be, they were at that moment in the military or naval service?

Mr. SIMS. I have not had the advice of the War Department or the Navy Department; it was entirely unnecessary, as his status had been recognized by the proper authority of the War Department.

Mr. ROGERS. I think there is the crux of the question, because if they were not soldiers and sailors they ought not to be brought under a soldiers' and sailors' benefit bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Would not that depend on whether they were sworn into the service after they are inducted?

Mr. SIMS. These men were enlisted.

Mr. ROGERS. Were they sworn?

Mr. SIMS. That is my information.

Mr. ROGERS. The gentleman's amendment does not suggest that they were sworn.

Mr. SIMS. They took out insurance, and it was issued to them by the proper representatives of the War Department, and of course the same authority would not have issued the insurance if they had not been of opinion that they were entitled to it. They were in the service, but had not been actually called into active duty, but were notified that they would be called in a few days; and before they got home this terrible misfortune took place, and these parents lost their sons, and now are not entitled, so it is held, to any insurance whatever.

We pass the law and we impose the taxes on the people to carry out the provisions of the law. We are as capable of judging whether or not they ought to have this insurance as anyone in the War Department or the Navy Department. We made the law and we can make it apply to cases like this, than which there is none more appealing to our sense of justice and humanity.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the gentleman to the language of his own amendment, which provides that in the event that these men applied for enlistment or enrollment and were accepted provisionally, then they shall come within the benefits of the amendment. I recognize the extremely sympathetic character of the gentleman's amendment. I do not want to make a point of order, and I do not want to oppose the amendment if the point of order is overruled; but it does seem to me that this is an exceedingly important question of principle here whether we shall bring within the benefits of the war-risk insurance act a man who was not at any time a soldier or a sailor in the service of the United States. The gentleman has not been able to indicate any fact which leads me to believe that there was in fact a complete acceptance into the service. If there was, I have no objection to the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. There was a complete acceptance in everything except being called into the active service, as the department designates it.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. FIELDS. Were these boys traveling to or from camp upon a call when this injury was sustained?

Mr. SIMS. As I said, they first went to Memphis to the naval recruiting station there, and were sent from there to the naval recruiting office at Nashville. They went there and enlisted in the Navy, were accepted, the insurance issued, and were then ordered to return to their homes until called into active service.

Mr. FIELDS. Were they injured as they were returning home?

Mr. SIMS. They were killed in a collision between two trains, both of which were operated by the Government.

Mr. FIELDS. Of course they ought to have it. The War Department has held that men were in the service under the draft from the time they entrained for a camp.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the gentleman's amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes a point of order. Does the gentleman from Tennessee desire to be heard on the point of order?

Mr. SIMS. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. ROGERS. I was not able to get any information which led me to believe that I could properly withdraw the point of order, and I have just made the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. I do not think the point of order is well taken, because we are amending the war-risk insurance act. The act is amended in this bill in several respects. Every provision and section in it is really amending the war-risk act by changing or adding to it, and the part of this bill that we are now considering covers such matters as are covered in section 401 of the act; and section 401 of the act makes provisions covering drafted men. We made that law. We did not ask the War and Navy Departments about that, but we declared that these drafted men should receive this benefit before they had ever entered actively into the service. This whole war-risk act is subject to amendment in this bill, because we are amending by this bill the act as a whole; and I am asking to amend that portion of the Sweet amendment of 1919, which deals directly with the drafted men who were not in the active service, as the department had held.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. RAYBURN. These men were certainly as much in the service of the United States as were men who had been accepted by a draft board and ordered to camp.

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely.

Mr. RAYBURN. And they are covered by this bill already.

Mr. SIMS. They were going where they were ordered to go.

Mr. WELLING. And they ought to have equally favorable treatment.

Mr. FIELDS. Suppose these men had not been killed, but had gone home and had not returned to the service when called, what would their status have been?

Mr. SIMS. They would have been deserters.

Mr. FIELDS. Certainly. Then certainly they could not be deserters unless they were in the service.

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely. They could not be deserters unless they were in the service.

Mr. HICKS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. HICKS. I will ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether these men had been actually sworn into the service or not?

Mr. SIMS. I do not know, from personal knowledge, as I was not there, but the department issued insurance to them, which was a recognition that they were legally entitled to it.

Mr. HICKS. Is not the test whether these men had been sworn into the service?

Mr. SIMS. If the gentleman is going to raise the question of fact as to whether I know of my personal knowledge these men were sworn in or not sworn in, of course I do not know. I know the War Risk Bureau made no question except that they had not been called into active service. They were in every other respect except being called into active service entitled to the insurance benefits.

Mr. VESTAL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIMS. Yes.

Mr. VESTAL. As I understand the situation, this amendment proposes to put the men who voluntarily enlisted and attempted to get into the service on the same footing as the men who were drafted.

Mr. SIMS. Absolutely.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen are not discussing the point of order made against the amendment.

Mr. SIMS. I thought I discussed it.

Mr. FIELDS. I suggest that the gentleman from Massachusetts state his point of order.

Mr. ROGERS. That it is not germane to the section nor the bill.

Mr. FIELDS. I would like to discuss the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CANNON. If these men come within the law, have they not a remedy?

Mr. SIMS. I do not think they have.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would suggest that the proposition upon which the gentleman from Massachusetts is trying to get information from the gentleman from Tennessee ought not to rule in this case, for the simple reason that the proposition whether or not they were actually in the service could not control.

The CHAIRMAN. That has nothing to do with the point of order. The gentleman has stated that he made the point of order because the information which he got does not satisfy him as to the merits of the amendment, and that has nothing to do with the point of order. If anyone desires to discuss the point of order, the Chair will be glad to hear him.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, that is what I am trying to do, because I know something about the war-risk act and the men it was supposed to cover. The amendment was made in 1918 to the war-risk act upon a bill that was pending before the House to cover in, with those placed in active service, men who were not enrolled and had never taken the oath. Those were the men asked by the draft board to report to the camps. Now, here is the situation where the men have taken the oath and taken out insurance and allowed to make the application. Surely, the Chair would not hold that Congress could not amend this act and take them in.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The point of order being made that this amendment is not germane to the bill, does the gentleman think that has anything to do with the question?

Mr. RAYBURN. This is an amendment to the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; this is a bill carrying sections that do amend the war-risk act.

Mr. RAYBURN. Every section amends the war-risk act.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. A number of sections do, but not all of them. It is not a question of what is now in the war-risk act; the question is whether this proposition is germane to the provisions of this bill.

Mr. RAYBURN. I say it is, for the reason that this bill does not cover only one subject; it makes various provisions and it adds new matter to the law already existing.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would like to ask the gentleman from Texas if the amendment must not go further and be germane to the war-risk act?

Mr. SIMS. It is undoubtedly germane to that. It is absolutely germane to it. It applies the same provisions to those who volunteered as to those who were drafted.

Mr. SANDERS of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that although this bill deals with other matters than the war-risk act, since it deals with two different sections of the war-risk insurance act, the entire subject matter of that act may be invoked in considering the point of order. If, therefore, Mr. Chairman, the proposed amendment is germane to any section of the bill of the war-risk act, it is germane to this bill. I call the Chair's attention to section 31 of the war-risk insurance act, which provides that if after investigation by the local draft board, and being accepted and enrolled for active service, a person drafted into the service died or became disabled as the result of disease contracted, or injury suffered in line of duty, and so forth—giving to those enumerated persons the benefit of the insurance act. Now it is proposed to amend the act to give the same right to enlisted men who had not been accepted in the service. Every amendment that is offered to a bill differs in some respects from the provisions already contained in the bill. This one differs in this respect, that this deals with soldiers who were enlisted and had taken an affirmative act toward becoming a soldier but had not been fully accepted in the service, while the provisions already in the insurance act deal with drafted men who have taken affirmative steps to become soldiers and who had not been accepted into the service. It seems to me clearly that these two matters are sufficiently similar for the one now offered to be germane to the bill containing the other.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Chairman, following the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS], let us take a concrete case of two men, one drafted and one going to volunteer. Under the ruling of the War Department, if I remember correctly, the draftee entered the military service when he entrained for camp. The two go together to camp. The draftee is accepted into the service, but not put into active service, and probably sent back to his home for a few days, as was the case in a number of instances. There is no question that he is in the military service. The enlisted man goes with him to camp, is sworn in, as in the case cited by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS], and is directed to return to his home and await his call to report, and on his return home is killed in a wreck. There is so much similarity in the two cases that there can not be any question as to the germaneness of the amendment.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. RAKER. The law now provides for those brought in by draft, and the proposition here is to amend it so that the man who volunteered may stand on the same basis relative to his insurance.

Mr. FIELDS. That is the purpose of the amendment, and we ought to adopt it. The purpose of the law is to insure men in the military service. There should be no discrimination against the man who volunteered along with a man who was drafted.

Mr. FISHER. Mr. Chairman, I have just a word I would like to say on the proposition as to whether or not these persons, as suggested by my colleague from Tennessee, were actually in the naval service. Whenever a person was drafted, accepted, or enrolled in the military or naval forces of the United States he should have the benefits of the war-risk insurance act. The amendment offered applies only to the persons who volunteered for enlistment or enrollment in the military or naval forces between the dates of April 6, 1917, and November 11, 1918. The question as to when a person is actually in the military service came up in my office through an appeal from a discharged soldier from my district who had tuberculosis and had made his way to El Paso, Tex. He had been drafted, and had been taken to camp, where he was held for several weeks before a final medical examination was made of him. During the period of his detention he contracted tuberculosis in line of duty and was discharged from the draft and not from the service. It was construed that he was not entitled to the benefits of the war-risk insurance act because he had not been in the actual service. He had been admitted to a hospital through Red Cross activities, but he was notified that his discharge from the draft and not from the service would preclude him from anything other than temporary treatment.

Arrangements were made so he could stay in the hospital until the matter could be straightened out. It seemed to me absolutely absurd that this discharged soldier should be placed in this position, where a technical discussion as to his discharge should cause him to be put out of the hospital. The Adjutant General of the Army, when the matter was presented to him, gave as his opinion that a person who had been drafted and taken to camp, and while awaiting final acceptance, was in the service of the Army of the United States. There would have been no trouble about it at all if there had not been a delay of the passage of the Sweet bill in the Senate, which meant so much to the discharged and disabled soldiers, for it removed all doubt as to drafted men having benefits of the war-risk insurance act after having been inducted and before final acceptance. If before the passage of the Sweet bill The Adjutant General held that a discharged soldier who had been inducted by a draft board, but who had not been finally accepted, was in the service of the Army of the United States, then it seems it would necessarily follow that a person who was enrolled in the naval forces and had been accepted and had taken the oath would be in the naval service.

The amendment offered by my colleague would give relief to those persons who volunteered for service but do not now get the same privileges under the law that a drafted person gets.

From my district two boys, upon the solicitation of the Navy Department, went to Nashville, Tenn., and there enlisted in the Navy. They were accepted, enrolled, and were given the oath. While they were going through that procedure, a Government official solicited insurance, and they made out the applications as directed. The officer of the Navy Department told them to return to their homes and to there await active orders. When active orders came, those men, if they had lived two or three days longer, would have had to report for training and for active service, and if they had not reported they would have been deserters. However, as it was, without fault of theirs, they were killed in a railroad wreck. It seems clear to me that such applications for insurance should be made valid, just as now the law provides that applications for insurance made by a drafted person after induction and before acceptance are valid.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the point of order very briefly. I suggest to the Chair that if this bill contained an amendment to only one section of the war-risk insurance act, as it now exists, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] would perhaps not be in order, but the bill does much more than seek to amend one section of the present war-risk insurance act. This bill amends section 212 of the present war-risk act by rewriting it entirely. It also amends section 313 of the war-risk insurance act by rewriting that. Then it also amends section 19 of the act of December 24, 1919, which was itself an amendment to the war-risk insurance act. In addition to amending these three specific sections of the present war-risk insurance act, the bill undertakes general legislation upon the subject, which is in addition to the present law upon the subject. Therefore, I agree with the statement of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. SANDERS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], that this does open up the war-risk act for amendment, and in my opinion makes the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee as a new section in order and germane to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] reads:

That section 401 of the war-risk insurance act is amended as follows:

The Chair presumes the intent is to add to the end of section 401 this additional proviso. The bill under consideration is a bill to improve the facilities and service of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance and further amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act as amended. The first section of the bill provided for the installation of regional offices and suboffices and the various other sections of the bill provide for the mode of administration and method and manner of making payments under the bill. The bill is entirely within that general scope. It is not a bill generally amending the war-risk insurance act. It does not amend it in various particulars, but only amends it in the method or manner of making certain payments; in matters of administration, in other words. It does not deal with a class of beneficiaries or change the advantages that beneficiaries may enjoy, nor does it in any way define or modify who such beneficiaries may be. The Chair therefore thinks that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Tennessee is not within the scope of the bill or any of the provisions of the bill and is therefore not germane, and sustains the point of order.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Massachusetts has just stated that he will not have any objection to the amendment if the names of the beneficiaries are put in. I have the names of the beneficiaries at my office, but I could not name them right now, but I will put in the names of the parents and also of the deceased son and everything else so far as my district is concerned——

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, well, if the gentleman from Massachusetts wants to be generous he can be in some other particular. We have cut the name of everybody out of the bill, and we have believed that our bill should carry general language, and have frowned upon special acts at all times.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the Chair I have the very highest respect for him as a man and as a Member, but this case appeals to me so strongly, and as justice can come in no other way than by overruling the Chair, I will have respectfully to appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the committee?

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that he was in doubt.

The committee again divided; and there were—ayes 45, noes 29.

So the decision of the Chair stood as the judgment of the committee.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill H. R. 13558 to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee having had under consideration the bill H. R. 13558, had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I demand a separate vote on the amendment striking out section 1 of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Is that the Good amendment?

Mr. WALSH. A very good amendment.

Mr. BARKLEY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Before the amendment was adopted striking out section 1, an amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] was adopted which was part of section 1. Now, in the event the amendment is voted down to strike out the section, does not the gentleman desire a separate vote also on the Gard amendment?

Mr. SWEET. I do; but I understand there is some parliamentary impediment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the House has no knowledge at all of any further amendment. However, the Chair will rule on that question when it arises.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the House should refuse to vote for the amendment striking out section 1, then section 1 will be left as it was amended by the Gard amendment, to strike out certain language.

The SPEAKER. Upon first blush the opinion of the Chair would be the other way, but the Chair will rule on that question when it arises.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will it be too late to demand a separate vote, then, if that question arises?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see how the gentleman can demand a separate vote on that.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WINGO. The House is now passing on the action of the committee. As I understand the committee has amended section 1; that is, has stricken it out as amended. Now, the House is passing on the action of the committee.

Now, does the Chair hold that the House has a right to divide on the pending proposition and first determine whether or not it will first perfect that which the amendment struck out?

The SPEAKER. The opinion of the Chair is that that is not before the House at all; that the amendment before the House is the amendment to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. WINGO. The amendment before the House is to strike out, not section 1 of the bill, but section 1 as amended by the committee. The House is certainly not powerless, because the committee was not powerless, and in the committee the custom and philosophy is to vote on perfecting propositions before you vote to kill it.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that this does not involve a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order in order to please my meticulous friend from Cape Cod. My point is that the House has the right to act in the House the same as in the committee. It is not voting on an amendment to strike out section 1, but on the action of the committee to strike out section 1 as amended, and I insist we have a right to vote, first, on approving the change made by the committee in section 1 and then determine whether or not we want to approve the next action of the committee in striking out section 1 as amended. If we approve the action of the committee in changing section 1, then the vote would come on the action of the committee in destroying section 1.

Mr. WALSH. When has the committee reported anything to the House that section 1 would change?

Mr. WINGO. The committee has reported to the House the striking out of section 1.

Mr. WALSH. That does not involve any change of anything else.

Mr. WINGO. The House could not sit here blindly and not take notice of the fact that section 1 voted on was not section 1 that was in the bill as reported, but section 1 as finally acted upon by the committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Suppose in the committee an amendment was proposed and an amendment to the amendment was proposed, does the gentleman think that the amendment to the amendment would be reported to the House?

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman has not caught the point.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes; I know what the point is.

Mr. WINGO. If the House sitting as a committee and in the Committee of the Whole changed the verbiage of the bill by an amendment that was referred to it, and then subsequently voted not upon the section that was referred to the Committee of the Whole by the House, but voted upon an entirely different proposition, then the report to the House brings to the House the action of the committee for approval, and that is a divisible proposition.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I think this point has come up once before and I think the Chair will find a reference to it if he will look at section 4398, and that he will see the gentleman is wrong.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a separate vote on the amendment to section 8.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. FIELDS. Would it not be in order to ask for a separate vote on the Gard amendment in the event that amendment is restored to the bill by the rejection of the Good amendment by the House?

The SPEAKER. It does not seem to the Chair that it gives the House the control it ought to have, but the decision is that if the Committee of the Whole amends a paragraph and subsequently strikes out the paragraph as amended the first amendment falls and is not reported to the House or voted on.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the House votes down the Good amendment, striking out section 1, will that leave section 1 as it was originally in the bill?

The SPEAKER. According to this decision it will. Is a separate vote demanded on any other amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment striking out section 1.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry, for information. Is this what is known as the Good amendment?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed it is. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. SWEET and Mr. BARKLEY demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 62.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of no quorum. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. As many as are in favor of the amendment will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay."

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 150, nays 174, not voting 103, as follows:

The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. A quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will unlock the doors. The gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] asked for a separate vote on an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. SIEGEL: Page 7, line 3, after the word "hospitals" strike out the remainder of the section.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question being taken, the Speaker announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. SIEGEL. A division, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York demands a division. Those in favor of agreeing to the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted.

The affirmative vote was taken.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. It has been said on the floor that gentlemen do not understand what this amendment is. Is it too late to ask that the amendment be again reported?

The SPEAKER. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARD. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be again reported.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made. Those opposed to the amendment will rise and stand until they are counted.

The negative vote was taken.

The SPEAKER. On this question the ayes are 34 and the noes are 88.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, I raise the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York raises the point that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Two hundred and twenty Members are present, a quorum. The noes have it, and the amendment is not agreed to. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. GOOD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOOD. When the bill was pending before the Committee of the Whole, that committee struck out the language in line 5 on page 2—

Regional offices, not exceeding 14 in number, and such—

And inserted—

Not exceeding 48 in number.

And in line 1 of page 2 of the bill the committee struck out "$1,000,000" and inserted "$500,000." Subsequently the Committee of the Whole struck out that section. Now, by the action of the House in placing the section back in the bill, do I understand the ruling to be that the section will stand as it was amended by the Committee of the Whole or as reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce?

The SPEAKER. As it originally stood.

Mr. GOOD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer a motion to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa submits a motion to recommit which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. GOOD moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce with instructions to that committee to report the same back forthwith with the following amendment:

Page 1, line 5, after the word "such," strike out "regional offices, not exceeding 14 in number, and such."

On page 1, line 6, after the word "suboffices," insert "not exceeding 48 in number."

Page 1, line 8, after the word "hereby," insert the words "authorized to be."

Line 1, page 2, strike out the figures "$1,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$500,000."

Mr. GOOD. On that motion I move the previous question.

Mr. SWEET. That simply makes it an authorization and of no benefit whatever.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] to recommit.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. SWEET) there were—ayes 127, noes 96.

Mr. SWEET. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 142, nays 168, answered "present" 1, not voting 116, as follows:

FEDERAL BUILDING AT GASTONIA, N. C.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Senate:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
May 19, 1920.

Resolved, That the Secretary be directed to request the House of Representatives to return to the Senate the bill (S. 4332) entitled "An act to exchange the present Federal building and site at Gastonia, N. C., for a new site and building."

Attest:

(Signed) GEORGE A. SANDERSON, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds is discharged from further consideration of the request, and the request is concurred in.

CREDIT TO DISBURSING CLERK, BUREAU OF WAR RISK INSURANCE.

Mr. ESCH. Mr. Speaker, I call up House joint resolution 324, authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases, and ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from further consideration of Senate joint resolution 189, which is identical with House joint resolution 324, and that the Senate resolution be considered in lieu of the House resolution.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin calls up House joint resolution 324, and asks unanimous consent that Senate joint resolution 189 be considered in lieu thereof and that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce be discharged from further consideration of it. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, what is the purport of the resolution?

Mr. ESCH. It is to authorize the accounting officers of the Treasury Department to make allowances to the disbursing clerk of the War Risk Insurance Bureau for awards paid on insurance, where it might be possible for the War Risk Insurance officers to have credit on premiums. There are many men in France to-day belonging to the Army, and their insurance is deducted from their pay roll.

Mr. GARD. This is an emergency case?

Mr. ESCH. Yes; and unless this be done by June 30, 1920, it will cause a great deal of distress.

Mr. BLANTON. This is a unanimous report from the committee?

Mr. ESCH. Yes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate joint resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Senate joint resolution (S. J. Res. 189) authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases.

Resolved, etc., That for such reasonable time as may be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, but not extending beyond the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the accounting officers of the Treasury are hereby authorized and directed to allow credit in the accounts of the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance for all payments of insurance installments heretofore or hereafter made under the provisions of article 4 of the war risk insurance act in advance of the verification of the deduction on the pay rolls, or of the payment otherwise, of all premiums.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The Senate joint resolution was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. ESCH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

By unanimous consent, House joint resolution 324 was ordered to lie on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. WASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the insurance bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the Army reorganization bill, passed yesterday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ARMY REORGANIZATION—CONSCRIPTION OF WORKERS IN INDUSTRY.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I understand that no letters or petitions will be allowed to be printed in the RECORD without having been read. Therefore I ask unanimous consent to read a letter and a telegram. I am in receipt this morning of a letter from Hon. Samuel Gompers, addressed to me, which is as follows:

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR,
Washington, D. C., May 20, 1920.

Hon. ASLE J. GRONNA,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am forwarding to you for your information a copy of a letter sent by me yesterday to the Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, jr., chairman of the conferees committee on H. R. 12775.

Respectfully, yours,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

The letter addressed to the Senator from New York is as follows:

MAY 19, 1920.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
Chairman conferees committee on H. R. 12775,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The executive council of the American Federation of Labor has given most thoughtful consideration to H. R. 12775 and desires to enter most emphatic protest against those sections which provide for the conscription of workers in industry in periods of "national emergency."

The proposed law containing these sections provides for the conscription of workers in times of peace as well as in times of war. Section 69 of chapter 1 provides that "whenever Congress shall declare and the President shall proclaim that a 'national emergency' exists, all male citizens of the United States, except the National Guard or the organized reserves of the Army of the United States, shall be subject to call for immediate active military service during the period of emergency under such regulations as may be prescribed."

It is our understanding that the United States has just been engaged in a great war to overthrow the concept embodied in that provision.

Section 70 classifies persons liable to service "so as to place in a deferred class those who are needed in occupations of importance in the maintenance of the national interest during the emergency so long as they retain and in good faith continue in such occupations."

Clearly, that is not a measure of national defense calculated to strengthen the country against invasion. Unquestionably it is a measure calculated to compel the workers of America to remain at work in defiance of their own wishes and of their own interests, and is repugnant to the spirit of a republican form of government. It must be evident to all that the enactment of this measure into law would constitute an abrogation of the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution, which declares that there shall be no involuntary servitude except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted. The term "national emergency" can be and would be construed to cover any unusual condition that might exist within the borders of the country. It is undoubtedly in the mind of those who framed the law that a cessation of work would constitute a "national emergency." The effect of the measure would be to destroy the right of the workers to exercise their normal function and to engage in their normal activities.

Upon proclamation of a "national emergency" the workers conscripted under the provisions of this act would be compelled to remain at their employment, or to return to their employment, no matter what conditions might prevail. If they exercise their normal and lawful rights to cease work, they would be at once subject to the penalty provided in section 28, chapter 2, of the bill, which is as follows:

> Any person subject to military law who quits his organization or place of duty with the intent to avoid hazardous duty or to shirk important service shall be deemed a deserter.

The whole trend to-day is toward democracy in industry. It is toward an enlargement of the measure of justice which the working masses are able to secure. It is toward the general improvement of the conditions of life for the masses of our people. The bill now before you for your consideration seeks to destroy the progress that has been achieved. It seeks to make further progress impossible. It seeks to reestablish and maintain by force of military authority the autocratic concept in industry. The working people of the United States will protest to the utmost limit of their power any movement to destroy their right to cease work or cease giving service under conditions which make service impossible. The right to cease work is a right which is as normal and natural as life itself. If this right is destroyed, freedom will vanish.

Even during the Great War, when every energy was capitalized for the sake of victory, no such drastic and undemocratic measure as this was found necessary. In fact, the most valuable and most effective efforts toward the winning of the war were those efforts which came as volunteer offerings of a citizenship bent upon one purpose. Even autocratic Germany, where human life was the plaything of dictatorship, and where human welfare was never anything but a sacrifice to the welfare of the ruling caste, never had such a drastic law.

It is almost beyond comprehension that the Congress of the United States should consider seriously a measure of this character. It is perhaps one of the best indications of the character of this proposed legislation that it has been kept so carefully from public attention. There seems almost to have been a studious effort made to see that the citizenship of our Republic was kept in ignorance of the proposed act. American people are overwhelmingly opposed to reactionary legislation and particularly so to legislation which tends toward the establishment of military autocracy.

The executive council of the American Federation of Labor is confident that it voices the spirit and the will of the masses of our people in opposing with utmost vigor the enactment of this measure into law. This measure is characteristic not of free America, but the old Russia and the old Germany. The old Russia and the old Germany which typified the concept written into this bill have passed from the face of the earth forever. Many of the great free and democratic nations of to-day are turning to face in the direction of a better administration of justice, of a fuller measure of liberty and freedom, of a higher concept of human life in all its phases. Too much has been done by the Congress of the United States and by some of our State legislatures in defiance of the trend of world democracy, and in defiance of the rights and welfare of the working people.

Unless it is the determination of Congress to remove the United States from the category of free nations, and to destroy completely the hopes and aspirations and ambitions of our people, it will make haste to defeat the provisions of the proposed bill herein discussed. The executive council of the American Federation of Labor earnestly hopes that the autocratic and un-American provisions of the bill will be speedily and overwhelmingly defeated.

Respectfully, yours,

SAMUEL GOMPERS,
President American Federation of Labor.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. GRONNA. In just a moment. I wish to read a short telegram and then I will yield. The following telegram is from Grand Forks, N. Dak., and is addressed to me:

GRAND FORKS, N. DAK., May 20, 1920.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.:

Division No. 69, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, protests against provisions of Army organization bill providing for conscription of all men between 18 and 45 for military service and assignment to industrial pursuits whenever in opinion of President and Congress an emergency exists. We urge you to use your efforts to defeat this provision.

O. L. POWELL,
Secretary Division No. 69, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers.

Mr. President, I wish to say merely a word. A day or two ago I had read a brief article printed in the Washington Post giving an account of the action taken by the King of Great Britain wherein he proposed a volunteer army, and proposed to do away with conscription in time of peace.

Mr. President, I make this statement and I challenge contradiction: The provision in the so-called Army reorganization bill as it passed the Senate is in accordance with the rules laid down by Prince Bismarck during the early seventies. That is the time when the military autocracy of Germany was established. Are we to follow the example set by Prince Bismarck?

I for one, Mr. President, voted against the bill for the reason stated in Mr. Gompers's letter, and with the purpose of doing away with the National Guard and making but one army, and providing also that in times of peace troops shall be permitted to be stationed in the States.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not know whether I fully understood the import of the letter from Mr. Gompers read by my colleague. Do I understand that Mr. Gompers takes the position that in time of war the Government of the United States is not entitled to call upon every citizen between certain ages to come to the defense of the country?

Mr. GRONNA. Oh, no, Mr. President; it is in times of peace that Mr. Gompers protests against leaving it to Congress or to anyone in case of a national emergency to enforce conscription; and will my colleague define what a national emergency might mean?

Mr. McCUMBER. I can hardly imagine a national emergency that would be of such a character as to justify calling all the people to arms unless it was a real war. If the national emergency was of such a character as to demand the calling to arms of other than the regular soldiery of the United States—the Regular Army and the National Guard—then certainly I would say that there should be no distinction between class and class as to where the Government would look for its support.

Mr. GRONNA. But let us suppose that the farmers of the United States should experience that farming was not profitable, and that they should cease farming operations. Would not that be a national emergency?

Mr. McCUMBER. No.

Mr. GRONNA. Supposing labor throughout the United States should for good reasons, not unpatriotic reasons, for I would not support labor any more than I would support farmers' organizations or any other organizations in doing anything unpatriotic——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me answer my colleague.

Mr. GRONNA. Let me finish my statement.

Mr. McCUMBER. Not any of them would be an emergency, because the Government would never compel a farmer by force to raise grain nor would it compel by force a worker to work in a certain industry unless it was engaged in a desperate war and it became absolutely necessary that the work be done or the grain be raised; and if ever we reach a condition of that kind then, I am free to say, that for the protection of all the people the Government would have the right to call upon each individual to perform such service as might be necessary.

Mr. GRONNA. The trouble with my colleague is that he is arguing a question which is not before the Senate. I have simply read a letter of Mr. Gompers's which deals with conditions in time of peace, and it is not necessary for my colleague to bring in the question in time of war. That is not being discussed; that is an entirely different issue. We are discussing questions relating to times of peace, and I say that if the labor of the United States should cease to work for good reasons it would be a national emergency.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not think it would be a national emergency such as would require the Government to conscript all of the people of the United States to forced work. I can not imagine any national emergency, except a mighty desperate war, that would justify conscription, and no one believes in conscription in times of peace.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], is not in the Chamber, and I seem to be the only member now present of the subcommittee of that committee which framed and reported the bill to which the letter of Mr. Gompers's just read refers. In view of that fact it is my duty to submit a word in behalf of the committee and subcommittee.

The Army reorganization bill, which has passed the Senate and is now in conference, was prepared by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs after giving exhaustive consideration to every phase of the subject. If any interest concerned in the bill or in any of its details failed to secure a hearing, it was not our fault, but theirs. The hearings extended over a period of some six months. All classes and conditions of men and women were welcomed to the deliberations of the subcommittee, and no request to be heard was denied.

The committee was determined, as far as possible, to avail itself of all essential information, both of a military and civilian character, and to report to the Senate a measure only after the fullest and most complete inquiry into every feature and detail involved in such legislation.

To avoid the contention theretofore presented in opposition to other similar bills that the form and substance of the bill was dictated or influenced by the War Department and the General Staff, the committee discarded the bill prepared by the War Department for its consideration and deemed it wise to avail itself of that military assistance which the General Staff always, and very properly, proffers on such occasions. Not only so, but the committee made its own selections from the official body of the Army, and thereby secured the assistance of gentlemen not wedded to staff considerations but who had all their lives made a study of military problems from their own points of view.

These gentlemen, at the request of the chairman, were assigned to the duty of giving the committee all possible assistance at all times, and it is due to them to say that they acquitted themselves of the task thus imposed upon them with an ability and a completeness that places the committee, at least, under the greatest of obligations to them.

I see that the chairman of the committee is now in his seat, and, therefore, I shall yield the floor to him with little delay. The National Guard features of the bill were considered in conjunction with the very best officials of that organization who had won their spurs on the fields of Flanders, and who spoke not for themselves only but for the great mass of their brother officers. And you have been informed that they have received the approval of the American Legion.

Moreover, the bill introduced for the State National Guard—perhaps that is not its proper appellation—by those representatives of the National Guard interests which are now holding positions in the States under State law was also given the very fullest consideration, and although invited to come before us with the assurance that their expenses would be paid only four or five of its advocates availed themselves of that opportunity.

Since the report of the bill to the calendar the opposition of that segment of the National Guard has materialized in protests and appeals to individuals Members of the House and Senate to sidetrack or defeat it.

Of course, there is and has been widespread and determined opposition to the principle of compulsory training, and that was deferred to by omitting from the bill and discarding entirely those sections which were devoted to that subject and a system of voluntary training substituted. That, too, was obnoxious to the House, and has been discarded in conference. As a result the opposition is very largely concentered upon section 69, although all of the sections relating to the National Guard are as well the subject of controversy.

Section 69, Mr. President, merely provides that in case of national emergency declared by Congress and announced by the President the able-bodied men of the country shall be subject to military service. I am unable to perceive any valid ground of objection to that proposition. If the people of the United States can not trust their Representatives in Congress to act upon measures of such tremendous importance, the sooner Congress is abolished the better. Representatives and Senators are presumably, although it may be a violent presumption in these days, selected and sent to Washington by communities which regard them as competent and capable properly to represent them and discharge the duties which membership imposes upon them, and if constituents are so fearful of the abuse of that power by a body completely under their control, one House being elected as to its entire membership every two years, then I must despair of representative government everywhere, for if the people can not trust, as I have said, their own Representatives in whom they have reposed their own confidence, and sometimes repeatedly, and if it be true that these officials are incapable of representing them or misrepresent them, then I reiterate that representative government is a failure.

But, Mr. President, even that situation has been met. I violate no confidence when I inform the Senate that the words "great national emergency" have by the conference committee been abandoned and the word "war" substituted therefor, so that the measure to be reported, if a final agreement can be reached, for the ultimate consideration of the Senate is one which provides that in case of war declared by Congress and proclaimed by the President the able-bodied citizenry of the country shall respond by draft if necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I am very glad indeed to have the information the Senator has just given. In my opinion, it throws a great deal of light on the subject, and I think it ought to be stated that Mr. Gompers, when his letter was written, of course did not have that information.

Mr. THOMAS. It was so stated by the chairman of the committee here some days ago.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be, but I did not know of it myself.

Mr. THOMAS. The chairman so stated.

Mr. NORRIS. I expected to ask the Senator the question what objection there would be to putting in the word "war" instead of the words "great emergency"?

Mr. THOMAS. None whatever, and that substitution has been agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is what the original words meant.

Mr. THOMAS. We think that is what they meant.

Mr. NORRIS. That may be, although I think there is great opportunity for disagreement as to the meaning of the term; but if the word "war" is used that clears it up, in my mind, to a great extent.

Mr. THOMAS. There is some ground for discussion upon that proposition; but it is incredible that Congress would declare an emergency sufficiently great to require the operation of a draft system that would be short of war. I can not conceive of it, and especially in these days, Mr. President, when congressional action is not due so much to the conviction and individual judgment of the Representatives as it is to the organizations over the country constantly demanding action in their interests and constantly threatening in the event the demand is not obeyed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I remind the Senator that the word "emergency" is the word which was used in practically all of our war-time legislation as descriptive of the war status?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; I am glad the Senator reminded me of that, because it otherwise might have escaped me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That was certainly the intention of the committee and of the Senate when it passed the bill.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. REED. But the word "emergency" was used in connection with the word "present"—that is, "the present emergency"; and "the present emergency" clearly meant "the present war." That is a very different thing from the word "emergency."

Mr. THOMAS. From the words "great emergency." I think the bill uses the term "great emergency."

Mr. REED. No; I beg the Senator's pardon.

Mr. THOMAS. I may be mistaken about that. My recollection was that the bill used the words "great emergency."

Mr. REED. The bill I have before me is, I suppose, the bill as passed.

Mr. THOMAS. That phraseology governs, of course.

Mr. REED. The language here is:

> Whenever Congress shall declare that a national emergency exists.

Mr. THOMAS. I stand corrected.

Mr. President, a great many of the organizations bombarding Members of Congress with letters and telegrams—and the number I receive is constantly augmenting—in opposition to section 69 of the bill are precisely those that have always opposed efficient State National Guard organizations. The affection they now manifest for State troops, to say the least of it, is in inverse proportion to the zeal which has been heretofore displayed against them.

The fact is, there is a large sentiment—I do not say that it is a prevailing one, because I do not think it is—against any military establishment whatever; and if we have one, then the sentiment is to make it as innocuous and as contemptible as possible.

I am no militarist. God knows, I have seen enough of war in my time. My life has extended over three great wars in which the United States has been involved. I saw its seamy side in my youth. I have tried to bear my part of the burden of the last great conflict. One reason I am unable to accept the treaty is my belief that instead of decreasing it greatly extends the probabilities of war in the future. I wish nations could live, consort with each other, and dispose of their various differences without resort to the arbitrament of war. But the experiences we have recently undergone and the disturbing condition of world affairs are such that I believe as a Senator of the United States I would not discharge my duty to my conscience, to my constituency, and to the Nation if I did not do my humble part toward securing a military system so efficient that in the event of sudden and speedy change of conditions, in view of the possibility of our being thrust again into a great world conflict or into a conflict with a single one of the great powers, such a crisis should not find us in the same situation in which the last one found us. I have, therefore, to the best of my ability contributed in my humble way toward the preparation of this bill, which I believe, although by no means perfect, is the best scheme of Army organization ever offered to the consideration of Congress.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wanted to hear all of the Senator's explanation, but I was called out of the Senate Chamber for a moment, and possibly he has covered the point I have in mind. It is this: The Senator, of course, must agree with me that the Government has the right to call upon any and all of its citizens in time of war.

Mr. THOMAS. Unquestionably.

Mr. McCUMBER. And it is not necessary to make that a matter of declaration before the war so far as the right is concerned. Now, the letter which was read by my colleague expressed a fear that this power would be called into effectiveness during some strike or during times of peace. I can not possibly believe for a single moment that any member of the committee ever contemplated that we would need to have conscription to meet the little troubles that we may have in our domestic concerns.

Mr. THOMAS. That is correct.

Mr. McCUMBER. I wanted to ask the Senator, then, that being the case—and, as I construe it, the power of conscription is intended to be used only in cases of emergency, and the emergency must be of the character of such a war that the Regular Army and the reserves in the States could not take care of it—what is the real purpose of declaring as a principle that the right of conscription exists when we know as a matter of fact that it exists?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the term "national emergency" certainly is not susceptible of a wrong construction in so far as the widespread character of the emergency, whatever it may be, is concerned. Of course, if the advocates of the so-called "one big union" succeed, if all of the discontentment and disloyalty and dissatisfaction of the Nation should be organized into an enormous body stretching from ocean to ocean and from Canada to Mexico, under a leadership capable of mobilizing it into a strike, or an insurrection, or any other form of revolt against the Government, I think such action would be national in character and would become a rebellion. In such an emergency there is no doubt, in my judgment, but that Congress would act, the President would make proclamation, and a state of war would exist.

Let me say to the Senator from North Dakota that I do not regard this provision as a mere announcement of a principle. It is designed to make drafts effectual contemporaneously with a declaration of war or of a state of war without further legislation. The Senate will remember that although war was declared on the 6th day of April, 1917, the selective draft bill did not become a law and was not approved until the latter part of May, as I remember.

Of course, enlistments continued, and possibly no time was needlessly lost. Nevertheless, it is a fact that the arm of the Government could not be exerted to its full extent for lack of legislation until some 60 valuable days had transpired; and this provision is designed, if I correctly understand it, to cover a similar emergency, once it exists, and thus save a space of time and a delay which might be not only critical but fatal.

Mr. President, if I caught the language of the letter of Mr. Gompers's, when presented, it complained of a lack of information or of publicity regarding this subject. I do not pretend to give his words, but there seemed to be a complaint, which was the equivalent of a charge or an insinuation, that information or knowledge concerning this vastly important measure had been suppressed, partially at least, and that the public had not had the opportunities for information which it should have possessed.

That, Mr. President, is not the case. The reporters—and they are among the most active and energetic men in America—were at all times acquainted by the chairman of the committee with the progress of this bill. The testimony has been printed, and an enormous quantity of it has been circulated. There are hundreds of volumes not yet distributed which are available not only to Mr. Gompers but to the meanest citizen in the country. The bill was discussed to tatters here upon the floor, and particularly those measures which, since its enactment, seem to have become so obnoxious.

I quite agree that if information regarding any subject of legislation, however contemptible or insignificant in its character, were suppressed, and the public not permitted to inform itself of it, it would not only be a great wrong but one for which the individual Members responsible for that fact should be subject to impeachment. Nothing of the kind has been done, and, what is more, the chairman of this committee is incapable of such conduct. Nothing, however unimportant, appearing in the details of this bill has been concealed, has been suppressed, or has been overlooked. The chairman has answered every question, and I think completely, of every Senator upon this floor regarding every detail of the measure; and with one single exception let me say, as I have said before, that he is more familiar with this legislation, more familiar with military affairs, more competent to pass upon these questions as the representative of the committee, than any man inside or outside the Senate Chamber.

I am sure that my associates will agree that at no time during the consideration of the bill was any movement whatever made, in any manner or degree, to refuse full information or to prevent the public from obtaining what information it wanted.

I said a few moments ago, Mr. President—and I will close with this reflection—that in modern times the Congress does not function upon its own independent judgment, upon the convictions of the Members of the House and Senate as to the proper discharge of their duties, so much as through the influence of organizations of all kinds, capitalistic and industrial, social and economic, continually bombarding both branches with appeals, with demands, with protests, and with threats, all of which are bound to have their influence, and in consequence of which most of the modern legislation of the Congress of the United States is a mosaic and unsatisfactory to anyone, ambiguous, ineffective, and frequently ridiculous.

In this connection let me call the attention of the Senate to a few golden words of wisdom from the pen of David Jayne Hill, one of the most eminent economists of the day, a statesman, a diplomat, and a patriot, which appeared in the North American Review for April last. He said:

> The greatest danger now menacing this Republic is the control of the Government by well-organized, persistent, and vociferous private groups of men and women aiming to acquire the power to influence the action of public officers; yet the whole fabric of justice rests on the responsibility of those intrusted with authority. Having been freely chosen by the ordered procedure legally provided, a public officer in the United States is not properly subject to the orders or the intimidation of any group of citizens, however powerful, and he can not better display his fitness for discharging a public trust than by ignoring or, if necessary, resisting any attempt by any group, for any purpose, to deflect him from the resolute and conscientious performance of his duty as a public officer in matters confided to his action, however numerous and respectable that group may be.

Mr. President, I am reminded that the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] gave notice that he would address the Senate this morning upon a very important measure, which I presume will soon come up for consideration, and I ask his pardon for having detained the Senate so long upon this subject.

PANAMA RAILROAD STEAMSHIP LINE.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I ask leave to have printed in the RECORD a brief statement sent out to the press by the Washington bureau of the Journal of Commerce yesterday, dated May 18, relative to the rates which are charged by the Panama Railroad Steamship Lines in the transportation of freight and passengers to and from Haiti; also a letter to Mr. A. L. Flint, chief of the Panama Canal office, written by Mr. T. H. Rossbottom, assistant to the vice president of the Panama Railroad Steamship Line. In connection with this article and the letter referred to I desire to submit a statement.

The article charges the Panama Railroad Steamship Line with unfair competition and also charges that it refused to enter into an agreement with the Shipping Board and with private steamship companies for the maintenance of the conference tariff rates in the transportation of freight and passengers to and from Haiti.

The letter of Mr. Rossbottom, which I have asked to have printed in the RECORD, discloses what I believe to be the true facts in connection with the matter.

The two private steamship lines with which the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. is in competition are the Royal Dutch Line and the Raporel Line. Mr. Rossbottom states in his letter as follows:

> The Royal Dutch Line (complainant No. 1) is a steamship line owned in Holland, operating vessels of Dutch registry. The Raporel Line (complainant No. 2) was the steamship branch of a firm of commission merchants engaged in Haitian trade. They first operated steamers of foreign registry, and their object in operating steamers was principally to take care of their own shipments. They were later able to induce the Shipping Board to assign Shipping Board steamers to them for operation, and several months ago the shipping community was duly informed that the line had been taken over by the Clyde Line.

With respect to the rates which are maintained by the Panama Railroad Steamship Line Mr. Rossbottom states:

> Our rates to Haitian ports are higher than our rates to the Canal Zone, which is 700 miles beyond. We do not operate 12 steamers to Haiti, as indicated in the article. We operate seven, four of them being the weekly passenger steamers to Cristobal that stop at Port au Prince on their outward and homeward voyages. We did not, as stated in the article, attend any recent conference at the Shipping Board at which the various companies agreed to maintain differentials between ports and adopted a uniform policy in regard to fixing rates, and know nothing of any such conference having taken place. The only meeting that we did attend was one held during the early winter at the office of the Shipping Board in New York, at which the Raporel Line only was represented. They suggested that we increase our rates 25 per cent. We gave our reasons for declining to favorably consider that proposition. The representative of the Shipping Board thanked us for the frank expression of our views, and that is the last we have heard on the subject.

Mr. Rossbottom also points out the fact that there has never been any refusal on the part of the Panama Railroad Steamship Line to comply with any suggestion of the Shipping Board and that there has been no intimation on the part of the Shipping Board that the Panama Railroad Steamship Line should change its policy or reduce its rates.

He further points out the fact that everything Haiti produces must be sold in a declining market and that everything she purchases must, as a rule, be purchased in a rising market. He says:

> If the transportation rates from the United States are increased as the Royal Dutch Line and the Raporel Line desires, it will tend to divert shipments to Haiti from the United States to Canada and Europe, and there is enough diversion of that character going on at the present time because of the unwillingness of the American banking interests to extend the credits which the English banks are freely extending in their efforts to get the trade for Canada and England without our company intensifying that situation by unnecessarily boosting our rates 25 per cent.

Mr. President, I merely desire to say in conclusion that, in my opinion, no policy should be urged or adopted which would drive United States shipping interests out of the Haitian trade, but, on the contrary, a policy ought to be pursued which will enable this Government and its shipping interests to enjoy a fair share of the shipping trade, not only with Haiti but with Central American and South American countries.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I would like to inquire of the Senator about this complaint. I understand complaint has been made by a couple of foreign steamship lines against the Panama Railroad Steamship Co., a Government line; that they have not increased their rates as the complainants desire that they should. Who makes this complaint and where do they propose to try these people for not increasing their rates?

Mr. ROBINSON. The complainants are the Royal Dutch Line, which, of course, is a Holland steamship line, and the Raporel Line, which is said to have been recently taken over by the Clyde Line. These private steamship companies contend that rates which are being charged by the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. are less than the cost of operation to private companies, and that rates should be agreed upon which will virtually prevent competition in this trade. Of course, if such rates should be adopted, the private lines would probably absorb the entire trade by reason of their great activity and by reason of the alliances of the banking interests of certain countries in which these private lines are owned, and that is undoubtedly the motive, in my opinion, lying at the bottom of the complaint.

Mr. NORRIS. To what body or organization or tribunal do they make the complaint?

Mr. ROBINSON. The complaint is made in an article sent out by the Washington bureau of the Journal of Commerce. The declaration is made in the article that the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. attended a conference of the Shipping Board, in which conference the private lines were alleged to have been represented, and they complain further that the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. refused to enter into an agreement which was satisfactory to the private lines mentioned, and that they are in competition with the boats leased by the Shipping Board to the Raporel Line, and perhaps other lines, and in competition with the Dutch Line. But Mr. Rossbottom says that no such conference was attended.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that.

Mr. ROBINSON. He also declares that no suggestion was ever made to the Shipping Board by the Panama Railroad Steamship Co. that it should adjust its rates to suit the convenience of the private lines mentioned, or that it should reduce its rates in any degree, and points out the fact that the rates to and from Haiti are higher than the rates to and from the Panama Canal Zone, which is 700 miles farther than Haitian ports from the United States.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, if the Senator will permit an observation, that the complaint of these privately owned lines against the Government owned and operated line is that the Government-operated line would not enter into a combination with them to increase rates.

Mr. ROBINSON. Undoubtedly that is one of the complaints; and the increase was to be 25 per cent.

There is another statement in the article which I have not mentioned, but which is of considerable importance as reflecting the purpose of the propaganda which is being carried on through this and similar articles.

I have been informed privately by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] that the article and the letter can not be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can read them.

Mr. ROBINSON. I understand that I can read them, but I do not want to do that. I ask unanimous consent to print this article and the letter in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas asks unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the article and letter referred to by him.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall have to object.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection is made.

Mr. ROBINSON. I have stated the substance of the article and the substance of the letter in detail, and I shall not consume the time of the Senate in reading either of them.

ADDRESS BY VICE PRESIDENT MARSHALL.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I have in my possession a copy of the speech delivered by the Vice President at the Indiana State Democratic convention, at Indianapolis, on May 20, 1920. While there are a number of positions taken by the Vice President, and a number of constructions with which I do not agree, and with which many Senators do not agree, it is a very able speech, and having been delivered by the Vice President of the United States and the President of this body, I ask unanimous consent that it be printed in the RECORD for preservation.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there was so much confusion in the Chamber that I could not hear what the Senator from Nevada said.

Mr. PITTMAN. I have presented the speech by the Vice President of the United States, delivered yesterday, and asked that it be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? There being no objection, it is so ordered.

The Vice President's address is as follows:

"When last you did me the honor of paying respectful attention to what I deemed it advisable to say to the Democrats of Indiana we were in the midst of a death grapple with the mightiest military organization since time began. Our victory seemingly has been won, but it is for the sober second thought of the American people to determine whether the victory was real or apparent, for the war stripped the world to the skin and permitted us to see all the loveliness of sacrifice and all the loathsomeness of selfishness.

"In the perspective we see marching by a shadowy army of military autocracy, which vainly proclaimed to the world that might made right; and now we see again marching for an onslaught upon our common humanity guerrilla bands, each one of which imagines, if it does not believe, that humanity as constituted to-day is the lineal descendant of Ishmael.

"The world is to be rebuilt and America is to be rehabilitated. Blood lust, passion, envy, greed have disenthroned the reason of many good men, and, the world around, the babel of language by which men hoped to reach heaven has been transmuted into a babel of conduct with a like purpose. Everyone knows what the other fellow should be compelled to do. Few admit any personal responsibility for good government.

"This Republic was a part of the Great War from its very beginning. Since time began no ruler of a great people ever had presented to him such Herculean tasks as the President of the United States confronted in August, 1914, and from that date forward continuously until the signing of the treaty of peace at Versailles; first, how to maintain the traditional neutral attitude of the American people consistent with their rights; then, how to keep our mixed population so at peace as to wage with the full force of the Republic our part in the war for civilization; and, finally, how to preserve the integrity of the American Government and yet deal justly by the world.

"I stand amazed at the wisdom, patience, and fortitude which met, grappled with, and overcame these difficulties. I have no apology to offer for the things which were done in the hour of war. In such an hour not only laws but principles must be temporarily laid aside in the cause of victory and self-preservation.

"Indeed, I need not mention the record made by the Democratic administration, for, aside from the controversy about the treaty of peace and the League of Nations, a Republican legislative administration has for 12 months laid its hand upon nothing and has thought of nothing save a proposal to prevent during an unprecedented scarcity of manufactured products the dumping of foreign-made goods on our markets as an oblation to the great god, Protection, that he will not permit the lowering of prices lest 300 per cent stock dividends may no longer be declared and thus the workingman be put upon an equality with the pauper labor of Europe.

"The aftermath of the war in legislative halls would be heartbreaking if it were not humorous. In trumpet tones two years ago Republicans proclaimed that the party of expediency was necessary to the rebuilding of America. Now, I must concede that their party has done something that was never heretofore done in all the history of government. It has put in 12 months of searching investigations of the most minute character and at great expense to show that the victory which we won was really a defeat. No one is going to pay any attention to these investigations. They are a part of the legislative process of American life. We investigate everything from the strike of vast bodies of workingmen to the suspension by a school board of a teacher. We subpœna witnesses, hire stenographers, work the Government printing press overtime getting out the testimony, make a report that no one reads, and then forget it.

"It is sufficient to say that there was extravagance in the conduct of the war; I admit it. But governments act like individuals and should be judged in the same way. No man calls for bids on the price of an operation when his wife's life is in danger. He hires a surgeon and pays him what he has to. Governments do the same thing; and I am willing to trust the good sense of the American people to approve of what was done to the end that the war might be brought to a speedy and successful conclusion.

"But all this has nothing to do with the case. The Republican Party has not rehabilitated America. The question now is, To what party will the people commit the work of reconstruction? And, as kindred to that question, What will the Democratic Party say are the lines along which it proposes to accomplish that work?

"There are many men, enthusiastic souls, who say there is no doubt this work will be entrusted to the Democratic Party, and with confidence review its record.

"Consider the Federal reserve act, they argue, without which the war could not have been financed and by which panics are preventable.

"Consider the farm-loan act, which has enabled the farmers to procure loans at 5 per cent on mortgages extending in time up to 35 years.

"Observe how the Democratic Party supplemented the thou-shalt-nots of the antitrust law with the thou-shalts of the income-tax law. Deploring the slow process of the former in curbing the greed of business combinations, it imposed a greater income tax, a surtax, and an excess-profits tax. The workings of the laws have been tested by actual experience, yet in a year's time the Republican Party has found no way to take unnecessary burdens from the shoulders of those who are ill able to bear them and put them on the swollen profits of those who can well afford to bear them.

"Consider how the Democratic Party has prepared all the physical necessities of a vast merchant marine to extend the commerce of the American people.

"Observe its tender solicitude for those who risked their lives in the Army by the enactment of the war-risk insurance.

"Remember the vocational training and the rehabilitation of the men who met with misfortune in the World War.

"Of course, say these enthusiastic men, the American people will not forget these great legislative achievements and will without doubt gratefully return the party to power.

"Be not deceived. Tom Reed was right when he defined gratitude as the lively expectation of favors to come. Too many beneficiaries of the eight-hour law failed to vote the Democratic ticket in 1918 and boasted that no party ever would dare to take it away from them. You can not delude me into the belief that the average man pays any attention to the apple which he has eaten.

"Gentlemen who play politics for a living or as a sport imagine they can present by political platforms moot questions and demand that the American people render judgment upon those and none other. They are mistaken. The issues of a campaign are the things the people are thinking about or what you can get them to think about. No thoughtful man who has conversed with people in different callings of life has ever heard so many questions discussed as are being discussed at the present time. These questions could not be discussed in a brief address. They need not be. One man is opposed to Government ownership of railroads, but insists that the Government should finance them. Another wants the Government to own the roads, but would let the employees run them as they see fit. Some manufacturers justify 300 per cent stock dividends, which, by the decision of the Supreme Court, are not taxable, on the ground of the high cost of labor. Some laboring men justify slowing down on their jobs because their wages are not sufficient to meet living demands. Others hold that the Government should fix the wage and hour and conditions of labor, but that the individual laborer must not be compelled to acquiesce, and, if he does, may treat his employer and the public as though they were his enemies.

"Who now is delivering to the American people the trumpet blast, demanding equal justice for the employer and the laboring man and punishment for the profiteers and stamping the laborer who, obtaining justice, defrauds his employer and the public by failing to do an honest day's work? I can not stop to enumerate these so-called grievances, these so-called rights, to discuss further this almost universal belief that a legislative enactment is an Aladdin's carpet. The party which takes up all these questions, one by one, and proposes a legislative solution of them in an altruistic platform will not succeed.

"If our party is to succeed, it must lay down broad general principles and respectfully ask each individual whether these principles are not right and whether his own desires ought not to be yielded to them for patriotic purposes. In my opinion, certain general principles, honestly considered, will bring to the American people what out of turmoil they are now blindly seeking—peace. I am myself a lifelong lover of peace. So far as I know I entertain no enmity or ill will against a soul on earth. I hope to preach always the gospel of peace, and so I begin at Jerusalem. In the orderly way of such preachment, it is advisable to dispose of my views on our foreign relations.

"What I shall say about the treaty of peace with Germany will be brief, for I have no hope of lighting with my little rush light the Cimmerian darkness which now envelops it. A lifelong advocate of a resort to courts and not to force, I gave my unqualified indorsement to the altruistic views of the President, in the defense of which views he has broken his body.

"My reasons differed from those of many others. I was for the League of Nations because I was impressed with the truth of Goethe's statement that no government is as bad as no government at all. I did not and do not like the forms of government of many of the contracting parties nor the diplomatic views which those forms of government might bring into the League of Nations. But I saw a world in tumult and disorder. I saw as a result of the war the springing up of new democratic governments of weak peoples, helpless as little children. I felt that unless the storms of passion, envy, discontent, ambition, and greed could be calmed by the oil of international discussion and arbitration, the greater fruits of the war would be lost, that the principle of self-determination would be set back for a century. I did not know of the good faith or bad faith of other governments. I had no doubt of our own good faith, and felt assured that the covenant provided a way in which, if we discovered we were losing any of the rights and privileges of American citizens or that our Government was yielding to other Governments any of the duties it owed to its citizenship, we could with honor withdraw from the league.

"No one has deprecated more than I the unfortunate result in the Senate of the United States. It is not mine to get into the inner heart of Senators and determine how much their views have been swayed by personal hatred or by hope of party advantage. The treaty of peace with Germany should be concluded by the President of the United States. It can be concluded, however, only with the advice and consent of the Senate. This was, as I understood it, an American war. The peace should be an American peace. The war could not have been fought successfully as either a Democratic or Republican war. The peace can not bring that real peace which the American people want if it be made either as a Democratic or a Republican peace.

"I still hope that the President and Senate of the United States will reach an accord upon such terms as will enable the treaty to be ratified and a de jure peace to be made with the Government of Germany, but as I grant to no man the right to read me out of the Democratic Party nor to say to me that I can not stand upon its platform, advocate the election of its candidates and vote for them, I myself will not say to any man that his views upon the League of Nations inevitably place him without the Democratic fold.

"To promote peace in America the first thing to be done is to convince the individual that he is the unit of government, and that upon the discharge of his duty in all relations with his fellow men depends the quietude and good order of society, and that he can have the best opportunity for the exercise of his inalienable rights as a man and the discharge of his Heaven-imposed duty by ready acquiescence in the principles upon which the Republic was founded.

"The first of these principles I may state to be that the Government in Washington is a government of delegated powers, and not a guardian whose duty it is to minister to the delinquencies of States and individuals.

"In Washington you may see the beauty of your Capital City marred by innumerable public buildings, made necessary for the conduct of the war. They were erected to house the innumerable boards, commissions, and clerks necessary to its speedy termination. You have been told that they are only temporary structures; that they will be removed and the city restored to its pristine beauty. From the aesthetic standpoint this is hopeful; from the Democratic standpoint it would be more encouraging to the American people if they could be assured that these boards, commissions, and countless officials who have during the war been doing things which even the Kings of England could not have done 200 years ago, shall, now that the war emergency has passed, be razed to the ground and removed as encumbrances from the body politic.

"Human nature excuses but patriotism does not justify the assumption by the General Government, nor the ready acquiescence therein of the state and citizen, of any responsibility which is not inferable from the charter which granted power. And when I say this I am at once confronted with the statement that I am not a progressive. Now, whether I shall confess or deny that charge depends upon what is meant by progress. If being a progressive means that a man traveling along a safe highway and observing that something is wrong with his machine, should conclude that the way to restore the machine is to turn off the paved highway and run upon a country road which leads he knows not whither, rather than get out, adjust the machine, and proceed upon the paved road, then I am not a progressive.

"I believe that the principles upon which the Republic was founded can be applied to every condition of to-day, as they were applied to conditions fifty and a hundred years ago, and that, by the application of these principles, peace, quietude, good order, and prosperity can be maintained and the old Republic revivified.

"I lay down the proposition that from this time forward long and prayerful scrutiny to any addition to the organic law of the land should be given before its adoption. Expediency has added too much already. Public contempt for or lack of interest in the law of the land is the most dangerous menace to free institutions. I was willing to be a Bryan Democrat, content to be a Parker Democrat, glad to be a Wilson Democrat, but I am unwilling to be a Pontius Pilate Democrat.

"Men say we must go forward. To that I do not object. It is to desertion and going over to the enemy that I object. It is not going forward, it is going over the precipice I fear.

"Cool off and tell me, did we go forward when we gave the unlettered colored man the ballot and then spent 50 years in devising plans to deprive him of it?

"Did we go forward when we gave the people the right to nominate and elect their Senators and then broke the bank trying to corrupt the suffrage?

"Did we go forward when we devised the primary and gave to many letters patent on officeholding?

"Did we go forward when we passed the prohibition amendment and then immediately began openly and avowedly to seek ways to evade it?

"I hold that the Democratic doctrine of equal and exact justice to all men and of special privileges to none will meet all the angry and irreconciled views of to-day. The needle points always to the pole. It does not point to the east when the wind is in the east, nor to the west when the wind is in the west. Congress errs when it gives to a howling minority what it wants just to stop the howl. It also errs when a majority adopts for a minority the policy of the stepmother when rearing her husband's large family of children, which was to find out what they do not like and give them plenty of it.

"Equal and exact justice for all men means for minorities as well as for majorities.

"It means also that church and state are not to be reunited in America by subterranean passages. If men are not to have a chance to make a choice between good and evil, they are slaves, however velvety may be the chains of government that bind them. There was more joy in heaven over one sinner that repented than over the ninety and nine who went not astray. And there is no record that even heaven forced any man to repentance. That is where Congress has been trying to beat heaven as a reformatory.

"It is a violation of the principle of equal and exact justice for all men for paid busybodies to feed with vain and idle promises the self-pity of an individual or a class. He who troubles my soul with longings when no angel of healing is nigh robs me of a fair measure of content and naught enriches himself.

"Equal and exact justice for all men demands that the law shall take into consideration the inherent right of the individual to life, to liberty, and to the pursuit of happiness; shall protect the individual in these rights; shall punish him if he interfere with the rights of another; shall separate all citizens into the honest law-abiding and the dishonest lawbreaking; shall let the honest law-abiding alone and shall punish without fear, favor, or affection the dishonest lawbreaking. And to accumulate a mind which believes in these principles, it is time for us to put our flying machines in the hangars of life and realize that while there is less speed there is more safety in walking. Government cure-alls for the divine delinquencies of men are quack medicines which only the bedridden, spineless, and incompetent pessimist will continue to take. Let us brace up. Let us become captains of our own destiny. Let us snap our fingers at the sneering face of adverse fate. Let us go to work. If we can not make a living in 6 hours, let us work 8; if not in 8, let us work 10; if not in 10, let us work 12.

"Let us not delude ourselves into the belief that the currency and credit of this country can double, the population increase, and the production remain at a standstill, and yet that the high cost of living may be reduced and peace, plenty, and prosperity abound in the land. Let us quit talking about the profiteer and begin jailing him. And let the man who works understand that in greater production he benefits himself as well as his fellow man.

"Equal and exact justice to the people of this country was not guaranteed to them under old Republican rule, when it justified special privilege upon the ground of the common good of the American people, for it knew that the legislation was 1 per cent common and 99 per cent preferred. There will not be in the future equal and exact justice if there be but a gamble between cunning and cupidity. Who doubts that in this enlightened age equal and exact justice applied as a principle would give to labor a fair and honest wage, would demand of labor a fair and honest day's work, would induce both labor and capital to see their duty to the ultimate consumer, would punish the profiteer and teach the laborer that he alone can make of himself a commodity?

"Equal and exact justice means legislation for American citizens. They alone have a right to present their grievances. Their laws should be readjusted in the interests of the entire people. Men are not entitled to equal protection of the law because they are bankers or bakers, ministers or mechanics, lawyers or laborers. For their private good and for the advancement of their own interests they have a perfect right to form, for instance, manufacturing associations and federations of labor, but neither has a right to present a grievance to Congress as a class grievance. It has every right to present it as an American grievance if it be one.

"We all condemn in unmeasured terms that foreign-born man who, having heard that America is a political asylum, has come to our shores with an idea that he can do as he pleases and be treated as a lunatic, though he be a criminal. What is to be the honest answer of every liberty-loving American to the proposal of all sorts of American citizens that this Government has been instituted for the purpose of giving him a benefit at the expense of some one else? Opposed as I was to the hyphen of blood, I must be opposed to the hyphen of class or business or interest.

"It is the purpose of government to act as a yoke and not as a spiked collar. It should enable the people to draw their burdens, not their blood. Its legislation should meet with the ready acquiescence and approval of all good citizens who do not deem the Government to be an eleemosynary institution, devised for the distribution of alms. No man can claim to be a democrat who threatens another with ostracism or starvation because the other does not think or act as he directs. He who tells his Government that legislation is inadvisable, that it is unconstitutional, that, if enacted and held constitutional, he will appeal to the people for its repeal, acts in the spirit of an American. But he who tells his Government that he will not obey his country's law and judgment ceases to be a citizen and becomes an outlaw. Upon the other hand, that government is unworthy to endure which will not listen patiently to the grievance of the lowliest citizen in the land.

"You can not gain the loyalty of the citizens of America until they have made up their minds that the laws of this country shall rest with equal justice and equal force on high and low alike. Nor is it equal and exact justice for power to impose upon minorities a course of conduct simply because it has the power. If it be not just and right, it is the act of a tyrant masquerading as a democrat. As a corollary of the proposition that the laws should afford equal and exact justice to all men, it should be stated that the way to obtain these laws is to enforce whatever the law may be without fear, favor, or affection.

"Everyone in Indiana knows that though I neither use nor serve liquors, and ceaselessly hope that all will abstain from their use as a duty they owe to God and their families, I have not been a nation-wide prohibitionist. The prohibition amendment is, however, a part of the Constitution of the United States, until it shall be set aside by an opinion of the Supreme Court or until lawful ways shall lead to its repeal. Delighted as I am to see the mass of mankind now sober, I could not from the ancient Democratic standpoint have made a speech dealing with the relations of a man to his God and his family and insisted that the State should control them. But the Democratic Party will merit the contempt of the people if it ever stands for the flaunting of a law because certain citizens do not believe in it. While the prohibition amendment remains, it must be enforced in accordance with its provisions. If crystallizing public sentiment does not as the days go by get back of it, the people will find a way lawfully to lessen what some deem to be its rigors.

"Freedom of speech and freedom of the press, now that the war is over, should be restored and punishment should be provided for all those who seek to stir up tumult and disorder or the overthrow of our Government by any other than the orderly processes of the ballot box. The Government owes it to its citizenship not only to enforce the law against the lawbreaker but to protect the citizen in the exercise of his constitutional and inalienable rights. It should let the citizen alone as long as he is pursuing an honest calling in an honest way, and by precept and example it should hold the citizen responsible for the discharge of his duty.

"The Democratic Party should demand that the States take back the discharge of the duties which were reserved to them in the compact made with the General Government. To that end it should pledge its Chief Executive to veto any and every bill which contains an appropriation not warranted by the Constitution of the United States and which is not for the benefit of the people rather than for a limited number thereof.

"It should promise the people that it will not submit any amendment to the Constitution of the United States which further relieves the States of their duty to enforce the police power inherent in the States and to protect the lives and fortunes of their citizens. Who does not know that if the States will resume the duty of overseeing their corporations, compel them to live within their charters, to have no more rights in one State than in another, and annul its charter should one corporation marry another, that many of the evils of the trust would disappear?

"When the expenditures of the General Government shall have been reduced to a minimum, the party should take advantage of the practical workings of past revenue bills so as to impose the burdens of taxation upon those who are best able to bear them.

"The almost obliterated lines dividing the three branches of government should be again clearly drawn. Government by discretion should cease. Boards which make rules, try violations thereof, and enforce punishment should go. They are not democratic. They are benevolent despotisms.

"The country should never forget the debt of gratitude which it owes to all those who were killed, wounded, or disabled in the service of the United States and to the persons dependent upon them. But it should look very carefully before it makes heroism a commodity of national life. To all those who are sound of body and mind, who as children of the Republic offered to die if need be in defense of their country's cause, I have only this to say: You can if you will obtain almost anything you ask from the Congress of the United States. It will be afraid to resist you. But looking back upon your glorious record, I beg you to consider whether you want to go down in history as of the tribe of Nathan Hale or of the tribe of Oliver Twist.

"All legislation and executive conduct inevitably flow from the few principles briefly referred to by me. And now, gentlemen, a word in conclusion: I am deeply grateful to the Democrats of Indiana who have stood loyally by me even when many of them did not agree with me. Age has cooled the ardor of youth, but it has not changed the fixed principles upon which my political life has been founded. For myself I ask nothing save your friendship and your charitable judgment, but I can not contemplate the past without the feeling that there stand around me this day the shades of Hendricks, Vorhees, McDonald, and Turpie, bidding me to call upon the Democracy of Indiana not to remove the ancient landmarks, to hold fast to the faith, to be strong, to acquit themselves like men. Success is desirable, but honor is needful.

"It has been my purpose to discuss principles, not men; but I desire to indorse the candidacy of Senator Taggart for election to the Senate of the United States, not because of our personal, friendly relations, but because I found him, when he was in the Senate, to be honest, competent, and patriotic—a high-grade business man with no entangling alliances such as I deem to be particularly needed now in the reconstruction of governmental policies. In my judgment his country needs him."

CAMPAIGN EXPENDITURES.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] yesterday morning presented to the Senate a newspaper article appearing in the Washington Times referring to a report to the effect that a fund of $5,000,000 is to be accumulated for the purpose of promoting the candidacy of the Hon. William G. McAdoo for the office of President of the United States, and he invited my attention to it. I am very glad the Senator gave this publicity to the article.

I was so deeply interested in it that I called the attention of the Committee on Privileges and Elections to the matter this morning in connection with its consideration of the resolution adopted yesterday on motion of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH]. The article to my mind bears intrinsic evidence that it is a fake, but nevertheless it will now undoubtedly have the consideration of that committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Montana that I think there is just about as much truth in that article as there was in the article which the Senator presented to the Senate. I do not think there is any truth in either one of them.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Of course that is a matter of individual opinion. I took it from the RECORD that the newspaper article to which I referred was introduced upon the suggestion of the Senator from Utah as an ordinary publication.

Mr. SMOOT. It was taken from the Washington Times.

LEAGUE OF NATIONS.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, for some time I have had on my desk the report of a subcommittee of the American Bar Association on the League of Nations covenant, appearing in the April number of the American Bar Association Journal. I hesitated to ask that it be printed in the RECORD, although I believe that everyone will concede that it is a valuable contribution to the literature upon that important subject, and one which the public would read, I think, with avidity.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. What is the document which the Senator has?

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It is a report made by a committee of the American Bar Association on the covenant of the League of Nations.

Mr. BORAH. It ought to be understood that that report was never adopted by the American Bar Association.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Oh, certainly; it has never been acted on. The report was submitted and remains for action before the bar association. It was published in the journal of the bar association for the month of April.

Mr. BORAH. I have a letter from the secretary of the bar association, stating emphatically that that must not be deemed as representing the views of the American Bar Association.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. By no means; the Senator is correct, and I have no purpose to represent it as being the work of the bar association. A committee was appointed to make a report upon the covenant, and this is the report of that committee, which still remains before the association for action. I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I shall have to object.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Then I move that the report of the committee referred to, as the same appears in the April number of the Journal of the American Bar Association, be printed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Montana.

Mr. SMOOT. During the morning hour the Senator can not under the rule make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of opinion that the motion is in order after 1 o'clock.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. REED. Under what order of business are we proceeding?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. REED. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is made under the regular order for the presentation of petitions and memorials.

Mr. REED. It is not a communication to the Senate of the United States or the Congress of the United States. It is a communication to the American Bar Association.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. I submit it as a petition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana submits it as a petition.

Mr. REED. But that does not make of it a petition. If A addresses B and the Senator wants to present it, that does not make it a communication of A or B to Congress. We are under the order of presentation of petitions and memorials. That means a petition or memorial addressed to the Congress of the United States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Missouri insists upon a ruling, the present occupant of the chair will have to rule that it is neither a petition nor a memorial.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I desire to say in this connection that never in my experience in the Senate, now extending over a period of more than seven years, has any such restricted construction been given to either the term "petition" or "communication" as used in the rules. These matters are always presented at this time as expressive of the views of individuals or of bodies. For example, there are introduced here at this hour and under this order of business telegrams which are not in the nature of formal petitions.

If the rule is to be given any such interpretation as is contended, it will be next to impossible to get any expression from the people of the United States upon matters of very great importance that are pending before us. In other words, if a citizen of the United States can not be heard upon important matters that are pending before this body except his communication be prepared by a lawyer and put in formal shape, addressed duly to the Congress of the United States or the Senate of the United States and the signature thereto be properly authenticated, the whole value of the right of petition is utterly destroyed.

I can not believe, Mr. President, that any occupant of the chair is going to give such a restricted construction to the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no objection to the Senator offering it as a petition, if that is what he wants to do, and having it referred to the proper committee, but every telegram referred to by the Senator of late has been read into the RECORD, or it has simply been received and referred to the proper committee. That is the rule which has been followed for some time.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is, of course, another matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would like to make a statement in connection with what the Senator from Montana has said.

The present occupant of the chair does not remember that this question has ever been raised. The Chair is well aware of the practice referred to by the Senator from Montana, but if the question is raised, and it has been raised by the Senator from Missouri, the Chair would call the attention of the Senator from Montana to the fifth paragraph of Rule VII, which, as clearly as language can make it, signifies that under this heading a petition or memorial must be addressed to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. And shall be "referred without debate" to the appropriate committee.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, as bearing upon the suggestion made by the Chair, we are constantly receiving telegrams from societies and organizations, which telegrams are addressed to a Senator only, but, of course, it is understood that they are addressed to the Senator as a Member of the Senate, and when they refer to legislation before the body would not the Chair hold that to be equivalent to a petition to the Senate itself?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair probably would, but this communication, as the Chair understands, does not comply with the fifth paragraph of Rule VII.

Mr. McCUMBER. Of course, I do not know the form of the particular communication under discussion.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. That is very simple. I will sign it. Now, what is the objection to it? I offer the following communication and ask that it be printed in the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, there is no intention in the rule that a Member of the body can present a petition or memorial for himself. That is not the meaning of the rule. A Senator has the right always on the floor to say anything he pleases that is parliamentary and to present any bill he desires or any measure for relief. He does not need to present petitions and memorials to the Senate. The rule for the presentation of petitions and memorials is to preserve to the citizen the right to send his petition to this body. You can not make a communication from A B to C D a petition to this body by a Senator merely signing it.

If the rule now contended for by my distinguished friend were to obtain, then I or any other Senator can present to this body as petitions and memorials all the editorials and all the news that may be printed in all the newspapers, and though they are not addressed to the Senate he can make them his own petition and his own memorial by presenting them in that form. It does away with the rule and the purpose of the rule.

I have no special objection to this particular article. I have not heard it. I have only read a synopsis of it in the newspapers.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. It would do the Senator good to read it.

Mr. REED. Perhaps it would. Perhaps it might do the gentleman who wrote it some good to have read one of my speeches. That is just as likely.

Mr. BORAH. And it would have just about as much effect.

Mr. REED. And it would have just about as much effect on one as the other, as is suggested. The truth about the matter is that if this matter is permitted to be introduced then the door is wide open for all the literature on the subject to be presented as a petition or memorial.

John Jones writes an article for a magazine and some Senator says, "I present the article of John Jones"—it is not addressed to Congress at all, but is addressed to the American people—"as a petition to Congress." You can not make a watermelon out of a pumpkin by changing its name; it is the same vegetable. This is not a petition to Congress and was not addressed to Congress. If the Senator from Montana in offering it himself wants to present his own views, he has the opportunity, and he has done so a great many times and to the great information and delight of the Senate.

It seems to me, Mr. President, this debate ought not to be prolonged, though I have taken my share of the time. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has given notice that he intends to address the Senate this morning, but the time has been taken up, not in the introduction of bills but in debate over various matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri make a point of order?

Mr. REED. I make the point of order that this is not a petition or memorial which is addressed to Congress, that it is out of order at this time, and that, in any event, it must be referred to a committee.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I have no objection to its being referred to a committee; that is not the point. I have moved, under the provisions of Rule XV, that the matter be printed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Montana is not in order unless the communication itself is in order under the present order of business. The Senator from Missouri makes the point of order that it is not in order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President, I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. REED. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The absence of a quorum is suggested. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Harding	McKellar	Simmons
Beckham	Harris	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Harrison	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Henderson	New	Smoot
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Norris	Stanley
Capper	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Sterling
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Overman	Townsend
Comer	Kendrick	Page	Trammell
Culberson	Kenyon	Phelan	Underwood
Curtis	Keyes	Pittman	Wadsworth
Dial	King	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.
Edge	Lenroot	Ransdell	Walsh, Mont.
Elkins	Lodge	Reed	Warren
Gay	McCormick	Robinson	Williams
Hale	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to announce that the junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is necessarily detained from the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] are absent on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] on account of illness. I will let this announcement stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-nine Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is not open to debate, the original question not being open to debate.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I should like to make a brief statement, if I may be permitted to do so, and I ask unanimous consent for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona asks unanimous consent to make a brief statement. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and permission is granted.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, when I was chairman of the Joint Committee on Printing I tried, with the cooperation of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], to make every honest effort to prevent printing outside matters in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I regret to notice that for the past six or seven months, it seems to me, of this session of Congress everything that any Senator has pleased to have printed, including newspaper articles and even private letters and private telegrams, has gone into the RECORD, until absolutely we have brought about a shortage of print paper in the United States by trying to print outside matter in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. That has been stopped, however, in the last two months.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I arose to ask the Senator from Utah whether we are to be met, as we were met then, by the Senate voting to print outside matter in the RECORD. At the time to which I refer the Senate did not sustain us in our efforts, and we both quit the fight. If it is the purpose now to prevent the inclusion of extraneous matter in the RECORD, I will stand, as I have invariably stood heretofore, with the Senator from Utah in keeping the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a record of the proceedings of the Senate, so far as this body is concerned, and to keep everything else out of it except those matters which the rules permit to be printed.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me say to the Senator from Arizona that about two months ago I consulted the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], the leader of the majority, and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], the acting leader of the minority of the Senate at that time, and told them of the conditions confronting the Government in relation to paper, advising them at the same time that if the practice which had been pursued for months past, and to which reference has just been made by the Senator from Arizona, was continued, we would not be able to secure paper to publish the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, and even now I do not know how long we shall be able to do so.

It was agreed by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Nebraska that, no matter what request might be made for printing in the RECORD of extraneous articles, an objection should be made, and so, for the last few months, that policy has been followed with the exception, I think, of two cases, and in those two instances I was not in the Chamber when the request was made.

Mr. SIMMONS. The regular order, Mr. President.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Yes.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to restate what I said a while ago that I have offered the article referred to by me only because on yesterday the Senator from Utah, notwithstanding his remarks now made, read into the RECORD a newspaper article of considerable length.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Senators in their own time can still do that, and we can not prevent it.

Mr. WALSH of Montana. He did not ask that it be printed, but read the article.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I suggest that debate is out of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona has been granted unanimous consent to proceed, and the Senator from Arizona is in order.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. I merely wish to say in conclusion that if the purpose is as indicated by the Senator from Utah and the Senate will stand by the committee in its efforts, I shall oppose, as I have heretofore opposed, printing anything in the RECORD except in conformity with the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the Senate? [Putting the question.] The "ayes" have it, and the decision of the Chair stands as the judgment of the Senate.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ROBINSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally with an amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 4326) for the relief of George F. Ramsey (Rept. No. 614);

A bill (S. 4327) for the relief of H. B. Banks (Rept. No. 615); and

A bill (S. 4328) for the relief of Roach, Stansell, Lowrance Bros. & Co. (Rept. No. 616).

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 1313) for the relief of Francis Nicholson, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 618) thereon.

Mr. PHELAN (for Mr. HENDERSON), from the Committee on Claims, to which was referred the bill (S. 4250) for the relief of John B. Elliott, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report (No. 619) thereon.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (S. 4400) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the Masonic Mutual Relief Association of the District of Columbia," approved March 3, 1869, as amended, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. From the Committee on Appropriations I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 13870) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 617) thereon. I give notice that I shall ask at the earliest opportunity to take up the bill and to proceed with its consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

ODONTOLOGIC LATIN-AMERICAN CONGRESS.

Mr. WARREN. Yesterday the Chair laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State submitting a report with reference to an invitation of the Uruguayan Government to the first Odontologic Latin-American Congress at Montevideo September 18–23, 1920, and it was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed. I move that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the message from the President of the United States, and that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The motion was agreed to.

GARDEN CITY (KANS.) WATER USERS' ASSOCIATION.

Mr. McNARY. From the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation of Arid Lands I report back favorably with amendments the bill (S. 3852) for the relief of the Garden City (Kans.) Water Users' Association, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 613) thereon.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill just reported by the Senator from Oregon. It is very short, and has been passed by the Senate twice heretofore.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The amendments were, in line 3, after the word "contracts," to insert "affecting lands in the Garden City project of the Reclamation Service in Finney County, Kans."; in line 6, after the word "water," to strike out "for" and insert "from"; and at the end of the bill to strike out:

SEC. 2. That the Secretary of the Interior shall make to Congress a statement of the expenditure connected with this reclamation project and the amount received from its sale—

So as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, etc., That the contracts affecting lands in the Garden City project of the Reclamation Service in Finney County, Kans., heretofore entered into between the Finney County Water Users' Association of Finney County, Kans., or with individual landowners, and the Secretary of the Interior for the supply and use of water from the irrigation plant of the United States be, and the same are hereby, canceled and relieved; and the liens upon the land in said county created by such contracts are hereby released and discharged.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

By Mr. UNDERWOOD:

A bill (S. 4433) granting certain lands to the State of Alabama for the use of the insane hospital for the colored; to the Committee on Public Lands.

NAVAL TRAINING STATION, GREAT LAKES, ILL.

Mr. McCORMICK submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 371), which was read and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs, by subcommittee or otherwise, is hereby authorized and directed to visit and inspect the Naval Training Station, Great Lakes, Ill., and to investigate and report to the Senate as soon as practicable—

(a) The extent, value, and cost of the improvements made at the Naval Training Station, Great Lakes, Ill., since April 6, 1917.

(b) The description, value, and cost of the lands, buildings, and other property purchased, leased, or otherwise acquired for such additions and improvements, the manner of purchasing, leasing, or otherwise acquiring such lands, buildings, or other property, the method of making compensation therefor, and the use and disposition thereof.

(c) Such additional matters relating to the control, administration, and conduct of such station since April 6, 1917, as the committee may deem advisable.

SEC. 2. Such committee is hereby authorized during the Sixty-sixth Congress to sit during the sessions or recesses of the Congress at Washington or at any other place in the United States; to send for persons, books, and papers; to administer oaths; and to employ a stenographer to report such hearings as may be had in connection with any subject which may be before such committee, such stenographer's service to be rendered at a cost not exceeding $1 per printed page; the expenses in carrying out the provisions of this resolution to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, it was

Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 2156, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, granting an increase of pension to Madison O. Rose, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

On motion of Mr. BECKHAM, it was Ordered, That the papers accompanying the bill S. 1513, Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, granting an increase of pension to Joseph M. Gibbons, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The PRESIDING OFFICER laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, and that the conferees on the part of the Senate be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. RANSDELL conferees on the part of the Senate.

INCOME AND PROFITS TAX RETURNS.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I move that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 146, directing the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish the Senate certain detailed information secured from income and profits tax returns of the taxable year 1918.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair inquire whether this motion was made on a previous day?

Mr. HARRIS. I entered a motion a few days ago to discharge the Committee on Finance from the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia moved on the last legislative day, as I understand, that the Committee on Finance be discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 146. A meeting of the Finance Committee was called for this morning, and it was called at a time when it was not known that a Democratic caucus was to be held this morning. It was therefore impossible to secure a quorum. A meeting will be called, not only on this matter but on several other matters, for to-morrow or Monday, and I am quite sure that a few amendments will have to be made to this joint resolution; and I will say to the Senator from Georgia that there is no necessity for asking that the committee be discharged from the consideration of this joint resolution.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, it has been nearly six months since I introduced this measure in its original form. The Senator from Utah objected several times to unanimous consent for its consideration, and then the Chair ruled that as originally submitted it was not in order and that it would have to be introduced in the form of a joint resolution. The Senator from Utah, if I mistake not, said that he would not oppose this measure as a joint resolution.

The joint resolution has been before the Senate Finance Committee since January. There are certain Senators here who object to its consideration. The resolution simply asks for information for the Senate as to profits taxes and income taxes on corporations for the past three years. It is similar to a resolution that was adopted by the Senate several years ago. I shall not be able to be here next week; important business will call me from the city, and I shall insist upon a vote on this joint resolution to-day.

I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to discharge the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course if the Senate wants to discharge the Finance Committee from the consideration of this joint resolution, well and good; but the Senator knows that the chairman of the committee has been absent, on account of illness, every day since the introduction of this joint resolution, and the committee has not met regularly. As soon as my attention was called to the request made by the Senator I asked the secretary of the committee to call a meeting for this morning. When certain amendments are made to the joint resolution I have no objection whatever to having the committee report it out and having it considered; but I think it is not showing due respect to a committee to try to force the joint resolution out of that committee now after the statement that I have already made.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, Members of the Senate talk about the high cost of living and the profiteers, and denounce them, and say everything possible against them, but Congress has not done anything to prevent profiteering. This is a joint resolution that will simply show to the country what the profiteers are making. If the Senate of the United States wants to go on record as opposing giving that information to the people, it has a perfect right to do so.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not the question now at all. As I say to the Senator, the reason why I objected to his original resolution was that it was a Senate resolution, and it was an attempt to amend the existing law by a Senate resolution. I claimed that that could not be done, and when the point of order was made against it the Vice President sustained the point of order. Then the Senator introduced this joint resolution, and it went to the committee. No one that I know of is objecting if it is going through in the proper way; and there is nothing asked for here, with the exception of giving information for the year 1918, that is not in Public Document No. 259.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. HARRIS. Certainly.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose this is the joint resolution which the Senator introduced on account of the failure of the Senate resolution that he submitted last January. Am I correct?

Mr. HARRIS. It is. The Senate resolution was ruled out of order.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to say that I always thought that the decision of the Chair was wrong when he ruled on the Senate resolution which the Senator introduced at that time. In my judgment it was not a change of law, and the resolution of the Senator was proper, and I thought it ought to have been passed; but the decision was otherwise, and we have abided by it. The Senator has taken the course mapped out to him then, and has introduced a joint resolution. It was debated at that time. Nobody has objected, except in a technical way; and I thought at the time the Senator ought to have appealed from the decision of the Chair, and ought to have taken the judgment of the Senate on it. This course, however, was taken. The Senator has followed the course that was outlined to him then as the proper course. He has introduced this joint resolution. I do not think it is any insult to the committee to take the joint resolution away from the committee.

It has been before the committee since January. The substance of it was discussed at that time on two or three occasions; and I know that if I were a member of the committee or its chairman I would not have any objection whatever to the discharge of the committee. It is true that the chairman is absent. He has been very busy; everybody knows that he has been overworked; but that is not any reason why the Senate should wait in seeking this information.

I do not believe the chairman of the committee would have any objection to having this joint resolution put on the calendar, as the Senator's motion would have the effect of doing, and I hope the Senator will insist on his motion.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I will state that the reason why I did not appeal from the decision of the Chair at that time was the statement of the Senator from Utah that he would have no objection to the passage of this measure if it was in the form of a joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator again that I have not any objection; but, as I stated before, I know there are amendments to it that the Senator himself will agree to, because the wording here on page 2 makes it next to impossible to carry out. I am not going to object to the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this motion is only to put it on the calendar, is it not?

Mr. NORRIS. The effect of the Senator's motion, if carried, would be to put the joint resolution on the calendar. That is its only effect. Then the Senator will have to move to take it up afterwards, and it will be subject to amendment when it comes up if there is anything wrong about it.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of having it appear upon the RECORD that the Finance Committee of this body is not going to consider the joint resolution. The committee is going to consider the joint resolution. We would have reported it out to-day if it had not been for the Democratic caucus; and I am not complaining of that, because I want to say that when I learned of it this morning I did not expect any of the Democratic members to be in attendance upon the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. President, I should like to have the joint resolution amended by adding the year 1919, so that it will cover the years 1918 and 1919.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not in order at this time.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator from Georgia that his motion, as I understand, is simply to discharge the committee and to place the joint resolution on the calendar.

Mr. HARRIS. That is my purpose.

Mr. NORRIS. I would suggest to the Senator, to avoid any debate, that he offer no amendment to it now. When he gets it up from the calendar it will then be subject to amendment.

Mr. HARRIS. Then I withdraw the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, before the question is put I want to say to the Senator from Georgia that it was my intention, if we could get the joint resolution out to-morrow morning, to ask unanimous consent for its consideration. If the Senator from Georgia insists, and the Senate wants to discharge the Finance Committee, it can do so, but it will not hasten the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia to discharge the Committee on Finance from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution 146. Upon that question the Senator from Georgia demands the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, did I understand that a member of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT], stated that he intended to ask the committee to act upon this joint resolution to-day, and would do so to-morrow if this vote should be postponed?

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it. This is simply an effort to make it appear that the Finance Committee is objecting to the consideration of this joint resolution, and it is not so. That is all there is to it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I will state what I had in mind. I think the Senator from Georgia is entitled to consideration of his joint resolution, and I want to vote to give him that opportunity; but if the Committee on Finance has not had its attention called to the matter before, and it had intended to have a meeting to-day, and was prevented from holding one because of the absence of members of the committee, and is to have a meeting to-morrow, I want to ask why the Senator from Georgia could not refrain from pressing this matter until to-morrow, and allow the committee to report on the joint resolution and put on such amendments as may be necessary? It seems to me that that is the orderly procedure, and can not reflect on anybody. I can assure the Senator that I am very much in favor of getting action on the joint resolution, but I would rather have it come up in an orderly way, inasmuch as there is no disposition proven here to delay a report upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Michigan that I had forgotten all about the joint resolution until the notice was given by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I can see no possible reason why the joint resolution should not be passed. It seems to me a perfectly proper one. I understand the Committee on Finance had a meeting this morning for the purpose of reporting it out, and intend to have another meeting to-morrow to report it out. There is no opposition to it. It appears to me to be rather unnecessary to treat the committee in this way. I do not think it would facilitate the passage of the joint resolution particularly. I think it ought to be brought out to-morrow and disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, do I understand that there will be a meeting of the Committee on Finance to-morrow?

Mr. SMOOT. A meeting will be called for to-morrow morning, with a view of considering this very joint resolution; and I will say to the Senator that the meeting which was called for this morning was to consider the joint resolution, but, of course, it was impossible to secure a quorum, as the Senator knows.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I hope that under the circumstances the Senator from Georgia, with the assurance given by the Senator from Utah, who is acting chairman of the committee, will not press his motion at this time. I think it is very clear that the Finance Committee has been a little remiss in not acting upon the joint resolution earlier. The statement was made that a meeting of the committee was called for this morning for the purpose of acting upon it and that a quorum could not be had. It is well known that the Democratic Members of the Senate were in conference this morning and did not attend. As far as I was personally concerned, I did not have notice of the committee meeting, but if I had I would not have attended it this morning. I think, in view of the statement of the Senator from Utah, the Senator from Georgia ought not to insist upon his motion to-day. If the committee does not report to-morrow, then I think the Senator would be entirely justified in insisting upon his motion.

Mr. SMOOT. Absolutely.

Mr. HARRIS. Then, Mr. President, with the understanding that the joint resolution will be considered to-morrow, I will let the matter go over. I want to say that I mentioned it to the acting chairman of the Finance Committee when I called up the resolution. I have tried to get a vote on this resolution a number of times, and the Senator from Utah every time has objected to the consideration of the resolution by unanimous consent. It has been brought up, I know, several times.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. HARRIS. I will let the matter go over until to-morrow.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be passed over. The morning business is closed.

FEDERAL SUPERVISION OF LIVE-STOCK MARKETING.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, for some months I have been very much interested in a measure reported last February by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry for the supervision of the meat-packing industry, and have been in hopes, along with a number of other Senators, that we might have consideration of this legislation before the close of this session.

None of us who have been interested in this bill, known as Calendar No. 386, Senate bill 3944, has had the least intention or disposition to impede the progress of any other necessary legislation, but we have made every effort to facilitate and pass such legislation. Even now I should be disinclined to take any action here which would jeopardize such legislation, but from my viewpoint it is unnecessary to interfere with action on any other measure to take time to consider that which we have proposed.

While I have no authority for such a statement, I feel justified in the assertion that every Democratic Senator in this Chamber would be willing and ready to vote to take up this measure and consider it before adjournment, and I am in hopes that before we do conclude this session we can bring the matter to a vote and determine the action of the Senate upon what I believe to be as important a piece of legislation as has been presented here in many years.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. KENYON in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KENDRICK. I yield.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am very glad to have heard the remarks of the Senator, and I think he can safely state that every Senator on this side of the Chamber would support him in a motion to take up the bill; and if there is any trouble about time, I feel equally as secure in saying that every Senator on this side of the Chamber would support a proposition on his part to fix a day for a vote upon the bill.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for his statement, and I want to say, in addition, that it would be entirely agreeable to me, as one of those who favor this legislation, to agree upon a date on which a vote might be taken very shortly after the measure was brought up for consideration, and, as I have already stated, I see no reason why it should interfere in the least with other necessary legislation.

Mr. President, the measure providing for Federal supervision of the meat-packing industry, to which I address my remarks to-day, has to do with the most important of all the industries in the United States. This is true not only by reason of the nature of the product itself—an elementary factor in the food supply of the Nation—but also by reason of the volume and extent of the business.

It is difficult to convey a correct impression of all that the industry means to the country. It may be pointed out, however, that the United States census report for 1914 places the slaughtering and packing of meat first among the 10 leading industries of the country. The value of the products of the meat-packing houses of the United States in 1914 was placed by the Census Bureau at $1,651,965,424. That was almost, if not quite, twice as large as the value of the output of all the iron and steel works and rolling mills in the country for the same year. It was greater than the combined output of all the flour and grist mills and all the lumber and timber mills. It was almost three times greater than the value of all the cotton goods manufactured in the United States during the same period. Year by year the meat-packing industry has increased in importance until to-day it may be truthfully said that it far outranks all the other commercial industries in America. Indeed, the assertion was made before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in 1919 by Mr. Levy Mayer, of Chicago, chief counsel for Armour & Co., that in his judgment the big packers "do as much business as the railroads in dollars and cents."

While it is true, of course, that most of the trading in live stock is done at 14 principal market centers situated at Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Louis, St. Joseph, Sioux City, St. Paul, Indianapolis, East Buffalo, Milwaukee, Denver, Fort Worth, Oklahoma city, and Wichita, the Bureau of Markets has compiled statistics covering the movement of live animals to 69 American markets. These figures show that during the year 1919 more than 97,000,000 animals went to slaughter in these yards. To state it in another way, there were more animals killed for food last year in our American markets than there were men, women, and children in the country in 1913.

The valuation of these enormous herds is placed by the Bureau of Markets at more than five and a quarter billions of dollars. On a single average market day, Mr. President, the total value of the animals sold in these markets is more than $25,000,000.

It is almost impossible to comprehend the real meaning of figures of this kind, and the magnitude of the industry may be better visualized, perhaps, if attention is called to the size of the largest of these markets, namely, the Chicago Union Stock Yards. This vast plant, largest of all the markets, covers an area of 820 acres. The packing plants alone cover 320 acres, or half a square mile, while the pens, barns, and other buildings utilized for handling the live animals are 500 acres in extent.

During the year 1919 the live stock received at this market was valued at approximately $900,000,000. During the previous year, when the producers of the country were increasing their output in order to supply the Allies, the value rose toward $1,000,000,000. On an average Tuesday last year more than 63,000 animals were received in this yard alone, and the sales on such a day amounted to $4,000,000.

This, Mr. President, briefly, is the record of the largest of the stockyards. When we add to the receipts at Chicago the receipts of the other 13 principal market centers already enumerated we find that of the 97,000,000 animals that were sold last year in 69 markets, 70,000,000, or 72 per cent, were handled in 14 markets.

These figures tell only the story of the animals going to market. Out on the farms and ranges there are vast herds preparing for market. The estimated value of these at the present time, according to the Department of Agriculture, is more than $8,800,000,000; their number—hogs, cattle, and sheep—is placed by the Bureau of Crop Estimates at the stupendous total of almost 200,000,000 head. (Monthly Crop Reporter, March, 1919, p. 31.)

And so, Mr. President, we are dealing with an industry the great magnitude of which few men who have not known it intimately have even imagined. Every year into these markets pours a steady stream of live stock that often assumes the proportions of a torrent. Like a great river, it derives its flow from many apparently insignificant and unimportant sources. From distant and isolated farms come shipments varying in size from a single carload to long trainloads. An unnumbered host of shippers, unorganized and absolutely independent, produce the millions of animals which go to supply the table of the American consumer.

The great bulk of this product is developed west of the Mississippi, while the great bulk of the population which consumes the product lives east of that river.

CONCENTRATION OF CONTROL BY PACKERS.

The fundamental problem of this industry, therefore, has been one of distribution. Because the meat animals had to be transported from the sparsely settled producing areas of the West to the thickly settled consumption centers in the East the live-stock markets and packing houses sprang into existence in the Middle West. Their chief instrument of distribution was, of course, the railroad. Unfortunately, however, the development of the industry took place at a time when the railroads of the country were given over to practices that would not now be tolerated, and economic history reveals the fact that railroad rebates and similar discriminations so common 30 years ago served first to concentrate the control of this industry in the hands of a few men.

The extent to which this centralization has been brought in our day may be judged from the fact that, according to figures supplied us by the Bureau of Markets, the five big packers handled 82.2 per cent of all the cattle slaughtered for interstate commerce in 1916, and all other slaughterers handled only 17.8 per cent. Of all the calves the big packers handled 76.6 per cent, and of all the sheep 86.4 per cent. To group it all into one sentence, we find that during the year 1916 more than 76 per cent of all the live stock handled in interstate commerce was passed through the yards of the big five. This percentage, according to the figures compiled by the Bureau of Animal Industry of the Department of Agriculture, has been steadily increasing from year to year as the big packers widened their control. One by one the big stock markets have passed into their power, until to-day they control not only the 14 principal markets, which handle over 70 per cent of all the live stock that goes to market, but 14 others as well, so that their domination of the industry is all but complete. If it were necessary at this point to indicate how this power was acquired, I could quote at length from the testimony of the big packers themselves before one or another of our congressional committees to show how in many instances this ownership of the stockyards was secured by gift rather than by investment and by intimidation rather than by normal expansion. (See testimony, Louis F. Swift, part 2, Senate hearings on S. 5305, pp. 835-836.)

Not only do the packers dominate the producing markets of the country by controlling the stockyards, but by means of their selling organization and distributing system they control also the consumption market. Mr. L. F. Swift told the Senate committee in 1919 that the big packers own at least 70 per cent of all the refrigerator cars in the country, but J. M. Chaplin, one of the Swift experts, at the same hearing said that he would not dispute the correctness of the Federal Trade Commission report that they own 93 per cent of the cars. By this system the packers not only supply their branch houses, of which there are more than 1,100 scattered throughout the 48 States of the Union, but they reach hundreds of small towns where they have not yet built their local establishments. Armour & Co., by the use of auto trucks, distribute their product even more widely in small, remote communities. Thus it is that to-day by far the greater proportion of all the meat products consumed in the Nation's centers of population are purchased, prepared, and distributed by the same few men who control the stock markets.

THE RECORD OF A GENERATION.

Having thus attempted to show the size, importance, and concentration of this industry, let us now examine its record during the past generation. In the 30 years which have elapsed since the business began to assume its present form there has scarcely been a time when it has not been the subject of popular criticism or official investigation by reason of abuses, suspected or notorious. We are not dealing with a new problem; we are dealing with an old one, and one which hitherto—to our national shame, it must be said—we have been unable to solve, although the facts have been before us for a generation.

As long ago as May 16, 1888, the United States Senate, responding to the rising tide of complaints from the producing sections of the country, adopted a resolution directing the appointment of a special committee to investigate the transportation and sale of meat products with a view of determining, in the words of the resolution:

Whether there exists or has existed any combination of any kind * * * on the part of those engaged in buying and shipping meat products, by reason of which the prices of beef and beef cattle have been so controlled or affected as to diminish the price paid the producer without lessening the cost of meat to the consumer.

In compliance with this resolution a committee was appointed, consisting of Hon. G. G. Vest, of Missouri, chairman; Hon. P. B. Plumb, of Kansas; Hon. Shelby M. Cullom, of Illinois; Hon. C. F. Manderson, of Nebraska; and Hon. Richard Coke, of Texas, all statesmen of ability, who left an indelible impression on the legislation of their time. After an investigation which lasted about two years and involved every circumstance surrounding the business, these men, whose motives and sound judgment no one would question, gave it as their mature conclusion that "an abnormal and ruinous centralization of the cattle market and its domination by a few men and railroad corporations" had been the result of combinations and agreements for the fixing of prices, the division of territory, and the suppression of competition among the predecessors of those whom we to-day call the Big Five.

The following quotations from this report, Mr. President, will be of interest not only as showing how the foundations were laid for the power which the big packers now exercise but also as furnishing a basis for the comparison of the packer disavowals of wrongdoing in 1890 with their disavowals in 1920. I read:

Another fact about which there existed no diversity of opinion was that the methods of selling beef cattle had been entirely revolutionized in the past 10 years. In place of the old system, when shippers and butchers went from one cattle raiser to another, competing in the purchase of cattle, there is now a concentration of the market at a few points—Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Louis, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh—with the controlling market at the first-named city. The cattle producer no longer has a market at his door, but must take or ship his cattle to the market in one of these cities. This revolution in the manner and markets for selling cattle has been caused by the construction of railroads, subsequent combinations between these corporations, and the establishment of stockyards owned by parties controlling the railroads upon whose lines these yards are located, but especially by the fact that a few enterprising men at Chicago, engaged in the packing and dressed-beef business, are able through their enormous capital to centralize and control the beef business at that point. So far has this centralizing process continued that for all practical purposes the market at that city dominates absolutely the price of beef cattle in the whole country. Kansas City, St. Louis, Omaha, Cincinnati, and Pittsburgh are subsidiary to the Chicago market and their prices are regulated and fixed by the great market on the lake.

Whatever difference of opinion was expressed as to the existence of a combination between these firms not to bid against each other in the purchase of cattle, there was no hesitation on the part of witnesses, even when obviously prejudiced in favor of the packers, in stating that the control of the market was absolutely within the grasp of these four houses if they saw proper to exercise it. Indeed, your committee from the first day of their sessions were compelled to notice, and especially in Chicago, the influence of these great operators. Commission men and cattle raisers who were shipping to Kansas City and Chicago were obviously reluctant to testify as to facts or opinions which might prejudice them in future transactions. In one instance a gentleman of high character and unquestioned integrity, Mr. Leverett Leonard, of Saline County, Mo., stated that he had reason to believe that his former appearance as a witness before the committee would cause him to be boycotted in the future as a cattle shipper.

The overwhelming weight of testimony from witnesses of the highest character, and from all parts of the West, is to the effect that cattle owners going with their cattle to the Chicago and Kansas City markets find no competition among buyers, and if they refuse to take the first bid are generally forced to accept a lower one. This testimony comes from representative men, not emotional or prejudiced, but conservative and intelligent observers of whose sincerity there can be no suspicion.

That the same parties, or their agents, combined and confederated in other matters of like character is beyond question.

First. It is admitted that they combined to fix the price of beef to the purchaser and consumer, so as to keep up the cost in their own interest. (P. D. Armour's testimony, p. 481.)

Second. It is admitted that they have an agreement not to interfere with each other in certain markets and localities in the sale of their meat. (S. B. Armour's testimony, p. 264.)

Third. It is proved beyond doubt that they acted together in supplying meat to the Soldiers' Home at Hampton, Va., the National Hospital for the Insane, and other public institutions at Washington, D. C., the bid for the contracts being made by one, and the meats being then supplied by each of the dressed-beef men alternately for stated periods. (Testimony of Dr. W. W. Godding, p. 499; C. B. Purvis, p. 50; G. N. Omohundro, p. 504; W. H. Hoover, p. 502.)

Fourth. They combined in opening shops and underselling the butchers of cattle at Detroit and other places in Michigan and at Pittsburgh, Pa., in order to force them to buy dressed meat. (Testimony of John Duff, p. 154; William Peters, p. 169.)

Fifth. They combined in refusing to sell any meat to butchers at Washington, D. C., because the butchers had bid against them for contracts to supply with meats the Government institutions in the District of Columbia. (Testimony of W. H. Hoover, p. 502; testimony of J. N. Hoover, p. 505; testimony of Santus Auth, p. 508.)

Sixth. They acted together at Chicago in refusing to come before the committee as witnesses, and in preventing their employees and agents from coming, it being an open secret that they met together with their counsel and agreed as to their action.

With this overwhelming proof of a common interest and intent, we submit that it is difficult to believe that with the most apparent motive for such action the same parties, or their subordinates with their knowledge, do not avail themselves of the opportunity presented by the centralization of markets to combine for the purpose of lowering the prices of cattle.

The declaration of Mr. P. D. Armour that he personally had no agreement with other buyers not to bid against each other is not conclusive, for he testifies himself that his agents acted as to business matters without his consent.

The enactment of the Sherman antitrust law following close upon this investigation did not have the effect of destroying the combination which Senator Vest and his associates had so vigorously condemned. It merely had the effect of changing the form of the "trust" and the so-called "Veeder pool" came into existence. From 1893 to 1902, as the packers admitted in the Government suit against the National Packing Co., they maintained a very active and complete, although illegal, agreement for the division of business and territory. Popular agitation and complaint again resulted in Government action, and in 1902 the Department of Justice brought suit against the packers under the Sherman law. The allegations of conspiracy and illegal restraint of trade were fully upheld in spite of all the packer protestations of innocence, and in April, 1905, the United States Supreme Court affirmed the injunction which had been issued against them.

NATIONAL PACKING CO. ORGANIZED.

Barred by this restraining order from pooling their interests as they had in the past and dividing the market by agreement, the packers sought the same end through the organization of a new company, in which all the important meat-packing corporations should be merged. Thus was born the National Packing Co., which dominated the market from 1902 until 1912, when the Government again had to step in with legal proceedings. Instead, however, of seeking another injunction, the Department of Justice on this occasion attempted to apply the criminal provisions of the Sherman law. The jury, as we all recall, failed to convict, but immediately after the verdict, in order to avoid the civil proceedings for another injunction which the Government was about to begin, the National Packing Co. voluntarily dissociated itself into what we now call the Big Five.

This decade from 1902 to 1912 was not without its agitation nor without further official investigation. In March, 1904, Congress passed a resolution in pursuance of which both the Bureau of Corporations of the Department of Commerce and the Department of Justice again gave official attention to the activities of the big packers. The resolution authorizing this investigation, like that of the Senate in 1888, called attention to the "low prices of beef cattle" and "the unusually large margins between the prices of beef cattle and the selling prices of fresh beef."

The "embalmed beef" scandal of the Spanish-American War first gave to the public some intimation of the unsanitary conditions in the packing houses, and culminated in a formal investigation of the stockyards and packing houses by a special commission appointed by President Roosevelt for that purpose. It is not necessary to review here the findings of that commission. It will suffice to quote from the letter of Theodore Roosevelt transmitting the report, under date of June 4, 1906, to the Senate and House of Representatives. I read:

The Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith the report of Mr. James Bronson Reynolds and Commissioner Charles P. Neill, the special committee whom I appointed to investigate into the conditions in the stockyards of Chicago and report thereon to me. This report is of a preliminary nature. I submit it to you now because it shows the urgent need of immediate action by the Congress in the direction of providing a drastic and thoroughgoing inspection by the Federal Government of all stockyards and packing houses and their products, so far as the latter enter into interstate or foreign commerce. The conditions shown by even this short inspection to exist in the Chicago stockyards are revolting. It is imperatively necessary in the interest of health and of decency that they should be radically changed. Under the existing law it is wholly impossible to secure satisfactory results. * * *

Let me repeat that under the present law there is practically no method of stopping these abuses if they should be discovered to exist. Legislation is needed in order to prevent the possibility of all abuses in the future. If no legislation is passed, then the excellent results accomplished by the work of this special committee will endure only so long as the memory of the committee's work is fresh, and a recrudescence of the abuses is absolutely certain.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

How significant, Mr. President, is the last sentence: "If no legislation is passed, then the excellent results accomplished by the work of this special committee will endure only so long as the memory of the committee's work is fresh, and a recrudescence of the abuses is absolutely certain." How familiar those words sound to those of us who have had to do with this proposed legislation during the last few months. They may be repeated to-day with absolute accuracy as applying to the situation that now confronts us. If this legislation which we are now considering is not enacted, then the results already attained by virtue of popular protest against conditions as they have existed will endure only so long as the memory of the Federal Trade Commission's report is still fresh. When that fades from the public mind, the old abuses are certain to be revived, unless here and now we undertake to set up some agency of the Government the duty of which shall be to prevent a return to the old order.

The legislation which President Roosevelt sought in 1906 was secured, and, although the direst predictions of disaster had been uttered, although producers on every hand had been warned that "continued agitation" would utterly destroy the market for American beef and drive the stockmen from the ranges, none of these calamities occurred. On the contrary, the results were most beneficial, for certainty took the place of uncertainty and confidence took the place of distrust. The certificate of the Federal Government that the plants were under inspection and the knowledge that none but wholesome meat would be allowed to pass into commerce brought a sense of security that had an effect quite the reverse of that which had been foretold. Because the country had faith that the stamp of Government approval meant wholesome food this disturbing question was settled for all time. What we require now, Mr. President, is the enforcement of sanitary business methods in the markets, so that all may be certain that they are as wholesome as the Government has made the meat.

But to return to our history of this business: When the National Packing Co. went out of existence, the Big Five stepped into its shoes. The power which they exerted over the industry continued to expand, and on October 7, 1916, the Secretary of Agriculture issued a report from the office of Markets and Rural Organization on "Methods and Costs of Marketing Live Stock and Meats," in which it is stated on page 50:

> On the whole, it is apparent that the large packing interests exercise an increased and increasing degree of control over the industry, and that effective means should be sought whereby this concentration of ownership and control may be made subject to suitable regulation in the interest not only of the producers and the consumers, who are dependent upon them, but also in the interests of the corporations themselves.

FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION REPORT.

And, finally, Mr. President, we have before us the thoroughgoing, searching report of the Federal Trade Commission. Nothing has been left undone by those who have endeavored to arouse opposition to this legislation to discredit and belittle this report. They have tried to persuade us that it is incorrect, prejudiced, and false; that the men who conducted the investigation were not seeking facts but were seeking conviction regardless of facts. It is significant, however, that throughout the hearings by your committee the critics of the commission have time after time admitted the correctness of the facts contained in the report, though disputing the validity of the conclusions. Every person who has read this report has, of course, the right to form his own opinion of the meaning of the facts therein contained, and I have no quarrel whatever with the man who, having read it, is, nevertheless, honestly unconvinced, but for the man who condemns it without reading, I can only say that he must stand convicted of allowing his judgment to be swayed by passion and prejudice rather than by reason. Of all men who pass judgment on this question, those who, in public service, have found themselves obliged to do unpleasant things for duty's sake should be the last to criticize the Federal Trade Commission.

The members of this commission need no defense from me, and I am sure they are willing to be judged by their work. They have, however, the satisfaction of knowing that the men who attack them have attacked every previous Government report in the same language; that the men who deny the conclusions which this commission has reached have denied the conclusion reached by every previous investigation; and that upon every step of the road from 1890 down to the present day the denials of the big packers have been followed either by the issuance of injunctions against them by the courts or by their own admissions—after the statute of limitations had run.

This brief résumé of the investigations of a generation brings us at this hour face to face with the question whether the time has not come when, as the Representatives of a sovereign people, we should take some action to put an end to this discreditable record. From the very moment when the first dressed-meat combination was instituted in Chicago until now there has never been a single year that this industry has not been dishonored by open charges of discrimination or confessed guilt. That we have permitted such a record to be made, Mr. President, is in the most emphatic degree discreditable to us as a people. If there were no other argument it would, I submit, seem scarcely necessary to do more than call attention to this amazing record to prove that Government supervision of some kind is absolutely essential. We have here an industry which affects in a direct and positive manner every man, woman, and child in the United States, an industry which outranks in volume of business and importance all the other industries of the country, the control of which has been concentrated to such a degree and by such methods that it has been in the public pillory for 30 years. Surely even the most skeptical will agree that this record justifies the statement that this question can never be settled until it is settled by legislation.

PACKER EFFICIENCY.

Of course, it is now the contention of the big packers that a new day has dawned in this industry, that the illegal practices of the past have been voluntarily abandoned, and that the packer system, through extraordinary efficiency, is an indispensable benefit to the Nation. Let us, then, examine the basis of this claim.

There comes a time, Mr. President, in the history of every large business, if it continues to grow, when its mere size is an actual handicap and when lost motion begins to destroy the beneficial effects of organization. There is a point beyond which no business can safely expand. This point, I am sure, was reached long ago by the corporations which control the packing industry. Let it be remembered, as I have already pointed out, that the power now exercised by the Big Five was not the result of natural growth. It was not by the unfettered play of the law of supply and demand that the packers placed themselves in a position of handling from 75 to 85 per cent of all the stock slaughtered in interstate commerce. On the contrary, this result was obtained by suspending economic law and defying statute law.

Instead of a large number of markets in various parts of the country competing naturally and normally with one another, only a few markets were allowed to develop, and the flow of live stock from the Western States to feed the consuming public in the Eastern States was forced, as it were, through a narrow funnel for the benefit of those who had constructed the funnel rather than for the benefit of the great public that had to be served.

The Vest report of 1890 recites a typical story of how the combination worked. A small packer at El Paso was forced out of business because the railroads, at the request of Armour, refused to supply cars for the transportation of his product. He had developed a market in the vicinity of Los Angeles and was killing approximately 50 head of cattle a day. These animals he purchased, of course, from the stockmen whose ranches were in close proximity to his plant, so that transportation costs had been reduced to the minimum. He had been in business but a few months, however, when the Southern Pacific became strangely unable to furnish cars to move his dressed meat from El Paso to Los Angeles. Finally, in response to repeated requests for an explanation, as he told the story to the Vest Committee—Senate Report 829; Fifty-first Congress, first session—the railroad officials told him they could not give him any cars at all; that their obligations were such to Mr. Armour that they dared not give him cars any more to ship his beef from El Paso to Los Angeles and San Diego.

The result of this discrimination on the part of the railroads was that Texas live stock, instead of being prepared at El Paso for shipment as dressed beef to Los Angeles, 812 miles distant, had to be transported on the hoof 950 miles to the big packers' plant at Kansas City, and then, as dressed meat, back over the same distance to El Paso, the starting point, before beginning the journey to Los Angeles.

It would require a very great saving in by-products to compensate for the huge losses occasioned by such enforced long hauls to market. It is not proof that the product is delivered to the consumer at a reasonable cost to assert that the profits on the delivery are small, unless it can be demonstrated that the cost of delivery itself is reasonable. A profit of one-fourth of a cent a pound might be an unjust and wholly unwarranted tax upon the public if the cost of putting the product on the market were extravagant and wasteful, while, on the other hand, a profit of 5 cents a pound might not be felt by the public at all if the packer, by economic methods, had reduced the cost of production to the minimum.

Now, it has been fully acknowledged by the big packers in their testimony before committees of both the House and the Senate that the small packer operates more economically than they do. Mr. J. Ogden Armour was the first to testify to this, and ever since he admitted to the House committee that the big corporations do not and can not make the margin of profit that is made by the small packer, the representatives of the big companies have been endeavoring to explain the admission away. Mr. L. H. D. Weld, one of the Swift & Co. experts, for example, told the House Committee on Agriculture at the present session that the big packer by doing business upon a national scale incurs certain heavy overhead expenses which the small packer in the local market does not have to meet; that is to say, the huge selling organization maintained by the big packer makes it necessary for him, if he is to reap a profit, to obtain a higher price for the finished product than the small packer has to get.

Pursuing the matter further, Mr. Weld said:

It so happens that Swift & Co. have some 22 plants throughout the United States, located so as to bring about the best relation so far as we can make out between the source of local meat supply and the location of consuming markets.

Now, either these 22 local plants which are not burdened by the maintenance of the long-distance delivery system are operated as efficiently and at as large a profit as the plants of the small packers or else they are operated less efficiently and at a smaller profit. If the former, then the prices of the big packer to the consumer are dictated not by the cost of serving the local market, but by the cost of serving the more expensive, long-distance market and the people instead of benefiting by the system created by the big packer, are actually compelled to pay a larger price for the product. If, however, on the other hand, the local plants of the big packer are operated less efficiently than those of the small packer and at a smaller profit, it follows clearly that the organization of the big packer is too large, is uneconomic, and therefore not beneficial to the public.

PRODUCTION DECREASED.

But, after all, the efficiency or lack of efficiency of any business or any system is to be measured by its results. What, then, has been the practical effect of the packer system upon the production and consumption of meat in the United States?

We all know that the population of the United States has been increasing in an almost phenomenal manner during the past 30 or 40 years. Prosperity has become more widespread during the same period, wages have increased and the standard of living has been raised. These are all facts which no one will question. One would naturally assume that a people thus advancing in numbers, in earning capacity, and in standards of living would also make a constantly increasing demand upon the meat-producing capacity of the country. Yet, the statistics of the Department of Agriculture (p. 207, Rept. 109, issued by the Bureau of Crop Estimates, July 3, 1916) show that from 1900 to 1916 the number of cattle in the country was reduced by approximately 9 per cent and the number of sheep by 19 per cent. During the same period the human population increased more than 25 per cent, and as might naturally be expected the per capita consumption of meat fell off. In other words, some disturbing influence was at work, which, in spite of a tremendous increase of the source from which the demand comes, had the effect of reversing the economic order and bringing about an actual decrease in the supply. But there was one factor which showed a steady and indeed an amazing increase during the same period—the profits of the big packers. The volume of business which they handled increased; their profits increased, their power increased, but the American people had less meat to eat and the American producer in the midst of prosperity had a smaller market for his output. It must be obvious that there is something radically wrong in a system that will prevent the natural and normal tendency of development. Every other food business has increased during this period. The production and consumption of clothing and of all other necessaries of life have increased hand in hand. This single element of food alone, in the marketing of which an abnormal centralization has been effected, has not kept pace with the growth of the country in population and prosperity.

The explanation of this condition of affairs readily suggests itself. The big packer, in order to maintain the selling organization by which he excludes the small packer from the market, has been obliged to sell his product at a higher price than the local packer would have had to demand. The man of moderate means, when the price advanced, instead of paying what the packer asked, turned to meat substitutes, and thereby necessarily and inevitably reduced the demand. The market of the producer was artificially restricted to those who were able to pay the price fixed by the system of packer control, and so we have the situation by which production and consumption were cut down at the very time the packer profits were steadily accumulating.

The supreme need of the producer at this moment is an increased market for his stock. The supreme need of the consumer is a larger supply. Your committee heard testimony of the most appealing sort from the representatives of the National Consumers' League of the plight of poor children in the large consuming centers to whom meat is a rarity seldom enjoyed. Your committee heard the evidence of many producers who had faced disaster or loss because of fluctuations in the market and the decrease of the demand. But the big packer has yet to appear and testify that he has made less than a reasonable profit from the capital invested in his business at any time during the last 30 years.

If any further proof of the failure of the packer system to serve the public efficiently and economically were needed, it would be obtained by a comparison of the statistics on beef production and distribution with those on pork production and distribution. I shall ask to be printed without reading two tables, one taken from the records of the Department of Agriculture showing the number of live stock as compared with the number of people in the United States annually from 1900 to 1916, the other showing the profits of the big packers during the same period.

NOTE.—These figures are digested from Poor's Manuals of Industrials, 1910–1918; Moody's Analyses of Investments, Public Utilities, and Industrials, 1914; Manuals of Statistics, 1905–1918. (Legislative Reference Division, Library of Congress, C. C. Tansill, May 5, 1920.)

It will be noted, as I have already indicated, that while the population of the country and the packers' profits were steadily increasing from year to year, the number of cattle and sheep in the United States were quite as steadily decreasing. But it will also be noted that the number of swine in the country was actually greater in 1916 than in 1900. Alone of all the meat animals, the hog was more numerous at the end of this period than at the beginning. In 1900 there were approximately 62,800,000; in 1916 there were 68,000,000, or roughly 8 per cent more. We are prompted then to inquire why pork production should increase while the production of beef and mutton should fall off. The answer, Mr. President, is that while the big packers have practically eliminated independent packers from the beef and mutton business, they have not succeeded to the same extent with respect to pork. For example, 82.2 per cent of all cattle and 86.4 per cent of all sheep slaughtered in interstate commerce in 1916 passed through the hands of the big packers, but they controlled only 61.2 per cent of all the hogs slaughtered in the same year. In other words, where the big packers exerted the greatest power production decreased, but where competition was greatest production increased. The conclusion is inescapable that the packers' system has not been efficient from the point of view of the public and that the restoration of competition in the packing of beef and mutton will stimulate the production of cattle and sheep.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wyoming yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. KENDRICK. If the Senator will pardon me, I prefer not to be interrupted until I have concluded my remarks.

Mr. REED. Certainly. I merely desired to ask a question to elicit some information. I did not know that the Senator had made that request.

Mr. KENDRICK. Surely, Mr. President, these facts of themselves are sufficient to justify the Government, on behalf of all the people, in setting up some sort of a Government agency to bring order out of this disorder and establish confidence where there is now only suspicion; and I want to say here, Mr. President, that without regard to any contention as to the efficiency of the great packers, without any regard to the service they render the country, I say to you without any fear of contradiction that whatever else they may have produced in those markets they have not produced confidence, and they never will produce confidence until there is some agency there that is authorized to speak for all, and speak in a disinterested way.

But the opponents of this legislation argue that the Government has no right to interfere in private business. It is the same argument by which every advance of public regulation of public utilities has been resisted, and it has gained nothing in the repetition. It is quite as weak and illogical when used against this reform as it was when used against public supervision of the railroads or public supervision of the insurance companies.

STOCK MARKETS ARE PUBLIC UTILITIES.

That the stock markets are public utilities I think no disinterested person will deny. Indeed, now that the packers are soon to surrender their ownership in the yards I note that Swift & Co. have publicly acknowledged, to quote the words of a recent Swift pamphlet, that "the stockyards are in the nature of a public utility." This being the case, Mr. President, our chief contention is granted, that public supervision should be established.

As conditions stand to-day and as they will continue to stand even after the recent injunction is enforced, unless there is legislation, the thousands of producers and the millions of consumers who are so wholly interested in what goes on day after day in the markets are without protection. Let us consider, for example, the circumstances in which the producer finds himself.

Remote from the market, without knowledge of the supply on hand or the demand in sight, save that which he receives from the agencies through which he sells, he sends in his shipments in the most haphazard way. Usually he has but little choice as to the time of shipment but must go to market when his stock is ready. It must be borne in mind that his product represents ordinarily the result not of a single season's labor but the labor of a period of from two to four years. He faces the hazards of the seasons three times where the producer of other food products faces them once, and scarcity of feed, maturity of loans, or other conditions which he can not control frequently force him to market. Accordingly he takes his stock to the railroad and assigns them to a commission firm. When once his stock is loaded on the trains he has no recourse save to take the price the market gives him. Bear in mind that his is not a product that can be held for a favorable turn in the market. Every day's delay after the stock is loaded means loss through shrinkage and heavy expense for maintenance. Obviously he can not take his shipment home. He has no choice. He must sell and sell at once.

If he should be dissatisfied with conditions at the market and should feel like going forward to another, he would know that when he arrived at the second market he would have to pay the same charge for feed, the same charge for yardage, and the same commission to the same commission firms, and finally sell to the same buyers. The only change would be a geographical one and the only effect an additional burden. Additional freight charges, additional yard charges, additional feed charges, and additional shrinkage in the weight of his stock all combine to deter him from doing anything but accept the price that he is first offered.

But even that is not all. The shipper knows and the packer admits that when he withdraws his shipment from the first market to forward it to another, at that very moment the agent whose bid he has refused has wired either to the headquarters of the packer at Chicago or to the buyer at the yard to which he has decided to go every detail of the transaction, and so when he arrives at the second market the packer there is expecting him with full knowledge of the size of his shipment, the kind and character of his stock, and the price that was offered in the first market. But if, to avoid what he believes to be the unfair effect of this practice, known as "wiring on," the stockman decides to split his herd and send part of it to one market and part of it to another, he finds himself confronted by another device, the inevitable tendency of which is to prevent competition. The packer who buys one part of the divided herd immediately sends word to the second market, and his agent there is fully advised of what price was first paid, so that the chance of the shipper getting a higher price in one market than in another is reduced to the minimum.

COMMISSION MEN COMPLAIN OF PACKERS.

That complaints of the methods employed in the yards do not emanate alone from the producer, and that there are other agencies in the yards which in the past at least have been dissatisfied with the manner in which the big packers have exercised their control, is indicated by the following formal protest signed by 74 of 86 commission firms operating upon the Chicago exchange and directed to Swift & Co., Armour & Co., Morris & Co., and Wilson & Co., urging a reform of methods:

CHICAGO, ILL., April 11, 1916.

To the Packers:

We, the undersigned live-stock commission merchants on the great Chicago Live Stock Market, representing literally thousands and thousands of producers of live stock and dealers therein, join in sending you this protest: First, against methods that have been used lately to influence violent price fluctuations, apparently not warranted by the natural operations of supply and demand; second, against the conditions under which the market is now forced to operate.

For some time past, actions have been witnessed on the part of large purchasers of live stock that seemed to be unfair and unjust; and time and time again undue advantage has been taken of the sellers of all kinds of live stock.

There is, apparently, no good reason why the buyers representing the larger packing interests should refuse to go out and bid on, and try to buy, stock until a late hour in the forenoon, as has been the custom for the past several years, and in many instances until after the noon hour.

We contend that such methods, employed to retard the progress of the market, have been very much to the disadvantage of the producers, the commission merchants, and the banks doing business at the stockyards and the stockyards company. It was formerly the custom for more than 20 years to open the cattle market about 9 o'clock in the morning, and in a great many cases consignments of cattle were sold considerably before that hour, and it was not unusual for the entire receipts of hogs to be sold and weighed by 9 o'clock. The shippers received returns for their stock on the same day it was sold, and business was generally conducted in a much more satisfactory manner.

We, as commission merchants, are not seeking for any favor or looking for any advantage for ourselves. All we desire is the same fair and square treatment that we have given you for the last 40 years, but we believe that you owe it to yourselves and to us, as well as to the producers of live stock, to so use your great influence to strengthen and build up the public live-stock markets of the country and to improve your standing in the estimation of the live-stock community of the United States.

Yours, truly,

Hearings before the Federal Trade Commission in the meat investigation. (Kansas City hearing, Mar. 21-23, 1918, pp. 4524-4529.)

It may be true, however, that the packers no longer intentionally employ methods we have just enumerated for the purpose of depressing the price of stock; it may be true, as they tell us, that they have voluntarily foregone these advantages over the shipper, but the fact remains that the power to injure has not been taken from them and that there exists today not the slightest guaranty that these old abuses may not be resumed—under new managers.

REVELATIONS OF BUREAU OF MARKETS.

For years the producer has struggled against these handicaps. If he had a grievance there was no tribunal in which he might find redress. There was no authority, no agent to whom he might appeal with confidence. Not until the food-control act of 1917 gave the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture the power to go into the markets and find out what was actually going on did the shipper have anyone to appeal for him. What he then discovered may be judged from the report sent to the Senate under date of January 24 by Hon. D. F. Houston, then Secretary of Agriculture. This report, now designated Senate document 185, shows that of 350 individual firms and corporations engaged as commission men at nine of the principal market centers more than 25, in the language of the Secretary, "had exacted substantial overcharges in the feed accounts being kept by them with their shippers." I read from the Secretary's report:

The books of 12 licensees in Chicago, 5 in St. Paul, 3 in Fort Worth, 1 in Kansas City, 1 in St. Joseph, and 2 in Sioux City showed substantial excess charges in their respective feed accounts from January 1, 1918, down to the time when their books were audited, or approximately for a period of 18 months, amounting in the aggregate to more than $90,000. Their books also showed excess charges in their feed accounts from the issuance of their respective licenses down to the auditing of their books. Consequently complaints were preferred against each of such licensees by the department, charging them with making an unjust charge and engaging in a deceptive practice in connection with the feed accounts which were kept with their shippers. Oral hearings before officers of the department were granted to each of them in the cities in which they were licensed to carry on their business and they were given an opportunity to appear in person or by counsel and to offer such evidence as they desired in their behalf.

Several of these licensees admitted that they had made a practice of selling the left-over hay or corn, which had already been charged to a preceding shipper, to some other shipper, thereby charging two shippers for the same hay and corn. However, many of such licensees contended that they had not followed such a practice in the feed accounts kept with their shippers and stated under oath that they considered such practices unfair and unjust to the shipper.

The evidence in these cases tended to show generally that the licensees had not given proper care and attention to the distribution of the feed and the keeping of their feed accounts with their shippers, and that this important phase of their business prior to the date of the complaints had been largely left to the unsupervised discretion and control of employees commonly known as yardmen.

The testimony as a whole, including admission to that effect on the part of some of the licensees, points to the conclusion that a large percentage at least of all the overcharges in these cases is the result of the practice of charging two shippers with the same hay or corn, whenever it appeared that the live stock of the first shipper had for any reason failed to consume a substantial part of the hay or corn furnished to them.

Several of the licensees who are involved in this reprehensible practice suffered the loss of their licenses. Others voluntarily refunded some of the excess charges, while others sought the law's delay to escape making restitution, but the result of the supervision exercised by the Bureau of Markets in this particular has been of direct, substantial, and measurable benefit to the producers. Instead of ruining their business or decreasing the demand for their product, it has had quite the contrary effect in reducing to some extent at least the expense which they have to meet when they go to market. To some degree, perhaps, a permanent reform has been effected because the Kansas City Live Stock Exchange in August, 1918, as a result of revelations of the Bureau of Markets, voluntarily adopted a rule forbidding the padding of feed charges. At Chicago the live-stock exchange adopted a rule to prevent commission firms from carrying live-stock traders or speculators on their pay rolls or seeking the services of such men gratuitously, thus eliminating one of those fruitful sources of excessive profit by which as the result of arrangements between commission men and traders a heavy and unwarranted toll was levied upon the shipper.

Fraudulent dealing and deceptive practices by which thousands of dollars had been withheld from remittances due to shippers were discovered by the Government agents in several yards. In one case alone more than $30,000 has been placed in escrow for distribution to consignors from whom it was withheld.

Let me not be understood as casting any reflection upon the integrity of the commission men as a class. From a wide personal acquaintance and long business experience with them it is my conviction that the majority of them have always dealt with their patrons on terms of the strictest integrity. But what I do say is that the system under which they do business to-day affords no protection to the public against the few who have indulged in the practices revealed by the Bureau of Markets. In no sense is this demand for legislation directed against individuals. It is in no sense an attack upon men—it is an attack upon methods; it is a demand for general market reform, a demand for the institution of a new system in which all, and not a few only, shall be represented.

REGULATION BY PRIVATE INTERESTS.

In spite of these revelations which have been made, showing beyond all doubt that there has been no protection for the public and that unwarranted charges have been levied, it is still argued that public regulation would be disastrous and that instead of creating a Government commission to prevent abuses and redress grievances we should trust rather the benign purposes these same private individuals who before the Bureau of Markets investigations so consistently denied that the rules of integrity had ever been transgressed.

Regulation in the interest of the victim, regulation to protect the public, would be disastrous, we are told; but what shall we say of the thoroughgoing regulation which the packers and operators now maintain over these essential public utilities in their own interest?

Mr. President, I have here an official notice issued from the office of the secretary of the Chicago Live Stock Exchange on January 12, 1920, signed officially by Mr. E. M. Hughes, secretary of the exchange, and the first two lines of this announcement of a new regulation reads as follows:

The commission for selling live stock shall not be less than the following rates.

It would be possible to quote regulation after regulation of a similar kind showing how the rules by which the markets are conducted are framed and enforced—not by the producer, not by the consumer, but by the market agencies themselves. There is not a case on record, Mr. President, in which the patron of a market was ever asked to give so much as an opinion as to what he should pay for the service in the market or what methods should be there employed. When the shipper delivers his stock to the railroad for transportation he knows that his Government, through the Interstate Commerce Commission, is standing guard for him; he knows that it will not permit an unreasonable charge to be assessed against him nor allow the railroad to discriminate against his shipment in any way; he knows that all the power of the United States is behind that commission to guarantee him a square deal. But when his stock is unloaded in the market he is at the mercy of interested agencies, without a spokesman and without protection. He must be guided by rules and regulations written by the men through whom he sells. If these agencies insist upon the right to fix rules and charges as they will, then certainly we are justified in demanding that the public interested in these markets should have authoritative representation somewhere to make sure that the rules and charges thus fixed by one party to the contract are not unreasonable.

COOPERATIVE ASSOCIATIONS EXCLUDED.

Let us refer, for example, to the by-laws of the live-stock exchanges like that at St. Paul, by which farmers' cooperative associations have been barred from stockyards all over the country. They have sent their representatives to the exchanges. They have offered the necessary fees. They have furnished every possible guaranty of respectability, honesty, and good intentions, but under the rules and regulations privately formulated they are not permitted to enter the exchange.

I have here the testimony of Mr. C. H. Gustafson, president of the Farmers' Educational and Cooperative State Union of Omaha, Nebr., given before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry September 12, 1919, and it throws so interesting a light on the situation that I shall take the liberty of reading it:

Mr. GUSTAFSON. My name is C. H. Gustafson; Lincoln, Nebr., is my post office, and Omaha, Nebr., is my office headquarters. In the first place, I want to say I do not stay within a half mile of the Willard Hotel. I represent the Farmers' National and Cooperative State Union of Nebraska; in short, we are called the Farmers' Union. I have been its president from the time it was organized six years ago this fall.

This organization is principally engaged in cooperative work amongst the farmers and producers. In addition to that, I represent other organizations that I will mention later on.

In order that it may be clear to the committee just what we are doing and trying to do, I want to say that our membership is composed of about 40,000 farmers over 21 years old. They pay an initiation fee and annual dues, which makes quite a permanent and effective organization.

We have developed a number of cooperative business enterprises, and among them I wish to speak especially of our Live Stock Commission Co., which was started two years ago the 1st day of April, at Omaha, Nebr. There is no stock sold. We used some of the surplus fees used for starting business with. I made application to the Live Stock Exchange of Omaha—it used to be South Omaha—for a membership in that exchange, but was turned down, completely turned down; they refused to sell us a membership.

The CHAIRMAN. Did they give the reason why they refused?

Mr. GUSTAFSON. Yes, sir. I told them that we intended to do business on the cooperative basis; after paying for actual expenses the rest of the profits would be divided pro rata amongst the customers that patronized the business; and on that ground we were turned down.

In August of the same year I made application to the St. Joseph (Mo.) Live Stock Exchange for a membership and was turned down for the same reason.

In August, 1918, I made application at the Sioux City Live Stock Exchange and was turned down in a similar way.

We opened up our live-stock commission business at South Omaha, as I stated, on April 1, two years ago this last April, charging the regular commission prices for selling live stock—cattle, hogs, and sheep—giving the regular service that other live-stock commission men give.

The first few months, of course, our overhead expenses were rather high. We engaged competent men; our live-stock manager has been in the commission business for 25 years. But at the end of the first 12 months at the Omaha exchange we returned in patronage dividends 30 cents on the dollar paid out in commission charges; and when we started at South Omaha there were 50 firms in the commission business, and at the end of 18 months had passed all except one firm. We were second largest on the yards, and were selling 100 carloads of hogs a month more than any other firm on the yard.

At the end of the second year, or April 1, this year—which is the end of our fiscal year—we had 56 per cent clear. Of that we set aside a sinking fund of 5 per cent and paid the State union 5 per cent for the service of the board of directors and the advertising and my services as president of the company, and returned to the members doing business with us 46 cents out of the dollar.

During all this time the live-stock exchange has been hostile to us and has fought us in every possible manner, telling misleading and untruthful things about us and our way of doing business; but the fact is that we have kept a close watch on the market and find that practically every month the hogs sold by us have brought from 1 cent to 3 cents a hundred over the average of the prices paid in the yards, which proves that our selling force is efficient.

And so, Mr. President, we find that the alternative which confronts us is not public regulation or no regulation, but public regulation or private regulation. For a generation the packers and operators have been in complete control and the public has been helpless. Throughout this period these agencies have reaped steadily accumulating profits, while, on the other hand, one set of producers after another have been driven out of business by excessive losses and the consumer has been forced to pay constantly mounting prices for his meats, or curtail materially the supply for his table. The strange disparity between the prices of live stock and the prices of dressed meat has time after time provoked the public to demand investigation—always after the damage had been done. Resolution after resolution has been passed in Congress to appoint some temporary commission to find the facts, because, though the industry is the most important in the Nation, no one has known or does know the facts, save the privileged agencies which control the markets, for the very moment an investigation has been closed its report was out of date.

THE EFFECT OF THE INJUNCTION.

It is argued, of course, that the recent decree against the big five secured by the Attorney General has solved the problem and eliminated the necessity for legislation. The injunction represents, it is true, a great advance in the protection of the public and its welfare, but a moment's consideration will reveal the fact that it does not and can not afford the relief that is needed. It affects only those specific defendants named in the petition and does not pretend to exercise any authority whatsoever over the hundreds of persons otherwise engaged in interstate commerce in this industry. In other words, the injunction touches only the incidental and not the fundamental features of the problem. It provides, for example, that the packer must dispose of his interests in the stockyards, but it does not offer the slightest guaranty that those stockyards shall hereafter be conducted in accordance with the principles of fair play and honest dealing which are essential if the industry is to be benefited. The country will gain absolutely nothing from the separation of the stockyards from the packing houses if no system is set up recognizing the fact that these markets are impressed with a public service and that like any other public utility they should be under the supervision of the public.

The injunction deals solely with the packer. It does not affect the commission men nor the trader in the market, nor any other agency which participates in the handling of live stock. What we need, Mr. President, is not a rule of conduct for certain individuals, but a law that will apply to the whole industry. Indeed, I am convinced that without a law—that is to say, without the enactment of this measure now pending before us—the injunction itself can scarcely be enforced, because without a supervisory authority there will be no agency adequate to the task of seeing to it that the decree is always obeyed. The injunction of 1905 was scarcely heard of again after it had been issued, and certainly the influence which it exerted on the industry was negligible.

The object to be attained is the establishment of a free and unrestricted movement of meat products from the farm and the range to the table of the consumer, the abolition of all artificial restraints, and the substitution of public law for the arbitrary will of interested private citizens.

COST OF PACKER PROPAGANDA.

Reform has been resisted by these dominant interests in a manner that serves only to increase the conviction that reform is necessary. Apparently without regard to facts, no expense has been spared in the effort to spread abroad an absolutely incorrect impression of the ends sought by legislation.

There can be no doubt that thousands of citizens all over this country have been led to believe that this measure is something utterly different from what it is in fact. There is scarcely a newspaper in the smallest hamlet, in the most remote section of the United States, that has not at some time or another in the past two years carried well-paid advertising matter from one or the other of the Big Five. It was, indeed, a most remote and insignificant community into which the packer propaganda has not been carried week after week and month after month, conveying to the minds of all who read packer advertisements with confidence an utterly false conception of this legislation. Scarcely a stock raiser anywhere upon the western range who did not receive a personal letter from one or the other of the big packers endeavoring to instill in his mind the thought that the legislation here proposed is but the precursor of national interference with individual enterprise. It would be possible to quote volumes of the misleading material sent out under the authority of the big packers. Interesting as this would be, we are, perhaps, more interested in what it has cost and upon whom the expense has fallen. Testifying before the Senate Committee on Agriculture on January 31, 1919 (see p. 1169, pt. 2, Senate hearings on S. 5305), Mr. Louis F. Swift produced statistics to show that for the five years 1913–1917 the average annual expenditure of Swift & Co. for advertising was approximately $428,000. But for the year 1919, when the propaganda campaign against legislation was just beginning, Swift & Co. spent $1,622,177 for this purpose, or almost as much every month as had previously been expended annually. Where formerly it had expended thousands to advertise its meats it now spends hundreds of thousands to advertise its morals.

In contrast with the figures given by Mr. Swift in 1919 is the testimony on the same subject given last month by Mr. L. H. D. Weld, the Swift economist. Denominating the anti-legislation propaganda "educational advertising," he told the House committee that Swift & Co. spends a million and a half annually on this alone; that the total advertising bill of Swift, to use his own words, "would run up to about two million or two and a half million dollars"; and, furthermore, that the cost of the pamphlet replies to the Federal Trade Commission report, with which the country has been deluged, is not included in these figures. When we add, Mr. President, to the enormous outlay of Swift & Co. the expenditures of the American Institute of Meat Packers and the expenditures of the other four big packers for the same purpose, which we may assume from the evidence before our eyes has been in like proportion, we find ourselves confronted with the most stupendous fund ever accumulated to mold public opinion and obstruct the representatives of the public in the performance of their duty.

Let us make no mistake, Mr. President; this tremendous outlay for propaganda purposes has been a direct charge upon the public. It was taken from the fund that would have been paid into the Treasury of the United States in taxes, or else it was charged to the price which the consumer had to pay for his meat or deducted from the price which the producer received for his stock. It may be true it was an insignificant sum as compared to the vast resources of the big packers. But at a time when the United States Government, through the Treasury Department, was conducting a campaign in every corner of the United States to sell $50 Liberty bonds on installments to working men and working women, whose wages were scarcely sufficient to clothe or feed them, such an expenditure came with poor grace from concerns that at the same time boasted 100 per cent patriotism.

THE PROPOSED LAW.

What, then, are the objects and methods of the bill which the packers have so vigorously and expensively resisted? It is drawn upon the assumption that the great markets and market agencies which handle the meat supply of this Nation are essentially public utilities, and that because there is no instrumentality that can be set up outside of the Federal Government which is competent to protect the public interest the Federal Government should act. We have seen that three classes, two of them very large, the producers and the consumers, and one of them very small, the market agencies, are vitally interested in this industry. We have seen that the producers and the consumers under present circumstances are without the power to exercise the slightest influence upon the principles under which these markets are conducted, while, on the other hand, the third, and smallest, class is in a position of such power and strategic value that it not only dominates but regulates the industry to its own advantage.

We have seen that for a generation the method by which this limited class has controlled the market has been the subject of continuous suspicion; that it has provoked investigation after investigation; that it has given rise to endless agitation, all of which has kept the entire industry in turmoil, so that the only class which has continuously profited from it is that limited class which has heretofore controlled and regulated it. Finally, we have seen that, instead of efficiently serving the American people, the industry in its present unsupervised condition has brought about a decrease of both production and consumption of meat products in the United States.

All of this leads inevitably to the conclusion that there can be no settlement of the problem until the Federal Government, representing all classes of the population, is empowered by appropriate legislation to protect the rights of all concerned. We want an agency clothed with the authority to pass upon all complaints, an agency in which all may have confidence because it is disinterested, an agency that will have the power to proclaim all the facts with regard to this industry, so that every interested person may know that justice and fair dealing prevail.

This, Mr. President, I am firmly convinced may be accomplished by the enactment of this measure. It creates a Federal live-stock commission which shall have such powers of investigation and supervision as to make it certain that the public at all times shall know every essential fact that has any bearing upon this industry. It is authorized to receive complaints and hear grievances from those who have any reason to believe that they are not receiving strict justice in the market, who have any reason to believe that illegal agreements have been effected or unfair practices adopted by any of the market agencies. It is authorized to conduct such necessary investigations, make such necessary examinations of books and papers as may be required to establish the truth or falsity of any such charge. But every member and every agent of this commission is placed under the strictest bond of secrecy so that no information of whatever character may be made public without the formal authority of the commission unless by order of a court.

To all intents and purposes, Mr. President, the commission is a court, and no man who is doing business honestly has any more reason to fear its activities than the ordinary citizen has to worry over the powers of the district court. This commission will have no more reason to interfere with the legitimate operations of a law-abiding corporation than any court in the land has to interrupt the proper activities of the average citizen.

No new principles of law are laid down, but many old principles are reenacted for the purpose of restoring and maintaining competition. The doctrine that public utilities should be subject to public supervision is recognized, and under the terms of the bill, packers and operators are forbidden to engage in unfair or deceptive practices, or to enter into any of those conspiracies or combinations in restraint of trade which have been in evidence throughout the entire history of this industry.

NO ARBITRARY POWERS GRANTED.

The live-stock commission provided for in this measure is authorized to make such regulations and rules within the provisions of the law as may be necessary to carry into effect the purposes of the law. But it has no power, and the proponents of the measure have no intention of granting it any power, to exercise arbitrary authority or by rules and regulations to demand of any person or corporation subject to its operation anything not prescribed in the general terms of the bill, and the rights of those who are affected by the legislation are completely safeguarded against any such abuse of authority. In the first place, before any action of any kind may be taken by the commission, it is required by law to serve notice in writing upon the packer or operator accused of evading the law, affording that person an opportunity to appear publicly before the commission, to be heard in person or by counsel and through witnesses in his own defense. If upon such hearing the commission is satisfied that a violation of the law has been committed, it may not arbitrarily punish the individual or the corporation which it has summoned before it, but it must make a written report of its findings and serve the same upon the defendant with an order requiring the defendant to abandon the alleged illegal practice. All the testimony upon which this order is based must be reduced to writing and preserved in the permanent records of the commission, so that it will be available at any time on behalf of the Government or on behalf of the defendant.

If for any reason the packer or operator against whom such an order has been issued by the commission finds that he has been unjustly dealt with or improperly condemned, his right to appeal to the courts is effectively preserved. Within 30 days after the issuance of the commission's order he may present a written petition to the United States circuit court of appeals for the district in which he has his principal place of business asking that the commission's order be set aside or modified in accordance with the specifications which he may set out, whereupon the commission must certify to the court a full and complete transcript of the record so that the court acting as an appellate body may affirm, set aside, or modify the order of the commission. If the court finds that the original order was issued on insufficient evidence, it may direct the commission to receive further testimony, and so in every possible way the rights and privileges of all the market agencies are protected according to the rules of legal procedure.

Such a law could not possibly have an adverse effect upon any single one of all the market agencies, provided only that their operations are conducted with integrity. The law forbids monopoly. It forbids unfair dealing. It forbids agreements or conspiracies to raise prices. It forbids practices by which unnecessary and unreasonable tolls are exacted from the producer and from the public. It creates a Government agency which through the sheer force of publicity will prevent the practices always forbidden by our law. In the past trade has been restrained and monopoly has been allowed to go unhampered because there has been no effective method of enforcing either the law of custom or the law of statute against those who sought unreasonable profits without regard to the methods they employed. Surely no man and no corporation, willing to abide by these fundamental principles of fair dealing and honest business methods, need fear a law the only purpose of which is to protect these principles from violation. In my judgment, if this measure is enacted into law, it will be found to be an almost immediate corrective, and I venture the prediction that after it has once been written upon the statute books violations of it will be rare.

But the critics of legislation will say, and do say in spite of the fact that every care has been taken to safeguard against the abuse of authority by Government officials, that rules and regulations destructive of the business and even violative of the law will be put into effect. Mr. President, I submit that there is no foundation for any such fear. The argument is an example of special pleading which seeks to create an impression regardless of logic or fact. After the declaration of war Congress passed the food-control act, granting the United States Food Administration and the Bureau of Markets powers much broader than those which are contained in this measure. It was war legislation, and the Food Administration was authorized not only to guard against illegal practices and monopoly but also to limit the profits of the great packers, and the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture to protect against profiteering in all of the market agencies was authorized to place these agencies under Federal licenses. From the time that act was passed until shortly after the signing of the armistice this industry, Mr. President, was under strict control. Although the packers knew that this regulation was about to end they made the rather amazing argument that because regulation by these Government agencies was successful the suggested bills should not be enacted. When Mr. Swift appeared before the Senate Committee on Agriculture in January, 1919, he complimented the Bureau of Markets upon its efficiency and expressed some satisfaction with the bureau's methods. What, we may ask, is the peculiar condition that will transform the Bureau of Markets from an efficient and beneficial agency to an agency that will bring ruin and disaster to the business merely by the passage of a measure which places the functions of the Bureau of Markets under the direction of a Federal live-stock commission?

PRACTICAL RESULTS OF GOVERNMENT SUPERVISION.

It may also be pointed out in this connection that during the year 1918, while the Food Administration was exercising its war powers of control over the packing industry, production and consumption in the United States were vastly increased. We succeeded not only in producing sufficient meat to feed our Army in Europe and supply the civilian population of the associated nations, who were unable to draw upon Australia and South America because of the lack of shipping, but we developed such a surplus that the use of meat in the United States increased to such a degree that for the first time in almost 20 years the per capita consumption was greater than it was in the year 1900. The producer had a larger market. The consumer had a larger supply. And all of this under Government regulation and control far more stringent than that which is here proposed. It is not without its significance that the months which have elapsed since the Food Administration ceased to use its powers have seen the collapse of the live-stock market. Within the past 13 months there has been a decline in the value of cattle on the hoof of from 33⅓ to 39 per cent. When Congress adjourned a year ago last March cattle were selling in Chicago at $20.40. They are now selling at from $12 to $13.50. Every live-stock journal in the country is filled with statements from shippers to the effect that they are through with beef production. This inevitably suggests a shortage for the future and the necessity for the reestablishment of some form of Government supervision of market conditions.

In any event, it is clear that the record of the Food Administration and of the Bureau of Markets during the war is a complete refutation of the charge that this legislation would have the slightest discouraging effects upon the industry. Rather, indeed, is this record a proof that very real and immediate benefits may be expected to accrue from its enactment.

We do not propose a law that will hamper or even disturb the legitimate operations of any agency associated with this industry. We do not ask legislation for the purpose of punishing any man for the errors and abuses of the past. We ask legislation only for the purpose of bringing about a better understanding in these markets; we ask only an authorized Government instrumentality that will inspire universal confidence by eliminating the possibility of unfair practices.

This bill is not drawn in the interest of any special class—it is drawn in the interest of all classes. Producer, consumer, and packer will all benefit by its adoption. I venture the assertion that the reduction of the prices of foodstuffs to a normal level would go further toward allaying the unrest of to-day than any other influence. By means of Federal supervision of our markets we can eliminate unnecessary and arbitrary levies of cost. In proportion as we do this we shall stabilize values and thus bring confidence to the field of production, which will automatically increase the supply and lower the price to the consumer. The present demoralization of the market can have only the opposite effect. Because confidence has been undermined, production is becoming more and more hazardous, with the inevitable consequence that a diminishing supply will still further enhance the cost to the consumer. It has been amply demonstrated that there is no private agency, not even the packer, capable of coping with the situation. The Federal Government alone can furnish the remedy, for the Federal Government alone can represent all classes.

If written upon the statute books, this measure will go far to lead back to the farm the young men who have been lured away by other industries and it will help to keep on the farm those who are there now. By insuring a more equitable distribution of the profits of the industry, it will have the effect of counteracting the attractions of the city, and, as already indicated, of stimulating production, thereby furnishing a larger supply to the consumer.

The packer, too, will benefit. Relieved of the necessity of forever fighting at great expense to retain his special privileges he will be able to devote more time and attention to his proper business. Monopoly rendered impossible, new capital will be invited into this industry and new avenues will be opened from the range to the table.

Indeed, Mr. President, if there is one agency more than another that is vitally concerned in settling this question now and settling it right, it is the big packer. He wholly misjudges his position and the effect of his action if he imagines that by resisting this needed reform and striving to perpetuate irresponsible private control of this most vital of all our industries, he is serving his own best interests. No man, and least of all, the man of unusual property interests, has any right to ask that the public shall show any more sacred regard for his rights than he shows for the rights of the public. The people of this country are still inherently sound in their adherence to the rights of property; they have no prejudice against wealth as such, but their attitude toward it is dependent upon the manner in which it has been accumulated. If it has been earned as the reward of real service, its owner may be assured of the respect and good will of his fellow citizens; but when it has been acquired by brutal and unfair means the American people have neither respect nor sympathy for its possessor.

LEGISLATION INEVITABLE.

The public conscience condemns with increasing severity the sharp and dishonest practices which were so readily condoned only a few years ago, and at the same time it demands with increasing insistence that every man shall have a square deal. If the Congress of the United States closes its ears to the legitimate appeals for assistance and protection coming from the great masses, if by inaction or neglect it permits men of enormous wealth to shut the door of opportunity to other men, then, sir, we may confidently look for the growth of radical theories. All the obstruction the opponents of this legislation may be able to raise now can not prevent, it can only delay, the solution of this problem, and the longer action is arbitrarily postponed the more extreme will be the final reckoning. This lesson, Mr. President, is written across the skyline of Europe to-day in blazing characters, and no man should be more prompt to read it than the man of property—no man should be more prompt than he to show by his cooperation in bringing about any necessary reform that in the possession of great wealth he recognizes the responsibility of stewardship toward the public.

The measure of relief here offered, Mr. President, is one that should have ready support. We have seen the tremendous magnitude and importance of the industry with which it deals, one of the oldest pursuits of man; we have reviewed its history in the United States during the past 30 years, a history of constant clamor, constant discord, constant discredit; we have seen that the great majority of those who are interested in the industry are unable to protect themselves and are dependent upon the arbitrary will of a few men, and, finally, we have seen that in framing the legislation which has been presented to the Senate every care has been taken to draft a bill which shall guarantee absolute integrity in the markets without interfering in the least in private initiative or private enterprises. Failure to act now can only have the effect of prolonging present discordant and discreditable conditions without in the end preventing reform. Favorable action, on the other hand, will bring such confidence and harmony that the entire Nation will be benefited.

During the delivery of Mr. KENDRICK's speech,

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts in the chair). The Senator from Wyoming will please suspend. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, it becomes the duty of the Chair to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the distribution, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wyoming will proceed.

Before the conclusion of Mr. KENDRICK's speech,

The VICE PRESIDENT resumed the chair.

After the conclusion of Mr. KENDRICK's speech,

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, we have just listened to a very illuminating address dealing with abuses of the packing industry. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] has shed a great deal of light upon that subject. I propose to occupy the time of the Senate for a few moments on the subject of national production.

For reconstruction a hand-to-mouth policy is impossible.

Ever-increasing production must be our national objective.

To increase production we must first increase our means of production—our tools of industry.

Mr. President, on Friday of last week the Senator from Oklahoma drew the attention of the Senate to the probable effect of a horizontal raise in discount rates upon our means of production and distribution and upon agriculture. On the same day the Senator from Missouri introduced a resolution requesting information from the Interstate Commerce Commission as to the extent of the present freight congestion and as to means proposed to relieve this congestion. Since then we have had a number of illuminating addresses on the subject of profiteering, hoarding, and taxation by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON].

I regret that subsequent statements in the Senate and in the daily press have been far from reassuring.

Through increasing discount rates hoarded goods may be liquidated and we may experience a falling of prices, but this can not increase our supply of commodities or increase our capacity to produce commodities. It can not materially reduce the cost of the rehabilitation of our depleted transportation facilities, for the lack of which construction, agriculture, and manufacturing are impeded.

Hoarding may have been an important factor in the increase of prices during the past year, but hoarding has always taken place when shortages have been anticipated.

The rise in prices has been attributed to the general practice of profiteering, but extortionate demands always accompany shortages.

The rise in prices has also been attributed to inflation, but inflation was certainly induced by the world's shortage of commodity.

Inefficiency of labor has been blamed, but there is a shortage of labor, and labor has questioned the increasing use of capital in speculation rather than its investment in manufacturing, transportation, and housing.

To-day it is impossible to realize the extent and the many consequences of the world's shortage. The actual wastage of wealth caused directly by the war is probably but one-fifth of the total world's loss due to the diversion of capital and labor from their usual peace-time employment.

It is futile to repeat the age-long unsuccessful experiments in price fixing. History records so many unsuccessful attempts by governmental authorities to regulate prices from those of Emperor Diocletian, Queen Elizabeth, and King Edward II to the recent attempts of our own Federal and State authorities.

However necessary such paternalistic legislation may be to protect the public from the conditions of monopoly and panic, such legislation has never afforded permanent relief. Enterprise and money go where they make friends. The supply of commodities and housing can not be increased by limiting the promise of return to the enterprise and capital necessary to produce them.

It is futile to simply attribute high prices to inflation, profiteering, hoarding, inefficiency of labor, or diversion of capital. It is futile to wait and hope that a dip in prices through the liquidation of a limited amount of commodity will bring about continuous relief and development.

Our national objective must be ever-increasing production, but to increase production we must first increase our means of production. A hand-to-mouth policy may be necessary during war, but it is impossible during reconstruction.

The United States has been doing little of late to develop its agricultural, mining, manufacturing, transportation, and housing, even though it knows that costs can not decrease until such development has set in.

As one who has spent his life in the building business, I naturally look to the improvement in the nation's machinery of production as the means of permanently increasing its supply of useful commodities.

The necessity for plant improvement and increased construction of all kinds seems to be clearly written in modern history.

About 120 years ago a theory was advanced that the increase in the means of living was much less rapid than the increase in population—the former increasing in arithmetical and the latter in geometrical ratio. Relief under such circumstances could come only through periodical depopulation, as through birth control, famine, plague, or war.

This doctrine, announced by Robert Malthus in the year 1798, was widely accepted, but improved appliances for production and distribution during the past century have so multiplied the earning power of the individual and increased the world's goods that the standard of living has been raised instead of lowered. Luxuries and even leisure have been possible in spite of the increased population.

The creation of new and more efficient means of production—railroads and canals, machinery and building—was largely responsible for the development of the natural resources of the United States, culminating just before the Civil War in the business depression of 1857, due to speculation incident to canal projects and other causes.

The end of the Civil War found the United States with decreased facilities for production and distribution and a shortage of commodities and of houses, but the national plant was speedily rehabilitated through the development of railroads and machinery. Land was called into production through the homestead acts; tonnage production succeeded pound production and machine methods succeeded hand methods. As means of production and distribution increased—although interrupted by the panic of 1873 due to inflation and railroad speculation—prices of commodities gradually became less and wages greater.

Commencing about 1891, however, the country began to feel the effects of increased gold production and of greater combinations of both labor and capital. The population gradually turned away from development toward merchandising and trading; "money was made" through deals and consolidations. As development was halted, a distinct trend toward higher prices set in after 1896. This trend toward higher prices became a noticeable factor in deterring physical development after 1907.

The commencement of the Great War in 1914 found this country with limited per capita plant requirements, with a debt to Europe of $6,000,000,000 represented largely by securities sold on account of plant construction. The Great War brought about an extraordinary foreign demand for our commodities. We received in return gold, securities, and inflated credits. Commodities became scarce, profits and wages increased. But these were spent in consumables rather than in plant. Our railroad extensions were stopped and rolling stock depleted, our rapid-transit facilities became inadequate, and our factory equipment, except for war production, fell behind its former standards.

Our own entry into the Great War found us with our peace plant still further depleted. Its reconstruction was checked by governmental allocations. Since the cessation of hostilities the exceptional demand for nonessentials has still further retarded the rehabilitation of housing, factories, and transportation. People have been lulled into a false sense of well-being and prosperity by inflation of currency and credit, which have temporarily bridged the gap. Meanwhile the depletion of the national plant has been so gradual that its cumulative effect has not yet been fully realized.

Being still unsettled and technically at war, the free and natural flow of men and material to places of exceptional demand is not taking place nor are we as a nation taking steps to gain a more complete understanding of the facts and to establish the equilibrium between supply and demand.

Organized groups are impeding transportation and production in an effort to secure increased wages, made necessary in part by the shortage of efficient facilities. There seems to be a popular belief that the situation may be cured by legislation which may change the distribution of commodities among the people, rather than increase the quantity of commodities to be distributed.

As we continue to spend and speculate in the limited products of our limited plant, giving little thought to its betterment, we find ourselves facing the law of diminishing returns.

We are now face to face with a housing shortage throughout the land. The construction of manufacturing buildings is being postponed on account of high prices and also because transportation and labor are unavailable. It is said that the car shortage can not be made up for several years; in the meantime transportation is inadequate, grain is being held in elevators, and a severe fuel and food shortage is predicted for the coming winter and spring.

We have witnessed the remarkable physical development of Germany before the war; we have noted the attempt of Germany to develop its facilities by the removal of machinery from France and Belgium during the war; and we have even been told that her industrial engineers followed her armies into Poland and elsewhere, making surveys for railways, hydroelectric plants, drainage canals, and other peace-time developments. We know that one of Germany's most serious blows to France was the destruction of the French manufacturing and mining districts.

The specific obligation now confronting the United States is so to increase its facilities for the production and distribution of useful commodities as to adequately meet the needs of its people. The plant development in the United States to-day is not adequate for its domestic needs. The United States can not give foreign succor or meet world competition until it has corrected this situation and has facilities for the production of necessities in excess of those required at home.

We recognize the influence of the introduction of improved means of production and distribution upon the world during the past century and particularly upon the United States immediately after the Civil War.

It is to be hoped that we are not to have a serious business depression; but if one should come it will, I believe, be of short duration, and after it is over I believe the Nation will enter into a period of physical development which will be even greater in magnitude than that period of physical development succeeding the Civil War and which will more adequately utilize its national resources. This reconstruction must be physical in fact. To increase production we must first increase our means of production.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief observation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PHELAN in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should especially like to direct the attention of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] to this fact:

The range that formerly sent a great number of cattle into the Chicago and Kansas City markets no longer exists. It has been taken up by actual settlers and withdrawn from the open range. The Senator from Wyoming, in his address awhile ago, called attention to the decrease in the number of cattle in the United States going into the market to furnish a basis for our beef supply. I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from

New York to the fact that the decrease in the acreage of range has gone directly to the subject to which he is now addressing his paragraph.

The Senator from Wyoming further followed with the statement that hogs have not been reached by the packers in their depredations and that the hog market is still supplied. That is because there is a difference between the conditions that produce a steer and the conditions that produce a hog. A steer is a civilized product only when he is raised in an inclosed pasture. The steer that came from the range of the West and Southwest no longer has the range. A hog does not need range. He is a meat animal that requires a sedentary life, and the more he ranges the poorer producer of human food products he is. As inclosures have been taken up and farms have been created, the hog has naturally increased, because he is a purely nonrange product.

Hogs have increased all over the United States in production; but the range, from which the Senator from Wyoming awhile ago argued that our beef supply has fallen off, has decreased. The same thing decreases the supply of mutton, because the sheep is largely a ranging animal; and the large supplies of mutton and beef hereafter probably will come from Australia, where there is a great open range preserved even to this time.

Mr. CALDER. The interruption of the Senator from Illinois is very illuminating. It gets back to just what I said at the close of the last paragraph—that reconstruction should be physical in fact, and to increase production we must first increase our means of production. If we do that—and that is a subject to which we ought to give our attention—then the rest will not be so difficult.

Mr. President, Senate Resolution No. 350, introduced by me, was adopted by the Senate on April 15. Under the provisions of that resolution a special committee has been appointed, consisting of Senator KENYON, of Iowa; Senator EDGE, of New Jersey; Senator WOLCOTT, of Delaware; Senator GAY, of Louisiana; and myself as chairman, to investigate housing and all forms of construction throughout the country, and of industries upon which the construction industry is directly and indirectly dependent. In my opinion the adoption of this resolution by the Senate is a timely act, recognizing as it does that structural development is necessary for the fuller utilization of the Nation's resources, for the production of its essentials, and for the amelioration of its housing conditions, and that construction was curtailed by the war and is now hampered by an unprecedented demand for consumables.

The scope of the committee's work is necessarily extended because of the interdependence of the various factors, it being evident that construction can not proceed without transportation, labor, and capital, and that construction of all kinds is necessary for increased production.

The time allotted to the committee is comparatively short. Accurate and detailed information is essential.

In order to amplify and verify data otherwise obtained, it is the desire of the committee that it may receive from the Senators and Congressmen their personal knowledge as to home conditions, together with their suggestions as to means to relieve these conditions. The committee also earnestly invites the cooperation of Federal, State, and municipal authorities, as well as that of organized industry.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, may I make an inquiry of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], with regard to his address of a short while ago? Let me ask the Senator why, in drafting the bill, recourse to the trial courts where juries may be impaneled is entirely avoided?

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I do not think there was any plan to avoid it, and certainly there was no intention to leave those concerned and affected by the proceeding without protection. It is a matter in regard to which I can not answer the Senator offhand.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will state—probably the Senator is informed of the constitution of our Federal courts—that the United States court of appeals is not what lawyers call a nisi prius court, or a trial court, in which a jury can by its constitution be impaneled. It is one of the inferior courts of the United States mentioned in the Constitution over which Congress has jurisdiction to legislate. Accordingly it has within a comparatively recent time created the United States courts of appeal. They are not trial courts, as they are known to the administration of justice. They can not and do not impanel juries to try questions of fact to which citizens of the country may submit disputed questions of evidence.

The court to which the packers may appeal from a finding of fact by the live-stock commission provided is the United States circuit court of appeals in the district wherein the order was made. This is not a trial court in which a jury can be impaneled. Why is this appeal directed to the United States circuit court of appeals instead of the United States district or circuit courts, wherein juries may be impaneled to decide questions of fact?

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, it was my understanding that the complaint was referred to the court of appeals more particularly for the purpose of expediting the decision. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] had something to do with drafting the bill, and I will ask him to answer the question.

Mr. KENYON. I did not hear the Senators' discussion, so I can not answer the question.

Mr. SHERMAN. The inquiry was why the trial courts were avoided in appealing from the finding or the order of the live-stock commission created in the bill.

Mr. KENYON. Only to expedite the procedure.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not at all to avoid a jury trial?

Mr. KENYON. Certainly not.

Mr. SHERMAN. That was never dreamed of in the committee?

Mr. KENYON. Not at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. Has the Senator any objection to an appeal to the district and circuit courts of the United States where on a finding of fact a jury can be impaneled?

Mr. KENYON. Not at all. I have always favored jury trials. The only object was to expedite the proceedings, if it was considered at all. That was all.

Mr. SHERMAN. It was not to substitute an ex parte commission for the jury system of the country?

Mr. KENYON. Not at all. The Senator sees a ghost that is not there.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to be unduly alarmed about an invasion of our liberties, but would the Senator object to an amendment restoring the hearing of this matter on an appeal from the commission to the trial court, if I should offer it at some future time?

Mr. KENYON. I would like to take it up and discuss it. I have no power to accept it, anyhow, of course.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would the Senator himself oppose it? I will put it in a way that he can answer.

Mr. KENYON. I am not inclined to oppose the determination of any of these questions by juries. I have great faith in the American jury system.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly. I am talking in the Senator's time.

Mr. KENDRICK. As one of those who has favored and been interested in this legislation, I certainly would not oppose that change, because my purpose throughout the whole effort to secure legislation has been one, as stated a moment ago, which will prove a benefit not only to the great agencies of one or more of those concerns but to everyone connected with the industry. That is the sole purpose of the legislation, so far as I am concerned, and, if I believed it would safeguard the interests of those who were affected, I would not object to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. Would the Senator object to an amendment which would give the person or company investigated a right to be heard in a district or circuit court of the United States before a jury on a matter of fact upon the evidence taken before the commission, which is more in the nature of a commission or a master in chancery for taking evidence, to get the facts and take findings on them? Would the Senator object to an amendment which would secure the right of trial by jury in one of the trial courts of the United States?

Mr. KENDRICK. I certainly would not; and, Mr. President, I may say further to the Senator from Illinois, it has been my purpose here to avoid infringing upon the rights of any person connected with this industry and to avoid any disposition or inclination to punish anybody in connection with it. The inspiration behind the legislation with me is to eliminate for once and all time this continual clamor about the unfair practices of those markets, and any changes that are required in the proposed bill which would tend to protect more fully the rights of all involved I should be more than willing to go along with; and I would go further and depend a good deal upon the legal judgment of the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thank the Senator for the implied compliment; but in seeking to create a commission, if the Senator, with the Committee on Agriculture of the Senate, has discovered a method of ending these disputes between buyer and seller, he has done something that 6,000 years have hitherto failed to do. It began shortly after Adam left the Garden of Eden, and it is still here in the Senate.

THE MERCHANT MARINE.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

Mr. CALDER. I ask permission to withdraw the amendment and propose the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is withdrawn, and the following amendment is offered by the Senator from New York.

The READING CLERK. Add a new section to read as follows:

SEC. —. Unless the board shall approve and by formal order so authorize, no vessel owned or operated by the Panama Railroad Co. shall be operated commercially in the transportation for hire of persons or property, except between ports of the United States, Haiti, and the Panama Canal, in competition with vessels of the board or with vessels of the United States wholly owned or operated by citizens of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment as now offered by the Senator from New York.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I do not believe the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York should be agreed to. The Senate should be advised fully as to the purpose and the effect of this amendment.

When the United States Government purchased the assets of the Panama Canal, it acquired the Panama Railroad Co., which owned and operated a line of steamships. The Panama Steamship Line is not incorporated. It is operated in connection with the Panama Railroad Co., which is a Government corporation. There are a number of vessels—the Colon, the Panama, the Alianca, and the Advance—operating in the regular weekly passenger service between New York and the Canal Zone, the Colon and the Panama stopping at Port au Prince on their outward and homeward trips. This steamship line also owns the Ancon, which is now in the Army service, but which it is expected shortly will be returned to the Panama Steamship Line. The Cristobal, a large vessel, is now in dry dock at Balboa being reboilered, and that vessel will be laid up for about five months.

The Gen. O. H. Ernst and Gen. H. F. Hodges are German interned steamers now being operated in the freight service of the Panama Steamship Line between New York and the Canal Zone. The Gen. G. W. Goethals and the Gen. W. C. Gorgas, which complete the list of the fleet of the Panama Steamship Line, are now in the Army service carrying troops. They are expected, however, shortly to be returned to the service of the Panama Steamship Line.

While the morning business was under consideration I made a statement with reference to an article in the nature of propaganda relating to the subject matter of this amendment sent out by the Washington bureau of the Journal of Commerce. I also referred to a letter written by Mr. T. H. Rossbottom, the assistant to the vice president of the Panama Railroad Co., explaining the policy of the Panama Steamship Line, and explaining also somewhat in detail the real nature of the controversy which is presented to the Senate in the amendment of the Senator from New York.

The Senator from New York on yesterday offered an amendment which, in effect, forbids the Panama Steamship Co. to take passengers or freight at any foreign port except from the Canal Zone. It seeks to limit the steamships of the Panama Steamship Line in the carrying trade to the transportation of supplies to and from Panama.

Prior to the outbreak of the European war, Haiti was practically without means of transportation. At the instance of the Navy Department, the War Department, and other agencies of the Government, the Panama Steamship Line adopted a policy, which it is now pursuing, of stopping at Port au Prince in Haiti and taking on and discharging cargoes and passengers. That service was needed by the people of Haiti.

The Panama Steamship Line operated to some ports of minor importance for a time, but the policy of doing that was severely criticized by the Shipping Board, and the steamship line, in order to preserve harmony, abandoned that policy, and now for some time it has been pursuing the course of having two of its steamships stop monthly at Port au Prince to take on and discharge passengers and cargo.

The competitors of the Panama Steamship Line in the Haitian trade are the Dutch Line, a foreign steamship corporation, and the Raporel Line, which is operated by merchants. The representatives of the Panama Steamship Line are assured from their investigations of the subject that the Raporel can not maintain itself in the Haitian trade, due to the fact that merchants who are not interested in the steamship line are scarcely willing, certainly not anxious, to ship their goods in vessels owned by competitors.

The Panama Steamship Co., or its representatives, find that if the United States is precluded from participating in that trade it will likely pass very shortly under a foreign flag.

The Senate well understands the relationship between the United States and Haiti. If the Senate desires to adopt a policy which, in practice and effect, means denying admission to Haitian ports of ships carrying the American flag, they can do so. The Senator from New York just a moment ago withdrew an amendment which he presented yesterday, and now presents another amendment, which would give the Shipping Board control over the vessels of the Panama Steamship Line and deprive the officers of the Panama Steamship Co. of the power to engage in the trade except at ports in Haiti and the Canal Zone.

This amendment in a sense grows out of a controversy which has arisen between the Shipping Board and the Panama Steamship Line. The Shipping Board, it seems, has adopted a policy and is seeking to enforce that policy not only as affects the vessels under its control, but also as affects vessels over which it has no jurisdiction under the law, namely, ships under the control of the Panama Steamship Line. That policy, briefly stated, is that Government-owned and Government-operated vessels shall not compete for any trade where privately owned and operated lines are in the trade.

Do Senators know what that means? It means that if the amendment goes into effect, the arrangement now in existence between the Panama Steamship Line and the Chilean Line, which is a Government-owned line, and the Peruvian Line, which is a Government-owned line, being owned by the respective Governments of Chile and Peru, will be terminated, and the United States will pass entirely out of the carrying trade between South American and Central American ports, except the Canal Zone, and, as the amendment is now presented, Haitian ports.

The undisputed facts are that the United States ships, the ships owned and operated by the Panama Steamship Line, can not compete with foreign vessels if they are limited to the receipt of cargoes from foreign ports in the Canal Zone and in Haiti. The undisputed fact is that there is very little cargo for New York and other United States ports to be taken at the Canal Zone, and if the Panama Steamship Line in operating its vessels is denied the right to take on cargo at ports other than the Canal Zone and the Haitian ports, if it is denied the right to transfer cargoes with the Chilean Line and the Peruvian Line, the Panama Steamship Line will have to greatly increase rates for carrying supplies to the Panama Canal Zone.

In addition to that, the Panama Steamship Line is now operating vessels between the Canal Zone and certain Colombian ports, the principal cargo being cattle transported to the Canal Zone and consumed by the inhabitants of the Canal Zone who are Government employees. If this arrangement is disturbed, if the Government be denied by the law of Congress the right to transport necessary foodstuffs, these meat products, from Colombia to the Canal Zone, if they are secured at all they likely will have to be carried at enormously increased rates in foreign bottoms.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON. I take pleasure in yielding.

Mr. NUGENT. The matter which the Senator from Arkansas is discussing is one of prime importance, it seems to me. I will ask the Senator if he will yield in order that I may suggest the absence of a quorum, as I believe that it is highly advisable that absent Senators know something of the argument that is being advanced by the Senator from Arkansas in opposition to the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator from Idaho does me great honor when he suggests that Senators now absent would remain if they responded, but if the Senator from Idaho thinks that it will secure a better hearing and thinks the argument I am now making is of sufficient importance to justify it, I yield to him to make the test.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names.

Ball	Johnson, Calif.	McNary	Simmons
Calder	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Capper	Jones, Wash.	New	Smoot
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Norris	Swanson
Curtis	Kendrick	Nugent	Thomas
Dillingham	Kenyon	Overman	Trammell
Edge	Keyes	Page	Underwood
Gronna	Lenroot	Phelan	Williams
Hale	Lodge	Ransdell
Harding	McCormick	Robinson
Harris	McLean	Sheppard

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-one Senators have answered the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the roll of absentees.

The Reading Clerk called the names of absent Senators, and Mr. McKELLAR, Mr. PITTMAN, and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

Mr. KING entered the Chamber in answer to his name.

Mr. KING. I wish to announce that the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] is serving upon a subcommittee of the Committee on the Judiciary, and is unavoidably detained.

Mr. FRANCE, Mr. STANLEY, Mr. WARREN, Mr. McCUMBER, and Mr. KNOX entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Arkansas will proceed.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, I will not repeat in detail the statement which I made prior to the suggestion of the absence of a quorum, but, for the benefit of Senators who have come in, will point out the fact that the amendment now under consideration, submitted by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] provides—

> Unless the board shall approve and by formal order so authorize, no vessel owned or operated by the Panama Railroad Co. shall be operated commercially in the transportation for hire of persons or property, except between ports of the United States, Haiti, and the Panama Canal, in competition with vessels of the board or with vessels of the United States wholly owned or operated by citizens of the United States.

I have already stated something of the history of this subject and pointed out the fact that the adoption of this amendment by Congress means practically the elimination of vessels bearing the American flag from the carrying trade between the ports of this country and those of Central and South America. It is the policy of the Shipping Board that steamers owned or controlled by the Government shall not compete with steamers owned and operated by individuals and corporations and that the general policy of the Government should be to get out of the steamship business and turn it over to individuals and corporations. Whether we approve or disapprove of the general policy of the Shipping Board as just stated, it will be fatal to American interests, that ought to be conserved, to adopt the amendment of the Senator from New York.

I have already pointed out the fact that the United States can not compete with foreign vessels in carrying supplies from the Canal Zone to the United States or from the United States to the Canal Zone, if this provision goes into effect, because the Panama Steamship Line vessels will be substantially denied the opportunity of taking return cargoes, very little cargo originating in the Canal Zone. Haitian cargo, while considerable, and increasing, is insufficient to afford adequate return cargoes for the ships of the Panama Steamship Line.

There is another vice in this amendment that goes to the very bottom of the question. South America is beginning a period of development. The United States now has an opportunity of developing a great trade with various Central American and South American ports. In a measure designed to reestablish the American merchant marine, in a measure designed to restore the American flag to the seas, it is proposed to adopt an amendment which will deprive American vessels now in operation of the right to engage in the South American trade, and which, whether designed for that purpose or not, will have the effect of placing shipping between South American ports and ports in the United States under the British and the Dutch flags. Let Senators dare stand for such a policy!

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I have a great deal of sympathy with the purpose the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] desires to accomplish, as stated by him yesterday—that is, to prevent a Government agency from competing with private service in the same line of business in connection with shipping along the same route—but I think it would be unwise to adopt the amendment at this time.

The problem, as the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] has pointed out, is quite a broad one and is rather complicated. While the amendment is quite simple and plain in its terms, its effect might be different from what we expect. I can not see any reason why the Shipping Board and the Panama Steamship Co. or the War Department can not get together now without any legislation and work for the accomplishment of the end that I am sure both of them desire.

I have here the statement from the War Department to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred. I think they present a very strong showing as to the need for very positive action upon the part of the Government. The trade of the Caribbean and of the South American countries is a very important one, and it is one that we ought very largely to have. If we can not get it through private enterprise, I am in favor of using Government agencies to get it and to hold it. I know that the Dutch lines and the English lines will strive to the utmost to get that trade, and I think there is much basis for the fears expressed by the War Department in its memorandum.

What I want to see is the War Department and the Shipping Board working together with the determination to hold that trade for this country, either through private enterprise or through Government agencies. I think they can work it out under present legislation and under the bill which we have pending, if we pass it; but, in my opinion, it would be unwise to try to deal with this proposition on this bill at this time here on the floor of the Senate without having all the facts and without having heard either of the Government agencies or the private parties with reference to the particular matter.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I can not permit the remarks of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to go unchallenged. He intimated that this amendment was in the interest of foreign shipping. He did not suggest that that was my purpose in offering it, but that was the only deduction one could draw from his statement.

I introduced the amendment after consultation with the representatives of four American-owned shipping companies operating in the Caribbean and to South American ports. Two of those companies operating Shipping Board vessels and the two others operating ships flying the American flag have, after a great struggle, built up a business on the Isthmus and in the northern ports of South America, and just now are arriving at a time when their business is profitable.

The amendment which I offered yesterday would have prevented the Panama Steamship Co. from extending its lines beyond the Panama Canal Zone. I did not then know that the vessels of this company made regular stops at ports in Haiti, and that they had built up a considerable traffic there since the war began. When I discovered this I agreed to change my amendment so as to permit the continuation of the service to Haiti.

Mr. President, the Panama Railroad Co. operates these vessels, and the Panama Railroad Co. is owned by the United States Government. This shipping line was in operation, in part, before we took over the Panama Canal property nearly 20 years ago. It has been continued since then to supply Government needs on the Isthmus and to carry freight and passengers, both of a public and private character, to and from the Isthmus. It has not until recently sought to engage in competition with privately owned and operated American steamship lines; but now, in opposition to another Government function, namely, the Shipping Board, which was created for the purpose of expanding and developing our commercial shipping, in opposition to their views and position in this matter, it proposes to compete out of its own natural field.

When this bill was under consideration the Shipping Board suggested the propriety of having the entire maritime business of the Panama Railroad Co. turned over to that board. The Committee on Commerce refused to permit this to be done, and I concurred in that action, because of the fact that this line was being efficiently managed, and besides the interests of the Government on the Isthmus were so great that the committee believed we should not experiment by change of control; but the committee had no idea that this Government owned and operated line would attempt to enter into competition with private enterprise or the Shipping Board in this manner.

Mr. President, the four American lines—I am going to put their names in the RECORD again, because the Senator from Arkansas refers to a Dutch line and some other foreign lines—the four American companies operating to the Isthmus of Panama and to Colombian and other northern ports of South America are the United Fruit Co., the Caribbean Steamship Co., the Tropical Steamship Corporation, and the Columbus Steamship Corporation.

After introducing my amendment yesterday and observing that there was objection to it I conferred with the Shipping Board, and I have here a letter written to me by the board, which I desire to read:

> A substitute draft of amendment is submitted which I think takes care of the situation, and takes care of the objection that we should stop the United States from operating its own vessels simply because some other established line was in competition.
> There seems to be a desire on the part of the Government departments to extend their commercial operations in competition with the Shipping Board and private operating companies. By giving the Shipping Board the power to determine whether or not they shall operate commercially on a given route this matter may be controlled, and we may ultimately bring the situation back to where it belongs, which is to have the boats in the hands of the private operators on a well-established route, in accordance with the general policies of the bill. Unless this is done, the board will undoubtedly be handicapped in its effort to sell these vessels to private operators and in the establishment of these new routes which are authorized by the bill.

Under the terms of my amendment the Shipping Board may authorize the Panama Railroad Co. to engage in trade with any port in South America it cares to. The course proposed by the amendment, it seems to me, is the proper one; it places the control of this matter completely in the hands of the Shipping Board, the one department of the Government where it should naturally be, and prevents a situation where different departments roam all over the world in establishing routes and competing with each other and with private American interests.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. I yield.

Mr. EDGE. Along the line of the reasoning of the Senator from New York, my attention has been drawn to an amendment in the Army appropriation bill, which has been reported to the Senate and is now pending on the calendar. That amendment is as follows:

Provided further, That hereafter when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, accommodations are available, transportation on Army transports may be provided for the members and employees of the Porto Rican Government and their families without expense to the United States.

The following proviso, however, is the one to which I desire to direct particular attention:

Provided further, That in the discretion of the Secretary of War, and when space is available, civilian passengers and shipments of commercial cargo may be transported on Army transports at rates not less than those charged by commercial steamship companies, between the same ports, for the same class of accommodations, the receipts from which shall be covered in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

That provision simply demonstrates the point the Senator is making, that we apparently have competition between two departments of the Government—the War Department and the Shipping Board, to the latter of which we are trying now to turn over the development of our merchant marine. The proviso now pending in the Army appropriation bill shows very plainly that the Government is directly in competition with the American steamship companies running to the same ports.

Mr. CALDER. It seems to me, Mr. President, that this amendment is so safeguarded as to protect every American interest and that there ought not to be any objection to it.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] bases his support of this proposition upon the ground that United States owned vessels ought not to be permitted to compete with vessels privately owned. With singular inconsistency, as it seems to me, he has modified his amendment so as to recognize the right of the Panama Steamship Co.'s vessels to compete with privately owned vessels for the Haitian trade and the Canal Zone trade.

I pointed out a while ago the fact that unless the existing arrangement is continued, the arrangement in force between the Panama Steamship Line, the Peruvian Line, and the Chilean Line, by which transfers of cargo are made and by which the Panama Steamship Line acquires cargoes originating in South America for New York and other ports, the Panama Steamship Line vessels will be unable to compete or to participate in the South American trade. The only two companies now engaging in the Haitian trade are the Dutch Line and the Raporel Line. The Raporel Line, as I showed a while ago, can not continue in that trade under present conditions; so that if the original amendment of the Senator from New York had been adopted the Haitian trade would have passed entirely from under the United States flag.

But, Mr. President, to show you further the vice in the proposition that the Senator presented here, at the instance of so-called American shipowners, Haiti is now without adequate transportation facilities. I stood on the dock at Port au Prince not 30 days ago and saw a thousand tons of cargo waiting for shipment. It had been waiting for a very long time.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ROBINSON. I yield.

Mr. CALDER. A friend of mine who is in the shipping business told me the other day that he has a cargo of freight waiting on the docks of San Francisco, and that it will have to wait 40 days before he can obtain transportation for it.

Mr. ROBINSON. And I suppose the Senator from New York, with that peculiar consistency which characterizes his conduct in presenting this amendment, would advocate that some of the ships that are now engaged in carrying cargoes from San Francisco should be excluded from the privilege of doing so in the interests of trade.

Mr. CALDER. Why, of course I do not advocate that, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON. The illustration which the Senator from New York has made demonstrates irresistibly the conclusion that at this time the United States ought not to deny itself the use of any existing facility that will tend to promote and stimulate trade relations between the United States and Central and South America; for just as surely, Mr. President, as you are now presiding over the deliberations of this body that trade is rapidly passing under the control of the British flag and the Dutch flag.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER].

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I desire to inquire whether or not section 11 of the committee amendment has been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has been agreed to.

Mr. NUGENT. I ask unanimous consent that the vote be reconsidered by which section 11 of the committee amendment was agreed to. I make that request for the purpose of presenting an amendment to the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, that amendment was discussed at considerable length. I do not like to refuse the Senator's request, and yet the amendment was discussed at considerable length, and it was finally adopted after discussion.

As I say, I do not like to refuse; and yet this bill has been pending so long that I should like to get through with it one way or the other.

Mr. NUGENT. I will say to the Senator that the amendments which I desire to present will, so far as I am concerned, entail very little discussion.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are they amendments to this amendment?

Mr. NUGENT. To section 11.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course the section will be open to amendment generally if it is up, and it will be open to amendment in the Senate. When the bill gets into the Senate, the Senator could propose these amendments without any reconsideration.

Mr. NUGENT. I am well aware of that fact, but I thought it would not make any material difference. I do not propose to make another speech with respect to the same matter in the Senate, and I thought it might be advisable to dispose of the entire matter in Committee of the Whole, as far as I am concerned.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Well, Mr. President, I hope it will not engage us in two or three days' further discussion. I shall not object to the Senator's request.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. NUGENT. I move to amend, on page 16, line 5, by striking out "4" and inserting "5½."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 16, line 5, in the committee amendment, before the words "per cent per annum," it is proposed to strike out "4" and insert "5½," so that, if amended, it will read:

Interest on loans made under this section and on deferred payments shall be at a rate not less than 5½ per cent per annum, payable semi-annually.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I shall not object to that amendment, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NUGENT. Now, Mr. President, on page 15, line 24, I move to strike out the word "private" and insert the word "Government."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Before the word "shipyards," on line 24, page 15, it is proposed to strike out the word "private" and insert the word "Government," so that, if amended, it will read:

If there are routes upon which the board deems it highly important to establish service requiring vessels of the kind described in this section, and responsible persons, citizens of the United States, can not be found to construct the same the board may construct such vessels out of such fund in Government shipyards in the United States.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I am willing to have that amendment come to a vote. We want to encourage our private shipyards, I think, as much as possible, and we do not want to continue in the Government shipbuilding business. We tried that during the war, and we want to get out of it.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, one of the principal reasons assigned by the proponents of this measure for its enactment into law is the necessity for taking the Government out of business, particularly the business of constructing and operating ships; and one of the means they have provided for the accomplishment of that object is to place the Government in the money-lending business. I shall not comment on the inconsistency shown by them.

Section 11 provides:

That during a period of five years from the enactment of this act the board may annually set aside out of the revenues from sales and operations a sum not exceeding $50,000,000, to be known as its construction fund, to be used in the construction, or in aid of the construction, of vessels of the best and most efficient type for the establishment and maintenance of service on steamship lines deemed desirable and necessary by the board, and such vessels shall be equipped with the most modern, the most efficient, and the most economical machinery and commercial appliances.

It provides further:

The board shall use such fund to the extent required upon such terms as the board may prescribe to aid persons, citizens of the United States, in the construction by them in private shipyards in the United States of the foregoing class of vessels. No aid shall be for a greater sum than two-thirds of the cost of the vessel or vessels to be constructed, and the board shall require such security, including a first lien upon the entire interest in the vessel or vessels so constructed, as it shall deem necessary to insure the repayment of such sum with interest thereon and the maintenance of the service for which such vessel or vessels are built.

Furthermore:

If there are routes upon which the board deems it highly important to establish service requiring vessels of the kind described in this section, and responsible persons, citizens of the United States, can not be found to construct the same, the board may construct such vessels out of such fund in private shipyards in the United States.

Mr. President, the latter part of that section provides that when a private citizen can not be found who will construct the type of vessels required for certain trade routes, the Government itself, acting through the board, shall construct such vessels in private shipyards. I do not believe that that is the proper thing to do. The people of the country have expended in the neighborhood of $170,000,000 in the construction of shipyards within which to construct ships to be operated by the Shipping Board; and I hold the opinion that whenever it becomes necessary for the Shipping Board, a Government board, to construct ships for the Government with Government funds, those ships should be constructed in Government yards.

While I do not profess to know anything in respect to the matter, I very naturally assume that it is the intention of at least certain of the gentlemen who are earnestly and enthusiastically supporting this bill to put the Government shipyards out of commission; and, as I view it, there can be no reason and no object for requiring the construction with Government funds in a private yard of Government ships, to be operated by the Government, other than to give to the owner of such yard a very considerable profit for doing the work that could be done in a Government shipyard probably at a much lower cost.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, usually I am in accord with the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] on the matters arising under this bill, but I do not think the Senator from Idaho understands, as I do, what will be done with these ships when they are constructed.

The whole purpose of this bill, even as to the construction of new ships, is that they shall be immediately sold to private parties, provided, of course, they will operate them upon such routes as may be determined by the Shipping Board. That being so, I am not in favor of the Government going into any further construction of ships at all. If the Government were going to operate the ships for an indefinite period of time, as the Senator from Idaho assumes, I might feel very differently about it; but the whole purpose of this bill is to put all ships into private operation, not only those which have been constructed, but those which may be hereafter constructed at the expense of the Government. That being so, I am opposed to any further Government construction at all.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. NUGENT. I am in entire accord with the views just expressed by the Senator from Wisconsin with respect to this measure. I am thoroughly satisfied that he is entirely right. I have entertained that idea from the very moment that I read this bill. I am absolutely convinced that the purpose of this bill—in fact, it is so declared—is to dispose of all of these ships to private interests at the earliest possible moment, and I venture now to assert that when the operations of the Shipping Board are finally concluded it will be found that the magnificent fleet of approximately 2,300 vessels, which have been or are being constructed by the Government at an expense to the people of the United States of more than $3,000,000,000, will have been transferred to private shipping interests at a loss to the people of at least a thousand millions of dollars. My amendment was presented solely for the purpose of endeavoring to save a little more out of the wreck that is bound to come, as I believe that the ships can be constructed in a Government yard for a lower price than they can be constructed in a private yard, where, in addition to the actual cost of the material and labor that go into the construction of the vessel, a profit, as a matter of course, must be made by the proprietor of the yard.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, unfortunately I think that all of the history shows that there has been no construction of ships in Government yards except at a very excessive cost. It is true there has been construction in private yards at a very excessive cost, also, but that was the fault of the Shipping Board in allowing excessive prices to private shipyards. But the point I want to make is that the bill, as it now stands, authorizes the Shipping Board to expend $50,000,000 a year in new construction, and the moment the ship comes off the ways to sell it at a loss to private individuals.

Mr. NUGENT. But, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption, the Shipping Board is required by this very section, whenever in its judgment it is advisable so to do, to build ships for operation on a certain route. It is directed to do it. So we must take our choice between the construction of those ships in a private shipyard and their construction in a Government shipyard.

Mr. LENROOT. My point is that I would prefer to see stricken out of this section 11 any authority for the Shipping Board to construct any ships whatever on Government account. If we are to aid in the building of ships, I would prefer that the Government aid only through loans for a portion of the value of the ship, so that the Government will have a lien on the ship, which, presumably, when it is launched will be of equal value to the ship, and without any resulting loss to the Government from the building of those ships.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think that this provision found in the beginning of section 11 is very pernicious and will work very disadvantageously to the people of the United States? I read:

That during a period of five years from the enactment of this act the board may annually set aside out of the revenues from sales and operations a sum not exceeding $50,000,000, to be known as its construction fund, to be used in the construction, or in aid of the construction, of vessels.

In other words, they may sell boats and take the money derived from the sale, or take the money derived from the operation and construction of new boats from year to year up to the extent of $50,000,000, the aim apparently being to perpetuate the Government in this expensive and inefficient business of constructing boats. If the Senator does not tender a motion, I shall move to strike out the entire section later on.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in so far as the establishment of new lines is concerned, the fact is that our present fleet is not in all respects of such a character as will make profitable the establishment of new lines. In other words, undoubtedly there are ships of a certain design or character which are necessary to balance up any fleet that might be established upon a given line. If the Government is going to aid in the establishment of such lines, the whole theory of the Senate substitute being that of private ownership and private operation, I prefer to have the Government do it by a loan of not exceeding two-thirds the value of the construction, rather than to have the Government take this $50,000,000 a year out of the sales of ships which have been sold at a great loss, and then build new ships and sell those ships at another great loss, and so continue on indefinitely.

Without this provision for Government construction it would be fair to say that the Government would not lose a dollar, because its equity would be two-thirds of the cost of the ship. But with this provision for Government construction, no private shipowner is going to build a ship on his own account if he thinks the Government will build it for him, stand itself the carrying of the entire capital cost, and when the ship is launched probably sell it for less than it cost the Government.

There is no inducement to a private shipowner to build private ships in an American shipyard with a provision of that kind staring him in the face.

So, Mr. President, I had in mind, although I had expected to wait until the bill got into the Senate, to strike out from the provisions of the bill all authority for construction directly by the Shipping Board. If the Senator from Washington feels that this was opened up solely for the purpose of permitting the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] to offer his amendment, I will not offer the amendment now, but wait until we get into the Senate. Otherwise I would be glad to offer it at this time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Idaho to the committee amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, just a brief word. I had intended offering an amendment to the section relating to the hard and fast conditions of sale, which I discussed at some length in the Chamber a few days ago, and also a further amendment relating to the provision establishing American ownership, compelling 100 per cent American ownership, which I consider entirely unworkable. But in my short experience in the Senate I have about decided, with the few Senators who generally attend and give consideration to these detailed amendments, of great importance in many cases, that we really proceed with more expectation of final satisfactory results when we refer matters of that kind to the conference rather than attempt to decide them in the Senate.

So I am not going to offer those amendments, feeling that if the bill is finally passed the conferees of the two Houses, realizing that the Senate bill under consideration is in its entirety an amendment, the House bill having been stricken out in its entirety, will give consideration to such questions as we have discussed and debated on the floor of the Senate, and from the conference will be evolved a real workable measure.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator think he is making a mistake in carrying that suggestion too far? It may be that the conferees without having their attention directly challenged by an amendment having been made upon the floor of the Senate may overlook when they get to conference the point in issue. I suggest to the Senator, if he will pardon me, that if he has any important amendment to offer he should challenge the attention of the Senate to it, so that the conferees will have the RECORD before them and know what the points were in favor of or against the amendment which was suggested.

Mr. EDGE. I consider the suggestion of the Senator from Utah to be a very pertinent and a very proper one, but the two matters are still contained in the bill, which appeal to me as being of extreme importance, the two I have already suggested. One is the hard and fast rule relating to sales, under which I think without further consideration or change it would mean that we would have a permanently owned merchant marine. I have discussed that at length on the floor of the Senate, and certainly that will be brought to the attention of the conferees. The other matter, stock ownership, is also in my judgment absolutely indefensible, because unenforceable, and I feel that it will likewise be given consideration by the conference.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator permit me to ask him who is going to bring those matters to the attention of the conferees? The Senator speaks of certain measures discussed here before the Senate, and I am curious to know who is going to bring them to the attention of the conferees.

Mr. EDGE. I think the Senator from Michigan is quite aware of the matters which have been discussed in the Senate, and which form a portion of the bill under consideration. If passed by the Senate, they will naturally be considered by the conferees. It is hardly necessary for me to go into a detailed explanation as to how that will be done; it will naturally be done. If it is not done, when the bill comes before the Senate on the conference report we will still have an opportunity, if the bill in our judgment is unworkable, to express our opposition to it at that time.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Both propositions are in the bill now, and will, of course, be a part of the consideration of the conferees.

Mr. EDGE. I would assume that the conferees must consider these matters, as the Senator from Washington has naturally suggested, because they form a very important part of the bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I assumed, from what the Senator said, that he was detailing certain amendments which he thought were essential to the bill, and which would be considered probably by the conferees.

Mr. EDGE. The Senator is entirely correct.

Mr. TOWNSEND. My understanding is that we have a very wholesome rule in the Senate, which is always enforced when attention is called to it, that the conferees have no right to insert into a bill matters of legislation which were not enacted by either House. If the amendments sought to be suggested by the Senator change the bill, I maintain that the conferees would have no right to consider them in conference.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I understand it, the amendments which we are discussing are wholly new matters, and it has been held over and over again that when it is entirely new matter which goes into conference, the whole subject is open to the conference for anything relevant.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I do not agree with the Senator that that has been the holding of the Senate.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, it has been held again and again that when all is stricken out after the enacting clause, and a new bill is put in, both bills are before the conferees.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that both amendments the Senator from New Jersey has in mind are in the bill. We have an amendment in the bill which requires the entire ownership of the stock of the corporations to be American owned. The Senator from New Jersey does not think we ought to go that far. He thinks it should be 80 or 85 or 90 per cent. I submit that that whole proposition will be in conference on the amendment in the bill. Then, with reference to the other provision we have put in the bill, a proviso as an amendment, which the Senator from New Jersey thinks is too restrictive. That will be a subject of conference between the two Houses. It is an amendment put into the bill by the Senate already. The Senator from New Jersey wants to modify it and make it not quite so restrictive.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I realize that, but I know of no one who could raise the point except the House conferees. I am assuming that it is the duty of the Senate conferees to stand by the action of the Senate unless the House has a different provision, and a controversy is brought up. I do not agree with the statement made by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the rule permits what he has stated. Within the last year or two that very question has been raised repeatedly, and the opposite has been decided. I simply raised it, not knowing exactly what the Senator from New Jersey suggested, but suppose he wanted some amendment made which was material to the bill, which changed the bill; I can think of no one who could raise that point before the conference.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Michigan for his lucid explanation, and I presume he is entirely correct. I am perfectly frank to admit that I am not particularly well versed in the rules governing conferences, but I have been impressed, especially during the consideration of this bill, with the great loss of time in trying to reach conclusions. I revere the traditions of the Senate, and the fact that Senators believe in great deliberation. Perhaps I am becoming somewhat innoculated with the germ myself. But, at the same time, we must recognize that the pending measure is one of the most important we have to consider.

I have understood, and the various explanations made have not greatly changed the viewpoint I have, that the amendments suggested by the Senate committee, if adopted by the Senate, being an entire change from the bill as sent over by the House, the question must naturally be raised between the conferees representing the two Houses, as to whether they would be agreed to or not, which brings up to a great extent the different points involved in the various sections.

Solely in the interest of saving time, whether that is subject to indorsement or appreciation or not, and bringing the bill into conference, I am refraining from suggesting amendments which would probably extend the debate for several days, feeling reasonably sure that the conference committee, representing the Commerce Committee of the Senate and the Merchant Marine and Fisheries Committee of the House, will try to round out of this measure a workable measure. After all is said and done, that is all the American people want, and if we can save 48 hours near the end of the session I hope that will be done. I really think I am trying more to help solve the problem than in taking the time of the Senate for two or three days in further discussion.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, when I made the statement that I did I was not unmindful of the Curtis rule. I was stating the old general practice. I know the Curtis rule has restricted it, but I still think that I am right in my proposition that where there is great distinction, where the whole matter is put before the conferees, they have a much larger latitude than when it is simply a change of the original text. I think they have a much larger latitude. I made the statement simply because I confess I feel some sympathy with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] in his most unappreciated effort to save time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understood the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE], one of the points to which he directed attention was that involved in section 11, which authorizes the sale of vessels and the utilization of the funds derived therefrom in the construction of new vessels by the board. Having that point in view—and I understand the Senator very briefly alluded to it a few days ago in his discussion, and coinciding with the view—I move to strike out, on page 15, in line 1, the words "sales and," so that it will read——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I thought section 11 had been agreed to.

Mr. KING. I understood it had been reopened for the purpose of considering the amendment offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], and I did not understand that there was any limitation upon the amendments which might be offered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was disposed of, and then the committee amendment as amended was agreed to again.

Mr. KING. I was waiting to offer my amendment and I did not hear the statement by the Chair. I ask that the vote by which the amendment was agreed to may be reconsidered and the matter reopened for the purpose of submitting further amendments. I was waiting for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. It is reconsidered again.

Mr. KING. I now move to amend by striking out, on line 1, page 15, the words "sales and," so that as amended the section will read:

That during a period of five years from the enactment of this act the board may annually set aside out of the revenues from operations a sum not exceeding $50,000,000—

And so forth.

The purpose of the amendment is to deny to the board what the section grants, the right to sell boats without limitation and the utilization of funds derived therefrom up to the extent of $50,000,000 each year for the construction of new ships. Personally I am opposed to the employment of the funds derived from the sale of ships in the building of more ships, because, as the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] pointed out, the board will construct ships and sell them at a loss, because the price of vessels will decline and the Government can not build as cheaply as private persons can, and the latter will establish the market price for ships, and then the funds derived from sales will be reinvested in new boats and those sold at a loss, until finally that particular fund will be exhausted. It will be extinguished absolutely, and the board will perpetuate itself as a constructing and selling agency until the vast fund committed to its care will be dissipated.

It seems to me we are going far enough to satisfy when we permit the utilization of the funds derived from operations for the construction of new ships. I am opposed to the board engaging in further construction, because, as everybody knows, they can not begin to compete with private persons engaged in the construction of vessels. There will be waste and inefficiency, I do not care what the personnel of the board may be or the limitations and restrictions which by law may be imposed upon its activities. Whatever the Government agencies undertake, whatever this agency and instrumentality may undertake, it will be inefficiently managed and extravagantly operated. I think that this board ought, at the very earliest possible moment, at a period not more than 5 years from the date of the passage of the bill, be compelled to terminate all of its business, wind up its business, dispose of the ships which have been constructed, and go out of business, and permit private capital and private enterprise to own and operate the ships of our country.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I am in thorough accord with the suggestion made by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] that the Government should go out of the business as rapidly as it is possible to do so, giving due regard to the great assets that they now have in their hands, but I do not think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Utah will meet the situation as well as the one relating to the same section suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], which he intends to offer when the bill is in the Senate. In striking out the words "sales and," as I understand the Senator's amendment, he is still permitting the Shipping Board to spend $50,000,000, or any part of it, that they may collect from operations, and does not in any way deter them from building ships on Government account.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. EDGE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I propose to follow the amendment which I have just offered by tendering another, which is to strike out, in line 3, page 15, the words "in the construction or," so that the section as finally amended in those lines to which I am now directing attention would read:

Of the revenues from operations a sum not exceeding $50,000,000, to be known as its construction fund, to be used in aid of the construction of vessels of the best and most efficient type—

And so forth.

Mr. EDGE. I am entirely in accord with that amendment. It would require a further change in the latter part of the section.

Mr. KING. Yes; I have the further amendment, if these should prevail, to strike out lines 19 to 25 on page 15 and lines 1 to 6 on page 16.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if every Senator had everything just as he wanted it in connection with this bill, we would have no bill at all, and we never would get any legislation with reference to a merchant marine. The committee have considered these various matters from almost every angle and harmonized our differences as much as we could, and we have thought this was the wise thing to do.

I am not going into a discussion of the proposition again at this time. I am satisfied that the Government will never lose a cent out of it. I doubt if the Government will ever build a ship under it. I believe private parties may be aided and may build ships that are necessary, but this is one of the most important sections in the bill. It means the balancing of the American fleet and putting it in form and shape and furnishing it with ships that will compete with the modern, up-to-date ships of our competitors. It is for the purpose of constructing such ships, for the establishment of particular lines that we should have. It is framed upon the theory of first aiding private parties to do it, and if there are important lines that should be established that private parties will not establish, then, if necessary, the Government will build the ships. In my judgment the Government will not lose a cent on the ships that it builds, if it builds any.

I hope the amendment of the Senator from Utah will be rejected.

On a division, Mr. KING's amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move to amend by striking out, in line 3, page 15, the words "in the construction or."

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I think this amendment ought to be adopted. I do not believe that we should expend Government money in the future in the construction of ships, those ships to be immediately sold at a loss. That is the inevitable consequence of the adoption of the original amendment as reported by the committee.

The history of the construction of Government ships in the past does not warrant the Senate in authorizing any further construction of Government ships at the hands of the Shipping Board. I very freely admit that the Shipping Board as now constituted is a very much better business institution than the board which existed during the construction of these ships, but we are not authorized, it seems to me, to expend $250,000,000 of the money of the people of the United States in the building of these ships when immediately upon their launching they are to be sold to private parties at a loss.

The selling at a loss of ships already in existence, of course, is fully justified by reason of the circumstances attending their construction. If they are to be sold at all, they must be sold at a loss; but there would only be one justification for the Government continuing a shipbuilding program at its own expense, and that is if it is to operate the ships that it builds. But for the Government to spend $50,000,000 a year in building new ships and then immediately to sell those new ships at a loss can not be justified. There will be no private shipbuilding in private yards so long as they can look to the Government to build ships in the future, and buy exactly the kind of ships they desire, and buy them at a less cost than they cost the Government itself.

So I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Government is not required to sell these ships immediately if it builds them. The Government will build the ships no doubt for a special line. It is the very purpose of the bill to have them built for a special service. If private parties can be gotten who will buy these ships and put them in that line of business at once, well and good. The board certainly will not sell ships at a loss in that case, but if private parties will not buy the ships on fair terms, then the Government will operate the ships on those lines and establish those routes, and that is one of the great things we want. I hope the amendment will be defeated.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, again may I state that I made a particular effort to get the bill into the hands of the conferees; but inasmuch as this very important phase of the bill under consideration has been brought up, I think it merits very careful consideration and discussion and debate.

One part of the section unquestionably nullifies the other part. As has been partly brought out by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], certainly no shipping concern will borrow money from the United States to build ships and pay interest upon the investment, now not less than 5½ per cent by the amendment just agreed to, offered by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT], when the Government agrees practically under the same section to build ships, entirely on its own account, from its own income from operation of sales, if private interests do not build them for them. My judgment has been that there could be absolutely no reason why the Government should not loan its credit—in other words, loan the money on proper security, the ship itself—in order to stimulate the building of necessary ships.

Is not the argument of the Senator from Washington answered in this way? If the ships can be operated at a profit, then in the natural, general development of the merchant marine private interests will be glad to take advantage of the two-thirds advance from the Government to build such ships. If they can not be maintained and operated at a profit, certainly the time has arrived when the Government should cease operating additional ships, knowing perfectly well that to do so will mean that much additional loss to the taxpayers of the country.

I have full sympathy with the underlying thought of the Senator from Washington to develop a merchant marine, and even, to some extent, perhaps, to accept some losses; but we now have the ships; we are in a position, with goods to be exported from our country, naturally to have cargoes under proper financial conditions. We have men representing the various seaboard sections of our country engaged in the shipping business, men who have studied it for years, who know where profits can be obtained by developing trade, and it seems to me that they should be given the opportunity, for I entirely misinterpret the views of the people of this country if they want the Government to continue the building and operation of ships. I think they are determined and anxious to-day to have the Government get out of the business at the earliest possible moment. We shall not get out of the business when we are directly announcing a policy through this section of the bill that we will build any ships for five years that private capital will not build, when at the same time we are ready to loan private capital two-thirds of the amount which is necessary to build them. The answer is we will be continually building ships.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] has stated that inasmuch as the general policy of the bill is to ultimately get out of the business, we must sell the ships at what will be comparatively a loss. I really feel that the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is timely and will help to carry out the very intent, as I understand it, of the bill, and permit the Government as rapidly as good business will allow to get out of the business.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to say just a word, because I consider this one of the most important provisions of the bill and designed to accomplish one of its most essential purposes. The bill is framed on the theory of getting the Government out of the shipbuilding and shipowning business, but it is not framed on the theory of getting the Government out of the shipbuilding and shipowning business at an undue sacrifice. I am just about as strongly opposed to that as is the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT]. We have tried to frame the bill in such a way as clearly to indicate to the Shipping Board that it is not the purpose of the bill, that it is not the intention of Congress, that they should sacrifice the interests of the people of the country in these ships simply to get them into private hands. We are not in favor of that. We do feel, however, that the people of the country want these ships ultimately to go into private hands; that that is the best way to build up and maintain an American merchant marine; but we realize that this shipping belongs to the Government. The situation confronting us is not like the railroad situation, for the railroads belonged to private parties and the Government simply had possession of them, and of course we should turn them back as soon as possible. The Shipping Board fleet is the Government's property; it is not necessary to sacrifice it purely for the purpose of getting it into private hands; the committee is not in favor of doing it, and this bill is not framed on the theory of doing it.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. That is precisely the proposition of which I am complaining. This fleet belongs to the people; it was constructed at a cost to them of more than $3,000,000,000; and it is conceded by many that it will be disposed of at a very much less price than it cost.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have not conceded that.

Mr. NUGENT. I will ask the Senator now if he does not believe that under the provisions of the bill the ships will be sold for a very much lower price than they cost?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; not by virtue of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. NUGENT. The fact remains, however, that the ships are now being operated by the Government at a profit; the fact remains that they were operated at a profit of more than $166,000,000 up to the 30th day of last June; and I, for one, most strenuously and earnestly protest against their sale to private interests at a loss of between $750,000,000 and $1,000,000,000 of the people's money, and that loss will certainly be sustained if the pending measure is enacted into law.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we discussed that matter the other day. These ships really are not operating at a profit according to ordinary and usual methods of computing such matters. The amount that the Senator refers to is found simply by computing the difference between cash receipts and cash expenditures. It does not take into account depreciation, interest, or anything of that sort, which must be considered in determining real profit and loss. I am not going into that, however, Mr. President.

What we desire in this bill and what we provide is for the sale of these ships in a way that a prudent business man not forced to get rid of his property would do it. We hedge it about with further limitations. One of the limitations is what the Senator from New Jersey complains of, and says that it means perpetual ownership. Then the Senator from Idaho says we will dispose of them absolutely. As a matter of fact, if the Shipping Board realizes the purpose and intent of the bill, it will get every dollar that a prudent business man, who did not desire to keep a property of this kind in his hands perpetually, would get out of it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say a few words; I do not desire to interrupt the Senator from Washington.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Very well.

I desire to recur to the section under consideration. I am not going to open up the whole bill, although I am sometimes tempted, of course, in view of statements which are made, to discuss various matters which are involved, but we have gone over them time and again, and I am not going to do so any more. However, with reference to the pending section of the bill providing for this fund, the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from New Jersey are in favor of using the Government money as a loan to private parties with which to build ships.

Mr. President, I am in favor of that; but I am in favor also, when the Government agency says there is a highly important route which should be established and private enterprise will not take the risk of developing the business and suffering a loss, when the Government feels that such route should be developed and that it will be to the interest of our commerce to have it developed, then I am in favor of using the money of the Government to build ships to perform that great Government work. I think it will be a wise thing for the Government to take such action, and I can not see justification for using the people's money as a loan to private parties to build ships when the Government would be prohibited from doing what it considers a highly desirable thing in the building of ships—to develop trade and establish new routes. It is not required to sell its ships immediately; it will put them on desirable routes and develop the business, and then it will sell the ships, and, in my judgment, will get every dollar out of them that it has put in and, in addition, will build up the trade of this country and establish the American merchant marine upon a permanent basis. I hope that the amendment of the Senator from Utah will be defeated.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I am as utterly opposed to Government ownership and Government shipbuilding as anyone can possibly be. If I had my way, to do exactly what I wanted by a stroke of the pen, I would stop the whole Shipping Board business now. There has been a vast expenditure of Government money; the waste has been colossal, and there has been any amount of mismanagement; but we have all of this property on our hands, and we want to secure some legislation to deal with it. We can not any of us get exactly what we want, and perhaps it is not best that we should; but I believe that the committee—and their report is a unanimous one, as I understand—have reached the best possible solution and one which affords the greatest opportunity to preserve to the taxpayers of the country what can be preserved from the huge expenditure which has been made. It also puts some limit on our continuance in the business. It is the only practicable method that has been offered dealing with the question, and that is the reason why I shall vote for it, although I am utterly against Government ownership.

If anyone desires a lesson of what Government shipbuilding means, he has but to study the history of the Shipping Board.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I appreciate the enormous difficulties the committee encountered in dealing with this subject. They found that the Government had expended, as the Senator from Idaho [Mr. NUGENT] has stated, more than $3,000,000,000 in the construction and purchase of ships. Many of the vessels so acquired are comparatively valueless; some of them, perhaps the great majority of them, do possess some value; but I do not agree at all with the Senator from Idaho that we can sell those ships for what they cost the United States. If the Government of the United States should continue in the operation of the ships for 1 year or 100 years, the cost to the taxpayers of the country would be great, and the loss to the Government will be progressively greater as the years go by. In my opinion, if the Government of the United States will sell the ships now, or within a reasonable time, its losses may not exceed $1,000,000,000; but I make the prediction that if this bill is passed in its present form the Government of the United States will lose more than $2,000,000,000, and probably a sum greatly in excess of that amount. It is absolutely impossible under governmental operation to avoid losses and deficits. These losses will have to be met by appropriations from the Treasury of the United States. No one knows the losses already incurred by the Government in its shipping experiences, and if this bill becomes a law no one ever will know.

The Senator from Idaho has stated that we operated these ships at a profit of $166,000,000 last year.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me for a moment, I have seen and have read two or three times the report to which he calls attention, and I wish to assert that the books of the Shipping Board, in my opinion, will not show anywhere near this alleged profit; it is only a book profit; there has been absolutely no consideration given to capital invested and no consideration given to the item of depreciation. Those vessels have depreciated, and there are other elements which should have been considered. Some ships are worthless; many have greatly depreciated in value. It is known that those acquired during the war cost sums greatly in excess of their prewar value, and many that were constructed cost from $200 to $300 per ton.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. NUGENT. It is true that I have stated on more than one occasion that the Shipping Board has operated the fleet at a net profit of one hundred and sixty-six million and some hundred thousand dollars. I derive that information from the report filed by the committee with its recommendation that the bill be enacted, and the statement appearing in the report is taken from the testimony of Chairman Payne, of the Shipping Board. It sets out, among other things, the board's revenues from operations from the beginning to June 30, 1919, as reflected in the condensed balance sheet of June 30, 1919. It shows that the income amounted to five hundred and seventy-four million and some hundred thousands of dollars and that the disbursements amounted to four hundred and seven million and some hundred thousands of dollars, leaving a net revenue to June 30, 1919, of $166,493,994.85.

The Senator from Washington has on several occasions stated that there was no charge for insurance included in these figures. I desire to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the table to which I have just referred there is a charge for insurance in the sum of $31,149,007.89.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I repeat what I said a moment ago—that in my judgment the operation of the ships during the past year has cost the Government several hundred millions of dollars. If the ships were sold now in a prudent way, without forcing them upon the market, I have no doubt but what the Government would be out at least $1,500,000,000.

Mr. NUGENT. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. KING. If the board waits another year before selling the ships controlled by it, the value of the ships will be less and the loss to the Government augmented. The depreciation in the vessels is great and types change. Of course, if conditions prevail that existed during the war, any vessel which can carry a cargo would be valuable; but as we return to prewar conditions the situation with respect to vessels for commerce and other purposes will be materially altered. Many nations are now engaged in shipbuilding. As the conditions throughout the world become more normal the construction of ships will be increased. The Scandinavian Republics, Holland, and other nations of Europe have greatly increased their ship production. And, of course, Great Britain, France, and Italy will strain every nerve to build ships to carry their commerce throughout the world. This will result in a material reduction in freight charges, and that will be reflected in the diminished value of the ships.

The vessels owned by the United States were purchased at exceedingly high prices by reason of war conditions, or they were built at war prices and cost the Government very much more than they can be sold or can be reproduced for now or in the future. My information is that ships will bring a better price now than they will at a later period. It seems manifest that there must be a great reduction in the cost of ship construction during the present year as well as in the coming years. The high prices prevailing during the war can not be continued.

The lumber, the steel, the machinery, and all other articles entering into the cost of ship construction are less now than they were in 1917 and 1918, and, in my opinion, there will be a gradual decline in the prices of all articles and commodities required in ship construction. I believe the interests of the country, as well as the Government, will be best subserved if the ships owned by the Government and used, or which it proposes to use, for transportation purposes are disposed of at the earliest possible date. I do not mean that they should be sacrificed, but a policy should be adopted calling for the disposition of such ships within a reasonable time and as a prudent vendor would dispose of property he does not desire to retain. The bill should indicate that it is the policy of the Government to dispose of its ships and to not continue in the business of ocean transportation. I stated a moment ago that the demand for the purchase of ships owned by the Government will be less as the years go by. Already our ocean commerce has commenced to decline. Last year our foreign commerce exceeded $10,000,000,000. There is every indication that for the year 1920 our foreign commerce will be two billion or more less than it was in 1919. Our exports last month were, as I recall, more than $100,000,000 less than the preceding month. This decline in our foreign commerce will necessarily affect the value of American ships. During the war the marine freight charges were exceedingly high. The vessels used by the United States obtained the benefits of these high prices. Transportation charges must inevitably decline. The Government will receive less for carrying American products than it did during the war. This decrease in the volume of our ocean shipments and the decrease in the freight charges will reduce the price and value of ships. It is for this reason I have suggested that the best interests of the Government and the people will be promoted if the Government sold its ships at an early date. Of course, purchasers should be Americans and the ships should fly the American flag.

I am opposed to the provisions of this section which permit loans to private persons for the construction of ships; and if the amendment which I am now offering shall prevail, I shall offer another amendment striking out that provision. I am not in favor of the Government of the United States giving its credit to men for the purpose of constructing ships. If the shipping business can not be put upon its feet now it never can be, and, speaking for myself, I am not willing that the Treasury of the United States shall be resorted to from year to year to make up the deficits of the Shipping Board as the Treasury of the United States was resorted to by the Railroad Administration to the extent of nearly $2,000,000,000 to make up the losses that were incurred in the governmental operation of the railroads.

As I stated a moment ago, I do not care who may constitute the Shipping Board, there will be waste and extravagance and inefficiency. The Government can not compete with private enterprise in the shipping business or in any other private business. I object to this bill, and this section particularly, because, notwithstanding the disclaimer of my distinguished friend, the chairman of the committee, I believe that this bill will perpetuate the Government in the shipping business.

Fifty millions of dollars may be used every year to build new ships. The Senator says they are not compelled to sell the ships. That is true, and they probably will not sell the ships. They will take the position that they can not get an adequate price, and thus form a pretext to continue the activities of the board indefinitely. They will retain the ships as they are constructed, and they will perpetuate themselves in power and perpetuate this governmental shipping system until Congress, by positive and direct legislation, shall compel a cessation of their functions.

I repeat that if we appropriate $50,000,000 here for the purpose of enabling the Shipping Board to build new vessels—and we are calling upon them to dispose of the ships as they see fit—the result will be that additional vessels will be constructed, the Shipping Board will have more vessels on hand, more machinery, more employees; and so, as the years go by, the system will more and more fasten itself upon the country, and private individuals, feeling that the Government of the United States is in competition with them, will be more reluctant to engage in the construction of ships. They will not go into competition with the Government of the United States if the Treasury of the United States is available to meet these deficits.

We give this board more than $3,000,000,000 of capital to play with. They are not required to pay a cent of interest to the Government of the United States. They are not required to make an accounting to the Government of the United States and pay into the Treasury the profits, if any, that have been derived. They have more than $3,000,000,000 to use as they may see fit. They may sell vessels and put the proceeds back into the construction of other ships. If there should be any receipts from the operation of the system, those receipts may be utilized for the construction of other ships. And so, with a great big competing governmental organization which has more than $3,000,000,000 of capital to play with, to utilize, to organize, to construct, and to go into competition with other ships and with other organizations, manifestly there will be a disinclination upon the part of private persons to engage in the shipping business.

It seems to me that the amendment which I have offered ought to prevail, and then that an amendment which I shall suggest later and which will deny the use of these funds to private individuals to aid them in the construction of ships, should also be adopted. And finally I shall move to strike out the entire section if these various amendments do not prevail.

The section contains so many dangerous provisions that I feel we should unite in eliminating it from the bill.

I desire to submit a very few general observations concerning this measure. It is apparent from the action of the Senate that no amendments of importance to the bill will be adopted. During the consideration of this very important measure but little attention has been given it by the overwhelming majority of the Senate. There has been but a handful of Senators present, and substantially all of those who have been in the Chamber during the debate have supported the committee and signified their opposition to any amendments offered or which might be offered. I regret that a measure of such vital importance to our country should receive so little attention. It can not be that Senators lack interest in a bill that is of transcendent importance not only to the people of our country but to the Government itself. In my opinion, the measure before us profoundly affects the political structure and the future economic policy of this Republic. We are daily confronted with evidences that influences are at work to change the political policies of our Nation and to compel it to adopt industrial and economic policies entirely at variance with the views of the founders of this Republic, as well as those who have guided the destinies of this Nation from the beginning.

Socialism is not a fad, but it is a powerful force in the world. It is not a mere fanciful scheme of dreamers and the theory of doctrinaires, but it is a creed supported by many strong thinkers and earnest and sincere seekers after better government and improved conditions throughout the world. Of course, there are various forms of socialism. I am speaking of that which may be denominated the sane and rational socialistic creed. There are those of this faith who seek to build up and not destroy. In my opinion, the highest form of political independence and economic freedom can be enjoyed under this Republic. No human Government approximates it in those elements or features which make for liberty and social progress. I have repeatedly reiterated my faith in our Government and in its competency to meet the varying conditions which the changing years develop. I believe it is adequate to meet the needs of a progressive and liberty-loving people. I do not, of course, mean to assert that in the application of the principles of our Government justice has always been done and the rights of the people always recognized. Injustices will always exist under the most perfect form of human government. Selfishness is a concomitant of humanity, and professors of the highest religious faith and those who follow the loftiest ideals frequently oppress their fellows or commit injustices against those whom they should protect. I have regarded with apprehension many schemes that have been suggested that aimed at the overthrow of our social and political structure and sought to fasten a hateful paternalism or a destructive socialism upon the people.

This bill, as I have stated, is of vital importance, not only because of the vast amount in money and property involved, but because of the policy which it adopts and the precedent which it establishes.

I understand, of course, that the committee repudiate the suggestion that its purpose is and its results will be to fasten upon the Government a permanent marine transportation system. I have no doubt but what the committee reporting the bill have given the most conscientious and patriotic service to the important problems involved.

When the war was over we found ourselves the owners of more than 2,000 ships. The Government had expended more than $3,000,000,000 in their purchase and construction. It was, of course, obvious that the Government could not disorganize the vast machine which it had erected for the purpose of purchasing and operating the ships and dispose of them in a moment. It was apparent that a policy must be adopted and steps taken to carry the same into effect. I think we delayed too long in announcing a policy and offering a bill dealing with this important question. As soon as the war ended Congress should have considered the question seriously and upon due deliberation formulated a policy and immediately crystallized it into a legislative enactment. However, we now have reported a measure which deals with the entire question. Many of its features are admirable; some I regard as positively bad and some indifferent. In my opinion the bill will be regarded by many as projecting the Government into the ocean carrying trade. After careful examination of the bill I can not help but think that the Government will have the utmost difficulty in extricating itself from the ownership and operation of ships for commercial purposes. There are provisions in the bill which I think are calculated to keep the Government in the ocean transportation business. No limit is fixed within which the Shipping Board is to sell the vessels now owned by the Government or as to the extent of the construction in the future. There is no requirement that it shall wind up the affairs of the corporation within a limited period. Everyone must realize that there will be an extensive propaganda carried on to prevent the Shipping Board from selling any of the ships owned by the Government or retiring from the transportation business.

Senators will recall the nation-wide effort to prevent the return of the railroads to their owners. It was insisted that transportation is a public function, and that the Government should retain the property and engage in the business of the common carrier. It must be apparent to all that the demand will be more insistent that the Government retain property which it does own and that it shall continue to own and operate the ships for commercial purposes.

Section 11, which is now under consideration, is, in my opinion, one of the most important sections in the bill. As it is reported by the committee it is calculated to commit the Government to a socialistic and bureaucratic policy and to prevent the Government from divorcing itself from ocean transportation in which it is now engaged. Under this provision the Shipping Board may sell boats and employ the proceeds derived therefrom in the construction of additional ships. A construction fund will be formed, and this fund is to be used by the board for the building of additional ships. The board is authorized to build such ships as it may deem necessary, and they are to be of the most efficient type for the establishment and maintenance of the service on steamship lines. Not only is the board authorized to use the pay from the sale of the ships, but all sums resulting from the operation of the vast fleet owned by the Government may be likewise utilized.

Section 3 of the bill provides for seven members of the board, and the terms of office of some of the members extend over a period of six years. There are provisions in the bill which seem to indicate that the board is a permanent organization and that its duties and powers shall continue indefinitely.

It is not my purpose, nor have I the time, to analyze the bill and to point out the many features which to me are objectionable, nor will I enter upon a discussion of the constitutional questions involved. I appreciate the fact that any argument attempting to show the bill to be unconstitutional would fall upon deaf ears. There is a growing disposition in the United States to disregard the limitations placed upon the Federal Government, notwithstanding that it is a government of enumerated and limited powers. We are constantly asked to enact legislation which is entirely at variance with this view and with the true and correct interpretation of the Constitution of the United States. The power to tax, which is the power to destroy, is regarded by many as being unlimited, and we are urged to make appropriations for purposes which are not governmental and for objects which are not within the purview of the Federal Government. In my opinion, the Federal Government has no power to tax the people of the United States except for purely governmental purposes. The States did not surrender to the Federal Government the power to tax the people within their borders for the purpose of engaging in all sorts of private enterprises. The Democratic Party for years denounced as robbery any taxation which was not for legitimate governmental purposes. They denied the right and power of the Federal Government to impose tariff duties for the purpose of aiding individuals in their private enterprises.

I merely make the inquiry: Where is the power of the Federal Government to tax the people hundreds of millions of dollars to build a merchant fleet to carry the commerce of the people?

Of course, as a war measure the Government had the right to build ships to transport its troops and to aid in prosecuting the war. I appreciate the fact that many believe that under the commerce clause of the Constitution the Government may build and own and operate railroads and acquire and build ships for the purpose of carrying the products not only of Americans but of the nationals of other countries. But I do not intend to discuss the constitutional aspect of this question. It would not affect the result nor change one vote. This bill will pass with all of its imperfections and its dangerous features. It will bring comfort to many Socialists in our land, and will be received with joy by the bureaucratic agencies which are so powerful in the Federal Government. It will perpetuate in position thousands of Federal employees.

In my opinion, no Senator now in public life will ever see the Government free from the burdens which this bill imposes. We are entering into private business; the Government is entering into competition with the individuals who are engaged in ocean transportation; excuses and pretexts will be found to delay and ultimately to prevent the sale of ships now owned by the Government and those which will be acquired under this bill. Additional legislation will be enacted that will continue the Government in the carrying trade of the world. I will not pause to point out the evils that will result and the effect it will have upon the persons who would otherwise engage in constructing and operating ships or the deterring effect it will have upon private initiative and the building and operating of ships by private capital. I have briefly referred to the fact that this bill gives to the Shipping Board more than $3,000,000,000 in ships and other property and cash. The restrictions placed upon the board are not important. Indeed, in my opinion, the limitations in the bill are wholly inadequate. Three billions is a tremendous sum, and yet the Shipping Board with insufficient restrictions is authorized to handle this vast sum and to utilize the proceeds resulting from the sale of the ships and the earnings resulting from this huge investment with but slight limitations upon their discretion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. I now move to strike out all of section 11.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is not the proper motion. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Now it is closed again.

Mr. KING. Do I understand that that precludes further amendments to this section?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I did not so understand. I wanted to offer an amendment on line 13 to strike out the word "two-thirds" and insert "one-half," so that no aid shall be for a greater sum than one-half of the cost of the vessel or vessels to be constructed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall it be opened again? The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I move to strike out after the word "built" on line 19, page 15, all of the rest of the language on that page, consisting of lines 19 to 25, inclusive, and all of lines 1 to 6, inclusive, on page 16, the end of the section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. Is a motion in order now to strike out the entire section or to disagree to the amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. If you beat the section now, you have it beaten.

Mr. KING. I know; but is it proper now to offer an amendment of that kind?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order to offer an amendment to strike out the entire section. If the Senate agree to it they say so, and if they do not it is out. The question simply has to be put in the affirmative; that is all. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I shall reserve a vote in the Senate on the entire section 11, and ask that it be rejected; that is, that the amendment offered by the committee, which is the entire section, be rejected.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, do I understand that section 5 of the committee amendment has been agreed to, or is that still open to amendment in Committee of the Whole?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendments have been agreed to.

Mr. NUGENT. Has the section itself been agreed to?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is informed by the Secretary that everything that is in the bill has been agreed to up to the present time. There is nothing open.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to recur to section 1, page 2, after the words "United States," on line 1, and offer the following amendment——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I do not feel that I can consent, as far as I am concerned. If the Senate desires to reconsider all of this matter, and go back over it, well and good, but I shall not give my consent to it.

Mr. KING. I move that the Senate reconsider the vote by which the amendment known as section 1 was agreed to. I desire to offer an amendment by adding the following words after the words "United States":

Not later than five years from the date of the passage of this act.

So that it will read:

To be owned and operated privately by citizens of the United States not later than five years from the date of the passage of this act.

The purpose of the proposed amendment is to require the board to conclude its duties and wind up the corporation within five years from the date of the passage of the act. That is to say, the Shipping Board will be compelled to sell the vessels controlled by it and close up all the business of the board on or before five years from the date of the passage of this bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say that is a matter the committee thrashed out over and over again, and finally agreed on the section; and I think the amendment suggested would simply play into the hands of those who want to buy the ships. I oppose the motion to reconsider.

Mr. KING. In reply to the last statement, I think it would be just the reverse. I think the failure to adopt an amendment of this kind is to put the Government of the United States into the shipping business forever, and I make the prediction that if this bill shall pass in this form the Government of the United States will be out more than $3,000,000,000 during the next 10 years and will practically lose not only that which it has expended in acquiring its commercial fleet but be committed to the construction and operation of the transportation system upon the seas.

Moreover, it will have been so inextricably bound up in the transportation business—in the ownership and leasing of vessels, in the loaning of money to private individuals for shipping purposes, the holding of mortgages, stocks, and securities connected with ships—that it will be unable to throw off the shackels and will be bound to the rock of Government ownership and operation of ships.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The motion to reconsider was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Utah has reserved a separate vote on section 11.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me say that it is so manifest that the Senate is committed to this bill, with all of its features, good, bad, and indifferent, that any further attack upon it would be futile. I shall not press the amendment I wished to offer in the Senate, but I can not but feel, expressing my profound regret, that we do not enact a proper measure, that we are enacting legislation fraught with dangers. I regret that a measure more in harmony with our past policies and the spirit of our Constitution has not been prepared by the committee and presented for our consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. NUGENT. Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 9, line 9, after the word "amended," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That deferred payments of purchase price of vessels under this section shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 5½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. Before the bill passes I wish to state that I have 15 more amendments which I consider vital and important, and which would materially improve this bill, in my opinion; but the Senate apparently is wedded to the bill, and Senators are disposed to follow the committee. So I shall pretermit the offering of those amendments.

Mr. NUGENT. I offer the same amendment to which the Senate has just agreed to section 6 of the bill, to be inserted after the word "sale," on line 24, page 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SHEPPARD in the chair). The Secretary will state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 9, line 24, after the word "sale," strike out the period and insert a colon and the following:

Provided further, That deferred payments of purchase price of vessels under this section shall bear interest at the rate of not less than 5½ per cent per annum, payable semiannually.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. KENYON, and Mr. JONES of Washington addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator from New York yield just a moment that I may ask for a conference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate request a conference with the House on the bill and amendments, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. CALDER, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. RANSDELL conferees on the part of the Senate.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13587) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator from New York was recognized first, but I rose to move to proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. 3944) to create a Federal live-stock commission. I feel that we might just as well have a test of strength on the question, and I ask the Senator from New York if he will not defer his motion until to-morrow. If the Senate votes to take up the Army appropriation bill, we can not help it, but if the Senator persists in his motion to-night, I shall feel compelled to call for a quorum and make a test on the question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. With the understanding that the motion may be left pending——

Mr. KENYON. I do not know how it could be left pending, but if that can be done——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I would move to take a recess until to-morrow at a stated hour, and the question before the Senate at that time would be my motion.

Mr. KENYON. We will resist a motion for a recess. We have been chided in our discussion of this matter because we have not tried to bring up the packers' bill, and it has been given no place by the steering committee; and I have served notice, as far as I could, that we should endeavor to bring it up. Now, we ask for a test on that question; that is all. That seems to be fair.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, it is entirely fair; there is no objection to it whatsoever; but I assume it would be very difficult to get a quorum here this evening.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13587, making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not quite certain that I understood what the Senator from Iowa suggested.

Mr. KENYON. To let the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In the form of a recess or an adjournment?

Mr. KENYON. No; an adjournment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In any event, had we not better take a recess? What is the difference, as far as the purpose the Senator has in mind is concerned?

Mr. KENYON. I felt that after 1 o'clock we could move to take up Senate bill 3944 and in that way make a test.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Could we not have the test, so called, at 11 o'clock to-morrow, after a recess? My purpose, Mr. President, is to hasten the legislation which it is absolutely essential for the Senate to act upon. I have not the slightest disposition, of course, to prevent the Senator from Iowa, or any other Senator, from contending against my motion and endeavoring to have some other bill substituted as the unfinished business. My great hope is that we shall proceed as soon as possible, and that is why I ask for a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. Of course, there will be no chance to offer any substitute until after 1 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that the order will be a vote on the motion of the Senator from New York, and that under the procedure and the rules no substitute can be offered to this particular motion.

Mr. KENYON. I am not trying to take advantage of any situation, but to have a fair, square test on whether the packers' bill is to have any consideration at this session of the Senate. I realize that one bill after another will be brought in, so that it will be impossible ever to reach it in the ordinary course of business.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, may I make a parliamentary inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask whether it would not be in order, if this motion does prevail, for the Senator from Iowa immediately after to move to take up his bill and displace the bill which the Senator from New York has in charge?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That can be done at any time by a majority vote.

Mr. KENYON. This afternoon?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; to-morrow.

Mr. KENYON. It could not be done until after 1 o'clock.

Mr. LENROOT. If we take a recess it could be done immediately after the bill of the Senator from New York was taken up; the motion would then be in order.

Mr. KENYON. I believe that is true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that that is correct.

Mr. KENYON. Then, if the Senator from New York will move for a recess until 12 o'clock to-morrow, I will offer no objection.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was my suggestion that the Senate should take a recess until 11 o'clock, but the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] reminds me that there is to be a majority conference to-morrow, which probably will make it impossible or inconvenient for us to meet at 11 o'clock. I therefore suggest 12 o'clock.

Mr. KENYON. Very well.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In view of the fact that there are a large number of nominations in the Army which should be disposed of, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 6 o'clock p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, May 22, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, May 21, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou God and Father of us all, who hast made us after Thine own image and likeness in the embryo, to be developed in the strenuous and complicated duties of life.

We are a great people numerically and in achievements, but a heterogeneous mass from every clime and people under the sun, with different traditions and conceptions of life. Teach us, we beseech Thee, how to live together in peace and harmony under American traditions, thoughts, and ideals. In the spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PEACE WITH GERMANY.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table House joint resolution 327, entitled "A joint resolution terminating the war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes," and I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to take from the Speaker's table and concur in the Senate amendments to the joint resolution, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

House joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman if we can agree on some time for debate on this resolution?

Mr. PORTER. As I understand, we are limited to an hour, and I am perfectly willing to divide that time with the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. FLOOD. We are not limited to an hour, I understand, unless the gentleman moves the previous question at the end of the hour.

Mr. PORTER. That is my intention, to close debate at the end of the hour.

Mr. FLOOD. We have a very considerable demand for time on this side, and I would like to ask the gentleman to agree not to move the previous question at the end of the hour.

Mr. PORTER. Well, Mr. Speaker, this resolution has been debated by the House upward of nine hours when it passed the House, and we do not think that the time for debate should be extended beyond the hour.

Mr. FLOOD. This resolution was debated in the Senate three or four or five days, but I will call the attention of the gentleman to the fact that it has not been debated here at all, and this is an entirely different resolution in many respects from the resolution which was adopted by the House.

Mr. PORTER. In reply I will say that the fundamentals of the resolutions are the same; they strive for the same object—peace.

Mr. FLOOD. This resolution does leave out some of the more obnoxious features of the House resolution, but there are a good many differences between this resolution and the House resolution.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. FLOOD. I hope the gentleman will let us have more time to debate it.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Regular order!

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I decline to yield any further time.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the gentleman if this side is to have any of the hour the gentleman is going to allow for debate on this resolution?

Mr. PORTER. I stated to the gentleman it would be equally divided.

Mr. FLOOD. Will the gentleman please yield me 30 minutes now?

Mr. PORTER. I will yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the preamble.

Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

"That the joint resolution of Congress passed April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the Imperial German Government and the Government and people of the United States, and making provisions to prosecute the same, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and said state of war is hereby declared at an end: Provided, however, That all property of the Imperial German Government, or its successor or successors, and of all German nationals which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under the control of the Government of the United States or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, shall be retained by the United States and no disposition thereof made, except as shall specifically be hereafter provided by Congress, until such time as the German Government has, by treaty with the United States, ratification whereof is to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, made suitable provisions for the satisfaction of all claims against the German Government of all persons, wheresoever domiciled, who owe permanent allegiance to the United States, whether such persons have suffered, through the acts of the German Government or its agents since July 31, 1914, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, directly or indirectly, through the ownership of shares of stock in German, American, or other corporations, or have suffered damage directly in consequence of hostilities or of any operations of war, or otherwise and until the German Government has given further undertakings and made provisions by treaty, to be ratified by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for granting to persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States, most favored nation treatment, whether the same be national or otherwise, in all matters affecting residence, business, profession, trade, navigation, commerce, and industrial property rights, and confirming to the United States all fines, forfeitures, penalties, and seizures imposed or made by the United States during the war, whether in respect to the property of the German Government or German nationals, and waiving any pecuniary claim based on events which occurred at any time before the coming into force of such treaty, any existing treaty between the United States and Germany to the contrary notwithstanding.

"SEC. 2. That in the interpretation of any provision relating to the date of the termination of the present war or of the present or existing emergency in any acts of Congress, joint resolutions, or proclamations of the President containing provisions contingent upon the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, the date when this resolution becomes effective shall be construed and treated as the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency, notwithstanding any provision in any act of Congress or joint resolution providing any other mode of determining the date of the termination of the war or of the present or existing emergency.

"SEC. 3. That until by treaty or act or joint resolution of Congress it shall be determined otherwise, the United States, although it has not ratified the treaty of Versailles, does not waive any of the rights, privileges, indemnities, reparations, or advantages to which it and its nationals have become entitled under the terms of the armistice signed November 11, 1918, or any extensions or modifications thereof or which under the treaty of Versailles have been stipulated for its benefit as one of the principal allied and associated powers and to which it is entitled.

"SEC. 4. That the joint resolution of Congress approved December 7, 1917, declaring that a state of war exists between the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government and the Government and the people of the United States and making provisions to prosecute the same, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and said state of war is hereby declared at an end, and the President is hereby requested immediately to open negotiations with the successor or successors of said Government for the purpose of establishing fully friendly relations and commercial intercourse between the United States and the Governments and peoples of Austria and Hungary.

"Amend the title so as to read: 'Joint resolution repealing the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and Germany, and the joint resolution of December 7, 1917, declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and the Austro-Hungarian Government.'"

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, while House joint resolution 327 and the Senate substitute therefor differ materially in form, in effect they are substantially the same.

Section 1 of the Senate substitute, in addition to terminating the state of war between the Imperial German Government and the United States, repeals the resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring a state of war to exist between the two countries, and forbids the disposition of any property of the Imperial German Government or its nationals now in the possession of the United States until a treaty of peace has been ratified between the two Governments and full reparation is made to all persons owing permanent allegiance to the United States for loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property caused by the German Government or its nationals; in other words, section 1 suspends any disposition of the property of enemy aliens until a treaty of peace has been duly ratified and just compensation is made by the German Government to American citizens who have suffered damages by reason of the wrongful acts of the German Government or its nationals.

Section 2, which provides for the termination of all war legislation, is identical with the same section in the House resolution.

Section 3 preserves all of the rights and advantages accruing to the United States under the armistice signed November 11, 1918, and the treaty of Versailles the same as if the United States had duly ratified said treaty. This section differs from section 5 of the House resolution only in wording. Both sections prevent the passage of this resolution from being construed as a waiver of any of the rights accruing to the United States by reason of its participation in the war.

Section 4 of the Senate substitute repeals the resolution of December 7, 1917, declaring a state of war between the Imperial and Royal Austro-Hungarian Government and the Government and the people of the United States and requests the President immediately to open negotiations for a treaty of peace with the successor or successors of said Government.

Section 3 of the House resolution, which allows reciprocal trade between the two countries upon certain conditions, and section 4, which provides a penalty for the violation of this section, have been stricken out.

It is unnecessary to remind the House that it is now upward of 19 months since the armistice was signed on November 11, 1918, and neither of the belligerents has indicated the slightest intention of resuming hostilities; on the contrary, the armies of both sides have been demobilized, commercial relations between the peoples of the United States and Germany have been partially resumed; all the nations associated with us in the war have formally ended it by treaty with Germany, and the Imperial German Government has been supplanted by a Republic. Germany has conceded our demands by the treaty of Versailles, and the only controversy remaining is the one between the Chief Executive and the Senate over the terms of the treaty. Under this state of facts, no reasonable mind can escape the conclusion that the war is long since terminated, and that our country is insistently demanding that the shadow which this technical state of war casts upon the rights and liberties of the American people shall be promptly removed. Congress, having exercised its power to declare war, to raise and support an army, to provide and maintain a navy, to reach into the homes of the rich and poor alike and take therefrom the sons and place them on the battle fronts, and to marshal all the resources of the Nation for the successful prosecution of the war, surely has the right to exercise the same power and vacate its official acts and thus restore the Nation to a state of peace. [Applause.]

The arbitrary position taken by the President in regard to the terms of the treaty with the Imperial German Government has prevented the making of peace in the usual way, which is by treaty; it therefore becomes the imperative duty of Congress to declare officially that the war is at an end. Under ordinary circumstances the differences between the two branches of Congress on a measure of this kind are settled in conference, but such action would delay the passage of the resolution and probably subject it to a filibuster in the Senate on the conference report. Your committee, therefore, being fully convinced that time is the essence of this legislation, we have moved to concur in the Senate amendments so that the measure shall promptly reach the President.

The passage of either resolution will require the President to state whether or not he intends to relinquish the extraordinary war powers vested in him by Congress, as all our former wartime Presidents have done after the termination of war, or if he intends to remain a dictator and use these drastic and obnoxious laws as a weapon to compel the Senate to desist from its efforts to Americanize the treaty of peace. The American people will await his answer with deep interest and grave concern. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I reserve the remainder of my time.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], and, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that those who speak on this resolution may be permitted to revise and extend their remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that all who speak on this resolution may revise and extend their remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, the action of the majority is rather amusing when it is remembered that on the 9th of April, H. J. Res. 327, an altogether different resolution from that now presented, passed this House and in due course went to the Senate. You will remember that it was current rumor all about this Capitol at that time and before that the resolution which was passed in the House had been drafted in conferences between Republican leaders of the House and leaders at the other end of the Capitol who had been directing the fight over the treaty for almost a year. Is it not remarkable that in view of such facts the Senate should strike from the House resolution every line and every word except the enacting clause and substitute wholly different provisions and language?

The action of the Senate leaders in inducing the House to pass a resolution so palpably unconstitutional and then abandoning the resolution for another of wholly different text can only be explained upon the hypothesis that the House was utilized as the victim of an experimental operation. With the House first acting senatorial spectators could gain a more impersonal and accurate estimate of the reception given it by the public and could better gauge the political aspects presented. The experimental operation was had. The public so skillfully sensed the futility and even the hypocrisy of the measure and so scorned the shameless and shocking defiance of constitutional limitations which it exhibited that those who had formerly secretly fathered it now renounced and repudiated their putative paternity. The nauseous dose was sweetened and softened and scented and is now presented to the House with directions on the bottle which will be faithfully followed. We now consider a resolution absolutely variant from that which was passed in the House, nothwithstanding the assurance of the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs that it is practically the same.

To-day, though we are faced by a new situation, the majority is no less subservient to Senate suggestion and is no less willing to obey the behests of those who sit in another body and whose minds direct the action of this House on this resolution than on the 9th of April. The Washington Post of yesterday morning contained a statement entitled "House to pass Knox plan," and reading:

> Republican leaders in the House agreed yesterday to accept the peace resolution as adopted by the Senate as a substitute for the House resolution and decided tentatively to call it up to-morrow for final action.

The Washington Star of May 19, 1920, contained a similar statement.

Now there are so many "Knox plans" and they change their minds and methods so often that to know exactly what is meant requires a perusal of the last edition of the paper. The resolution that you adopted on April 9 was a "Knox plan," but in the meantime something has modified the minds of the architects of that Knox plan and we now have another "Knox plan."

But, gentlemen, your attention is particularly called to the declaration of this resolution that a repeal is had of the declaration of war. This purported repeal of the declaration of war is inserted in the hope that it will fool somebody into the thought that by the repeal of the resolution declaring a state of war to exist a state of peace is restored.

It was incontestably established in the debate in the House that peace could only be restored by the joint action of the belligerents. Congress could repeal the act providing for the census of 1900, but its records would remain. It could repeal the act which made appropriations for the Post Office Department for the year 1908, but not a single dollar expended would return to the Treasury, and not a letter would return to the sender. Such repeals would be as effective as this. Allow me to suggest to the chairman that he ought to repeal the declaration of war against Great Britain in 1812. I understand it still stands on the statute books unrepealed, and I am reliably informed that the act of Congress declaring a state of war to exist with the Republic of Mexico in 1846 stands on the statute books unrepealed. Have you gentlemen overlooked the condition in which the country now stands? Do you realize you have not repealed the act declaring war with Spain in 1898?

Mr. PORTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. PORTER. Do you not think the treaties of peace between Great Britain and the United States and the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain repealed the declaration of war?

Mr. CONNALLY. Certainly. And that is the method by which you should repeal this declaration of war. The only constitutional way to repeal it is by a treaty of peace. Everybody seems to know that except the majority on that side of the House. [Applause.]

The Senate resolution itself, perhaps unwittingly, admits that the repeal of the declaration of war does not legally restore peace. If it did, there would be no necessity for adding at the end of the repealing clause the following language: "And said state of war is hereby declared at an end."

Mr. HARDY of Texas. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HARDY of Texas. And if a war is at an end the declaring of it at an end does not add anything to it?

Mr. CONNALLY. The gentleman is correct, of course.

Section 1 of this resolution provides what else? It provides there is peace, war is at an end, but we say to Germany and to the world that notwithstanding there is peace we propose to hold on to every dollar's worth of German property that is in possession of the United States until the negotiation and ratification of a treaty.

American seizure and possession of enemy property were authorized under international law by the existence of a state of war. But for such a state we should have transgressed treaties and the law of nations. Without an adjustment of such property rights it is urged that Congress terminate the status upon which our claims are founded and at the same time announce its retention of enemy property. If the resolution creates a status of peace will not the question at once arise as to the right of the United States to retain property whose seizure and possession were only justified by a state of war? May it not be contended by Germany, at the bar of the law of nations, that the resumption of peace automatically restores seized property to its former status in the absence of treaty stipulations? It was enemy property because it was owned by enemies; when peace is restored they will no longer be enemies but friends, and can it not be argued with much force that the character of the property is that of its owners? Property in itself has no nationality. It possesses no citizenship. It has not the power to express its preference of two flags. Cold, inanimate, bloodless, and passionless, it is thrilled neither by the strains of the Star-Spangled Banner nor by the chant of Deutschland Uber Alles. In war its flag is the flag of its conquering possessor; in peace its flag is the flag of its owner.

The Allies through the reparations commission are now arranging with Germany for the payment of indemnities under the treaty of Versailles, to which the United States is not a party, and through which she can claim no right until she becomes a ratifying party. Germany is in an international court of bankruptcy.

Large amounts of property claimed by her and her citizens and unquestionably theirs before the war are now in the possession of America. Germany's creditors under the treaty are interested in bringing into the bankruptcy court all of the debtor's estate to swell the fund to which they are looking for the discharge of their debts. If peace is declared by this resolution, does it require an elastic imagination to conceive a possible situation that might arise in which the Allies may question our right to retain German property, as against their claims?

To such a contention we should reply that during the existence of war, conformably to international usage and precedent, seizure had been made of the property as that of an enemy. Unless the British and French are less astute than they have heretofore shown themselves to be they would probably reply, "You had the right to seize the property and hold it during the war, and through your possession could have contracted with Germany by treaty for its permanent retention, under right superior to that of other nations and to their entire exclusion, but you have not so bargained with Germany. You have voluntarily restored the status of peace without a contract with Germany. By the coming of peace your war tenure ceased to exist. The property was seized in war but was released in peace. In the meantime we have made and sealed an agreement with Germany affecting this identical property and our rights have attached and are superior to those you voluntarily waived."

This suggestion is strengthened by the fact that under the treaty it is stipulated that at least a portion of such property is to be delivered to the reparations commission for the account of the Allies. It may be contended, however, that by an understanding the German ships in part were to be assigned by the Allies to the United States. That may be true. Yet the agreement was tentative. It was based upon an assumption that the United States would ratify in some form the treaty. Had it done so the tentative agreement would have been confirmed. But how can the United States demand of the Allies rights under a compact to which it is not a party and whose obligations it declines to assume? Our conduct must be squared by the standard of international law—a law that recognizes the claims of all nations and not alone those of the United States and Germany. By a mere ex parte declaration of an intention on our part to hold German property, as contained in the resolution, the legal and logical consequences that follow the restoration of peace or the ending of the war can not be avoided.

In section 3 a similar attempt is made to preserve to the United States rights under the armistice and the treaty by a declaration that such rights are not waived. No argument is needed to convince the slowest mind that peace terminates an armistice. Under the law of nations it is extremely doubtful if any rights existing by virtue of an armistice can be preserved by a simple assertion of nonwaiver when peace is actually reestablished.

In undertaking to secure American rights under the treaty the following language is employed:

Rights—which under the treaty of Versailles have been stipulated for its benefit as one of the principal allied and associated powers, and to which it is entitled.

It is difficult to conceive why the words "and to which it is entitled" were added. If such rights must have been both stipulated in the treaty for the benefit of the United States, "and to which it is entitled," it would seem that unnecessarily a double chain of title is required. Ought it not be sufficient if such rights were stipulated in the treaty? Why attach as another condition "and to which it is entitled"? These terms are contradictory and confusing. Until the United States ratifies the treaty it can not become "entitled" to any rights based upon it. If the United States is already "entitled" legally to such rights upon any basis other than the treaty, no occasion exists that such rights should also be stipulated in the treaty. Neither in reason nor any species of logic can the double requirement that in order to be preserved such rights must both be stipulated in the treaty and be such as the United States is entitled to be justified. Either requirement should be sufficient.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FLOOD. I yield two minutes more to the gentleman.

Mr. CONNALLY. I want to call your attention to the last section of this resolution, in which may be found one of its most amusing features. You will remember when the resolution passed the House no mention was made of the state of war existing between Austria and the United States.

The resolution sought to reestablish peace with Germany alone. During the debate the minority reminded gentlemen on that side that a state of war with Austria still existed. However, in order to prevent the resolution from doing violence to itself, in order to guarantee that the irresponsible majority might not mutilate the measure by amendment, lest the majority might not accept it just as presented, to prevent any independence of thought which might approve proper amendments, or lest the Democrats might offer an amendment that would appeal to the conscience of the Republicans, the Republican steering committee had placed the resolution in a parliamentary strait-jacket, under a rule denying opportunity to offer amendments. It could not be revised so as to include Austria. When it reached the Senate it was realized that a blunder had been made and section 4 was inserted, which repeals the declaration of war against Austria.

Though the resolution pretends to declare an end of war and to restore peace, the President is requested to immediately open negotiations for the establishment of friendly relations, and so forth.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. Not now. I have but a minute. Throughout this contest the Democrats have contended that Congress could not negotiate a treaty and our adversaries now confess their error. Why call on the President? Why not Congress complete the job? The most humiliating thing that the House and Senate as now composed must suffer is to admit at the end of this resolution their own lack of authority and to request the President: "Please enter into negotiations with Austria, Mr. President." This proud political party, in its partisan picture play, with its pretended puissance, has to finally admit that there are limitations to its power! Both Houses have solemnly said in a loud tone of voice, "Let there be peace," and there was not peace. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Speaker, the matter presented is substantially the same as was presented by the peace resolution adopted by the House on April 9. The Senate amendment to the peace resolution, which we are considering, substantially improves that measure, but on the whole the issue is the same. No change in principle has been made. In the brief time at my disposal I do not undertake to repeat the arguments which I then submitted. As to the situation politically and otherwise, both foreign and domestic, there has been no change except that the President by his recent Hamaker telegram has further shown his unwillingness to accept any change in the treaty of Versailles and that he remains in hopeless deadlock with the Senate.

THE PRESIDENT'S POSITION.

The President of the United States, in his letter to Senator HITCHCOCK of March 8, referring to the covenant of the League of Nations, said:

I need not say, Senator, that I have given a great deal of thought to the whole matter of reservations proposed in connection with the ratification of the treaty, and particularly that portion of the treaty which contains the covenant of the League of Nations, and I have been struck by the fact that practically every so-called reservation was in effect a rather sweeping nullification of the terms of the treaty itself. I hear of reservationists and mild reservationists, but I can not understand the difference between a nullifier and a mild nullifier. Our responsibility as a Nation in this turning point of history is an overwhelming one, and if I had the opportunity I would beg everyone concerned to consider the matter in the light of what it is possible to accomplish for humanity rather than in the light of special national interests.

This letter can not be interpreted otherwise than as meaning that the President is determined not to accept any reservation, change, or amendment of substance to the covenant or treaty. This view of his position is confirmed by the President's letter upon the subject to Hon. Jouett Shouse, and also by his telegram of May 10 to G. E. Hamaker, chairman of the Democratic committee of Multnomah County, Oreg., in which he says:

The chief motives which led us to enter the war will be defeated unless that covenant is ratified and acted upon with vigor. We can not in honor whittle it down or weaken it, as the Republican leaders of the Senate have proposed to do. If we are to exercise the kind of leadership which the founders of the Republic looked forward to and which they depended upon their successors to establish, we must do this thing with courage and unalterable determination.

At no time has the President intimated that he will accept any amendment or reservation which changes the meaning of the covenant or treaty. On the other hand, all his expressions have been to the contrary, and there is no basis whatsoever upon which hope that the President would accept reasonable reservations may be founded.

MAKES THE LEAGUE A PARTY ISSUE.

It is clear from the President's expressions on the subject that he is unalterably determined upon the covenant and treaty without change of substance, and that he will agree to no reservation which means anything. Not only is this the President's position, but the Hamaker telegram shows him to be resolved upon projecting the issue upon the League of Nations into the coming political campaign. The telegram was in response to Hamaker's direct question to the President, by which he was asked "whether you consider it important to nominate candidates pledged to ratify Versailles treaty without Lodge reservations."

The President's answer to Hamaker's inquiry can not be interpreted otherwise than as strong in the affirmative. He is determined that the campaign shall turn upon the issue whether the League of Nations shall be approved as it is planned in the treaty or whether it shall be rejected in its entirety. He would make this the paramount issue of the campaign and would have the Democratic Party to stand or fall by it. He demands that the party platform when adopted at San Francisco shall declare unequivocally in favor of an unamended and unchanged covenant of the League of Nations and the treaty of Versailles just as he first submitted them to the Senate.

I protest against this position, and to make my protest more emphatic must vote for the pending resolution. I protest against an unyielding policy, a stubborn and uncompromising policy, which insists as the price of peace that the covenant be accepted without dotting an "i" or crossing a "t."

As an American citizen I protest against that policy, against the domestic strife and confusion that will flow from such an issue, against the turning aside from grave domestic questions into foreign complications which do not press for immediate decision.

AMERICA WANTS PEACE.

America wants peace. Its very interest demands it. We must have peace for the quiet it will bring, for the stilling of discontent and unrest, for the domestic security which we can have only through peace. We must have peace on such terms as can be put through, as are acceptable not only to the President but also to the Senate, which has a grave and important constitutional function to perform in regard to treaties.

Every interest of our country cries aloud for peace, the quiet and harmony of civil life, the solution of pressing public questions, the reconstruction of our country, the increase of production, the reduction of the prices of the necessaries of life, the resumption of industry and trade, the general restoration of our normal life. Harsh war laws are yet being harshly enforced. Their time of usefulness has passed. We need more of mutual confidence and good will among all classes and conditions of men. The resumption of a state of peace will promote all these desirable ends.

FATAL PARTY POLICY.

I protest against a stubborn and uncompromising policy upon the treaty, first, as an American citizen. I protest, second, as a Democrat who believes that the welfare of our country is bound up in the success of the political party of which I am a member. As a Democrat I protest against my party being committed to a policy of refusing all compromise and demanding that the League of Nations shall be accepted without reservation or change. The issue is not whether changes or reservations should be made in the covenant, nor whether the League of Nations ought to be approved without change. That is not the issue. The issue is whether, assuming that the League of Nations is proper in every respect, we should refuse to accept alteration or amendment thereof and demand of the country, as a condition of peace, that all views to the contrary be surrendered and the league be accepted without qualification. The American people will not approve such a stubborn and uncompromising policy. The people will not indorse either the public man or the political party which takes such an arrogant position. If such a program is fastened upon the Democratic Party at San Francisco, it is certain to carry us down into defeat and disaster. I protest against the threatened destruction of the Democratic Party, which I fear will follow if it is committed to any such dangerous and unpatriotic policy.

I protest against my party being sent down to defeat in the next election upon any such issue. To adopt such a policy will mean for it only ruin and defeat. If in obedience to the President's demand the Democratic convention at San Francisco shall adopt such a policy as its platform, then the logical thing is to put Mr. Wilson forward as our next candidate for President to run upon the platform of his dictation. If it is to be that upon Mr. Wilson's demand the Democratic horse is to be ridden to ruin, then let him take the saddle himself as the candidate.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, the last time this resolution was before the House it received the votes of all but two gentlemen upon this side and the votes of all gentlemen upon that side who, like the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON], do some little thinking for themselves. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The Senate resolution differs from that not at all in principle or substance but only in some matters of detail. Frankly, I prefer the resolution as it passed the House, but I am delighted to vote to concur in the Senate amendments, because by doing so we shall bring as soon as possible the thing that Americans desire—the peace of the world. [Applause on the Republican side.]

This perhaps is not the best way to obtain peace, but it is the only way. [Applause on the Republican side.] The way to have obtained peace—the proper way—was for the Executive, who conducted the negotiations, to have brought back a real peace treaty without extraneous matter in it. [Applause on the Republican side.] And if such a treaty had been brought back to the American Senate it would have been ratified in two months. [Applause on the Republican side.] Yet the President insisted upon inserting and has since boastfully claimed that he had had inserted in that treaty his League of Nations, which 90 per cent of the American people disapproved [applause on the Republican side], because it sacrifices the fundamental principles for which all great American leaders have stood, which millions of American citizens have fought to preserve, and which, of all Presidents, Woodrow Wilson has been the first to abandon. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The international effect of our still being at war is not the only thing to be considered. We feel the effect here at home. To-day we are oppressed by war boards and war commissions beyond all patience, and that is because all war powers granted by Congress terminate at one fixed date, to wit, the date of the proclamation by the President that ratification of a peace treaty has been completed. Now, we all know, gentlemen, that termination of the war upon those terms can never come to pass so long as Wilson is President of the United States.

In our effort to economize in this Congress our greatest obstacle has been these vast numbers of useless employees and commissions, which exist only by virtue of the fact that this country is still technically at war. The time has come to bring about the termination of the war, and the only way it is possible to bring that about is to pass this resolution. [Applause.]

Some say the President will veto it. That is his privilege. He has always been defiant of the will of Congress; but it may be that when he finds that the Congress, by a great majority in both its branches, has insisted by this resolution upon having peace, the veto will not be forthcoming. But if it does come, we at least will have the satisfaction of knowing that we have interpreted the will, as I believe, of the overwhelming majority of the American people that this technical state of war shall be declared to be over and done for. [Applause.]

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, the world wants peace. [Applause.] That is a very beautiful thought, and he would have to be utterly unregenerate who would refuse to assent to that sentiment. [Applause on the Republican side.]

You applaud, gentlemen, but does this resolution now before us mean peace? You know in your hearts that it does not. Peace means not only the cessation of hostilities, but the adjustment of mutual claims and antagonistic interests. It is a bilateral contract and can not be brought about by the mere ipse dixit of one side or the other. There is no virtue in simply saying that we are at peace. That declaration will add nothing to the President's assertion that the war is at an end.

This resolution proposes to repeal or rescind the joint resolution of Congress passed April 6, 1917, by which a state of war was declared to exist between the Imperial German Government and the people of the United States. I presume you will admit that this is the first time in the history of the United States, and perhaps in the history of the world, that such a thing has been attempted; particularly when actual hostilities have followed upon the declaration of war. I am not saying that for that reason it can not or should not be done now. In a meritorious case we might be justified in making a precedent. The fact, however, that it aims to do something which does not appear to have been contemplated by our Constitution and a thing which was never done before imposes upon us the duty of very rigid scrutiny. The Constitution of the United States prescribes the method of arriving at a state of peace. It provides for a formal treaty to be negotiated through the President with the Nation's enemies, and it specifically provides that that treaty shall be approved by the Senate before it may be proclaimed. Confessedly, then, this resolution stands in the guise of a subterfuge to circumvent the Constitution. It bears all the earmarks of the shrewd and technical lawyer.

I will not enter into the controversy as to whether or not the treaty should have been ratified with reservations, without reservations, or not at all. I may confess, however, in passing that I am not completely satisfied that the spirit in which it was rejected was wholly disinterested, humanitarian, or even American. It brought out an exhibition of partisanship that is unparalleled in our history. Consistency and sincerity were thrown to the winds and the lessons of history disregarded. While pretending to follow the teachings of Washington and Jefferson in the avoidance of entangling alliances with other nations, we have by strange paradox put ourselves in the position where we can never get rid of them. The men that shouted loudest for the League of Nations and urged the importance of acting in harmony with our late allies, so soon as it became obvious that political capital was to be made out of the situation executed a complete face about and preached an entirely different philosophy. For instance, the honorable gentleman who was among the most distinguished in the fight against the treaty and the League of Nations delivered a speech on December 21, 1918, in which he said:

> To attempt in any way to separate us from our allies now or to prevent perfect unity of action is as harmful as such efforts were when we were fighting in northern France and on the plains of Flanders.

He also said:

> If peace with Germany is to be durable, terms must be exacted which will make it, so far as human foresight goes, impossible for Germany to break out upon the world with a war of conquest.

Yet this gentleman is willing to sponsor a resolution declaring a state of peace with Germany in which no terms whatever are exacted and no guaranties required.

But he was even more insistent than that. He said:

> The peace must not only be made and agreed to, but it must be effective, and to render it effective there is much more to be done than can be done by ink and paper. Nothing can be accomplished unless we work in complete harmony with those who are associated with us in the war against the Central Powers.

"There is much more to be done than can be done by ink and paper." Yes; indeed! And it might be added, much more than can be done by the passage of this resolution. But swallowing one's own words seems to present no insuperable difficulty to the gentlemen who are striving so hard to make political capital for the presidential campaign out of the treaty situation. I do not complain about their individual change of front. That is their right. But, Mr. Speaker, they fly in the face of all of the traditions of their own party. The principle of arbitration in international disputes had its birth within the folds of the Republican Party. It was nurtured and brought to fruition under its ablest leaders. No one would ever charge Gen. Grant with sacrificing the interest of his country by entering into an international engagement to submit our disputes to a disinterested court, and yet to him must be given the credit for inaugurating the principle of arbitration in international disputes. When he put through his plan for the Geneva arbitration he was maligned and ridiculed and charged with departing from the ways established by the founders of our Republic. Yet to-day his principal claim for statesmanship is founded upon his humanitarian efforts to avert war and settle international disputes by arbitration. In an address at Birmingham during his trip around the world he said:

> Nothing would afford me greater happiness than to know that, as I believe will be the case at some future day, the nations of the earth will agree upon some sort of congress which will take cognizance of international questions of difficulty, and whose decisions will be as binding as the decisions of our Supreme Court are upon us. It is a dream of mine that some such solution may be.

From this prophecy, and from this gentle, kindly philosophy, the leaders of the Republican Party turn to-day to advocate the doctrines of Chinese exclusiveness. After exertions and sacrifices unparalleled in our history, they want us to declare peace and detach ourselves from our late associates in the World War without a modicum of effort to exact guaranties upon the issues for which we went to war. This, in my opinion, is the acme of folly. As matters stand to-day, the League of Nations is in existence. It is ratified by 28 powers of the world, and we stand outside the barriers—thrust into the cold by our own folly. We fought the war practically for the vindication of the right of neutrals to the freedom of the seas. To-day we are neutral; perhaps the only neutral in all the world; and yet there is no suggestion in this resolution that we shall require of our enemies any recognition of that principle for which we went to war.

Shocking as it may seem, paradoxical as it may seem, this resolution not only waives our national claims against Germany and Austria but plays us directly into England's hands. We have left her in complete mastery of the world situation. We have run away from our responsibilities and are leaving the British diplomats in complete, unquestioned, and secure control of the council of the League of Nations.

From the murmurs and questionings I hear on every side I think I can perceive a very pronounced turn in the tide of public opinion and a very marked sentiment of fear aroused that, in our desire to keep aloof from international affairs, we have scuttled so hastily out of our entanglements that we have refused all the power and all the influence which we ought of right to have wielded and committed it into the hands of the very nation for fear of which we hesitated to assume our just burdens in the world affairs. The British Empire now dominates the League of Nations and can, if the occasion demands, align the nations associated with it in the League of Nations against us. This I take it is a result far beyond the expectations of those who clamored loudest for our isolation.

Even on the Irish question the sentiment is growing and a profound conviction is settling on the minds of those most solicitous for Ireland's welfare that her future would be happier and her prospects brighter if the powerful influence of the United States were present at the council of the League of Nations to take up her cause and present her just claims to the nations of the world.

We bemoan the fate of Shantung. We deplore the conduct of England toward Egypt and India and Ireland. Yet what have we done to ameliorate their condition? We have resolutions in committee, but the silence of the tomb has crept over them. Upon these urgent matters no action is taken, and when action is taken they will have no more influence upon the powers now controlling the League of Nations than a scrap of paper blown in through the window by a puff of wind. Gentlemen, do not deceive yourselves. You can not pretend loyalty and sympathy and make political capital out of preambles and resolutions. Your whole course in this session has been one continual succession of artifices to alienate the sympathy of the people of the United States, in all its subdivisions, from the administration that conducted the greatest war in history to a successful and victorious conclusion. You have been in command of the legislative situation here for 15 months and you have done nothing except what was prompted by a keen yet uncanny solicitude for the presidential election. By this resolution you hope to propitiate the Germans; but your prewar history, as exhibited by the records of Congress and in your efforts to goad the administration into war before the occasion for war arose, belie your present protestations.

You know that the people of the United States are, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has said, suffering from war bureaus and war conditions that are past all patience. True, so they are. If that is so, why do you not offer or act on the bills now in this House to repeal the war-time legislation? [Applause.] You will have our support without question in any serious effort that you may make to repeal these burdensome laws, but you have done absolutely nothing. Yet you think you can deceive the people of America by pretending that you are going to bring about peace by a mere resolution. You can make war by a resolution declaring war, but, gentlemen, you know very well that you can not make peace by rescinding that resolution. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, may I inquire how much time I have remaining?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has used 16 minutes and the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FLOOD] has used 14 minutes.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NEWTON].

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, 6 weeks ago and 17 months after the signing of the armistice found the allied and associated powers, with one exception, at peace with Germany and the world. That exception was the United States. The President and the Senate, charged with joint responsibility in the making of treaties, were deadlocked. They could not agree. The President was still insisting upon the League of Nations as he wrote it. A majority of the Senate, carrying out the sentiment of a great majority of the American people, were insisting that if it was to be ratified at all it must first be Americanized by appropriate reservations. During all of this time the President continued to enjoy and exercise the extraordinary war powers that a willing people had conferred upon him for war purposes. He relinquished none. With the coming of peace the American people expected, and had a right to expect, a relinquishment of those powers by the President. The President thought differently. Finally, the people turned to Congress. Six weeks ago this House passed a peace resolution declaring the war at an end and repealing the war-time powers of the President and removing their burdensome restrictions.

You, my Democratic friends—or, rather, most of you—opposed this resolution. You claimed it was unconstitutional; that the Congress had no power to declare the war at an end. Did you really want to serve the country by ending the deadlock and ushering in peace? Were you in earnest in urging these constitutional objections? No. The debate here to-day proves it. In the preceding debate you admitted that Congress had the power to repeal the declaration of war and thereby end the war. We passed our resolution in spite of your objections and it was sent over to the Senate. The Senate adopted a peace resolution which is similar in substance but different in form. As for me, I am interested in the substance of this legislation. With vital questions at stake I am not inclined to quibble about matters of form. [Applause.] Neither are the people. They want results.

What does this Senate resolution do? Although there was nothing to your argument about the unconstitutionality of the House resolution, your objections in this connection are squarely met by the Senate resolution. It expressly repeals the act declaring war. If you really wanted to end these war-time powers and restrictions which hamper our trade, curtail production, and cause general discontent among our people you would stop your quibbling, forget your partisanship and the advice of one individual, and accept this resolution. Your specious pleading will not fool the people. With peace in Europe for our allies and associates, the people are demanding peace in America. The way is open and before us. Those who vote against it must be prepared to take the consequences they deserve.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. We will.

Mr. PORTER. Can the gentleman from Virginia use some of his time now?

Mr. FLOOD. How many more speeches is the gentleman going to have?

Mr. PORTER. Two.

Mr. FLOOD. I will be glad if the gentleman will have one more speech on that side before we go on.

Mr. PORTER. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. [Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, there has been some controversy over the merits of the two proposals by the two Houses. Speaking personally, I would have preferred that the Senate accept the House resolution. I thought it was a strong statement of our purpose. However, as was said by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. PORTER], time is of the essence here. Everywhere we are told that the attenuated situation in the world, without anything definite stated as to the close of the war, has kept things in an unsettled state, which can not be relieved until war is technically ended.

Our purpose is to end the war, technically as it is actually, and I am not so much concerned about the particular form of the resolution, and I do not think either House should feel a pride of opinion as to which particular House initiated it. What we are concerned about is to bring peace to the world. [Applause.] Our concern—and it ought to be the concern of the Democratic Members as much as it is of the Republican Members—is to end this intolerable situation of a war actually ended but technically continuing, a situation in which our country finds itself through the willful determination of only one man, who is the one obstacle that stands in the way of peace. [Applause.] If men would say in public what they say privately, there would not be a dissentient voice from that statement nor a single vote against this resolution.

Our concern is also on this war-time legislation. Our concern is to take away the war powers placed in the hands of the President for war purposes and return to peace legislation. War legislation still exists while technically war is not present. Everyone knows that the war is actually ended, but because it will not end upon the terms of a surrender of American sovereignty and independence preserved by the determination of the Senate, because it will not end technically except on that ground, we propose here to end it not only actually but technically and at the same time preserve American sovereignty and independence. [Applause on the Republican side.]

It is not the Republicans alone who want it; the Democrats want it as much as the Republicans, but they are in an embarrassing situation by being compelled to resist the position of the head of the party. Some of them have done it. Many more will do it. They did it in this House; they did it in the Senate; they did it in Georgia; they did it in Nebraska, in Minnesota, in Michigan, in Washington, in Idaho, in Wisconsin, the Dakotas; and they did it in nearly every State that has spoken, including Rhode Island and Massachusetts. Standing for peace, they will not allow one man because of his willful determination to continue war powers and embarrass the situation to the extent of refusing to make peace unless they can make it on the basis of the surrender of the sovereignty of the Nation and of its independence. The events in Europe speak loudly upon the wisdom of this flood of public protest in the country. Gentlemen, the thing to do is to pass this resolution now and end the war. [Applause.]

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MASON]. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for six minutes.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, referring briefly to my good friend from Texas, Mr. CONNALLY—and he knows with what sincerity I say "my good friend"—I was struck by his proposition that we had yielded to the Senate. All legislation comes by consultation and compromise. I thought the better resolution was simply a declaration of peace with all the world. That resolution I introduced eight months ago. I yielded my judgment to better lawyers upon our committee and accepted the resolution. I stood for it when it passed the House. Realizing, however, that there have been some changes in matter of form but not in substance in the Senate resolution, I am very glad to give my vote in concurrence.

I was surprised and hurt when my friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] called attention to the shocking fact that we had yielded our judgment in some matters of form to the Senate of the United States, which is the body having most to do with matters international, and I want to say to him that I am proud to be a member of a party that numbers among its membership men who are willing to do such a thing. I would much rather yield my judgment to a majority of Senators elected by the people of this country from a majority of the States of the Union than yield my judgment and my vote, as you have been doing, to one sick man at the other end of the Avenue. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Day after day, and you know it—perhaps it is political sense and political wisdom—the Democratic side of the House in the last Congress and in this has been the most subservient of any Congress that ever served in waiting for the White House to take snuff before you would condescend to sneeze. You have an idea that it is your duty. I am not complaining of you, but I beg of you not to complain of me or my party when we, anxious for peace, anxious to answer the cry of a hundred million people to give us peace, meet on common ground with Senators, agree to their suggestions, and carry out what the people of the country want—a declaration by the war-making power that we are at peace.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] says, "What will our allies say?" We have no allies. Get away from that doctrine. It came to you every hour from the White House. If you have read the armistice, you know that we have no allies. We were simply associated in that war. I will tell you, however, what they will say. They have horned us out of business in Germany. England established her commercial branch in Berlin in 10 days after the armistice was signed. If now, as an American merchant, you want to buy from Germany, you have to get a Frenchman or an Englishman to buy for you. That is what they are saying to us. They are saying to us, "Keep out of peace"—and they will horn out Uncle Sam—"give us the business, keep yourselves in a state of war, and we will get the business not only of Russia but of Germany."

Mr. FLOOD rose.

Mr. MASON. I can not yield in five minutes. That is what the Allies are saying. Ah, but one gentleman says, "Why have we not passed some laws"? This is the law that repeals the war laws. [Applause on the Republican side.] This is what you wanted. Ninety-five per cent of the war legislation ends with war. Ninety-five per cent of the legislation, the drastic legislation under which your President to-day is arresting men because they quit work, ends with the declaration of peace. We waited for the President and the Senate for a long year and a quarter to make a treaty of peace. We have now reached the time when we are going to repeal those laws; and, believe me, the Supreme Court of the United States will say that every one of those laws ended by the declaration of peace by the Congress of the United States. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman says that by accepting this amendment we admit that there is some limitation to congressional power. I wish to God the President had some such idea with regard to limitation of Executive power. There is a limitation of our power, it is quite true. You can not negotiate a treaty of peace, and neither can he make a treaty of peace unless it is ratified by the Senate. There is a limitation of power. I am glad for my party, if they have ever been guilty of forgetting the limitations of legislative and executive power, that we have come back to the old lines of Americanism where, as plain American Congressmen, we admit there is some limitation to legislative power. I wish the President had been born with that idea. If he had any idea of the limitation of Executive power, he never would have sent our troops into Siberia and northern Russia, there to fight his personal war for the collection of the debts of the people of ancient Russia to the bankers of France and Great Britain. If he had any idea of the limitation of Executive power, he would not keep the people of the United States to-day, the women and children, paying taxes on their shoes and stockings in order to maintain 15,000 men in Germany, after the treaty of peace has been rejected. We have no more business with our troops in Germany than we would have with them in Great Britain. He had the right to send them there after the signing of the armistice; he had the right to keep them there after the signing of the ancillary convention in June, 1919, a year after the armistice was signed. Now, when the treaty failed of ratification that power ceased. He has absolutely no idea of the limitation of the Executive power we conceded to him during the war. He now seeks by the control of his party organization to whip you into line—and you know it—to carry out his personal and selfish desire to continue in his hands the power he had during the war. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendments.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 228, nays 139, answered "present" 1, not voting 59, as follows:

WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. KAHN and Mr. LANGLEY rose.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN] is recognized.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of War regarding a West Point matter which was discussed in the newspapers recently.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the Secretary of War relative to West Point. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The following is the letter referred to:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 11, 1920.

Hon. JULIUS KAHN,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. KAHN: I have received your letter of May 13 with regard to House resolution 551, introduced by the Hon. FRED A. BRITTEN, requesting that certain information be furnished to the House of Representatives.

The resolution recites certain statements attributed to Hon. Charles W. Eliot, president emeritus of Harvard University, which statements are said to have been made in an address before the Harvard Teachers' Association as well as in a letter to Brig. Gen. John W. Ruckman, commander of the North Atlantic Coast Artillery district.

I have not had any opportunity to see President Eliot's address before the Harvard Teachers' Association, nor have I as yet seen any letter from President Eliot to Gen. Ruckman or from Gen. Ruckman to President Eliot. The statements attributed to President Eliot, however, seem quite definite, and, for the information of the Committee on Military Affairs, I beg leave to recite the criticisms with certain corrective data and comments. Needless to say, the Military Academy at West Point is an institution of supreme national importance. If these criticisms or any other serious reflection upon its efficiency can be sustained, it is the joint duty of the Congress and the Secretary of War patiently and thoroughly to bring about all changes necessary to adapt the institution to its high public purpose.

I undertake to state separately the criticisms attributed to President Eliot.

1. "No American school or college intended for youths between 18 and 20 years of age should accept such ill-prepared material as West Point accepts."

Admission to West Point is extended to youths designated by Senators and Members of the House of Representatives under an apportionment plan. A certain number of appointments are at the disposal of the President, and these have for many years been restricted by Presidents to applicants who are the sons of Regular Army and Navy officers, for the reason that such boys have no fixed residence and are therefore not eligible to appointment by Senators or Representatives, whose appointees must, in the one case, be actual residents of the State, and, in the other, actual residents of the congressional district from which they are appointed.

For many years both Senators and Members of the House of Representatives have relied upon competitive examinations among the various boys desiring appointment to a vacancy. This practice is not universal but common. The result is that the candidates presenting themselves for admission to West Point are a cross section of the educated youth of the country; not, it is true, of any one district or section in which the educational facilities may be deemed especially excellent, but of the entire country; not often the sons of the rich, whose opportunities for special training are peculiar, but rather the talented sons of people of moderate circumstances, to whom education at the expense of the Government is an opportunity not otherwise obtainable, and to whom the rewards of Army service, though modest, are acceptable.

For more than 30 years I have been observing appointments to West Point. I have never known a school in which a dull boy was even permitted to try for the academy. On the contrary, in every school with which I have any acquaintance, unusually talented boys are selected by their masters as being probably able to get into West Point and to complete its course, and I think it may be fair to say that generally throughout the country secondary schools regard it as a distinction to have their graduates succeed in making West Point and being graduated by it.

The boys who seek these appointments, almost without exception, present to their Congressmen letters from their teachers setting forth their superior scholarship, and Congressmen are loath to appoint boys who may fail, both for the sake of the boys and for the good name of the educational facilities of their districts, in which they and their constituents have a deep interest.

When, however, by this process boys are appointed to the academy, they are received only upon presenting a certificate of successful graduation from an accredited high school, secondary school, or attendance in regular standing at a recognized college or university, or by passing an entrance examination, under Army supervision, or presenting a certificate of examination by the College Entrance Examining Board, as to all of which the standard 14 points of credit are required. These requirements are rigidly enforced by an academic board which is, by statute, independent of political control. Even the Secretary of War may not overrule the academic board, and while I have frequently heard criticism and complaint of the board, it has always been against the rigidity with which it adheres to a high academic standard. Certainly, since I have been officially connected with the War Department I have never heard from any quarter a suggestion that the board abated or moderated its requirements out of any consideration of personal favor, athletic eligibility, official or social prominence, or indeed any other reason.

From 1838 to 1915 the total number of candidates who have presented themselves for admission to West Point has been 17,919. Of these 8,352 have been admitted. Of the residue 4,220 were rejected for admission by the academic board; 2,746 failed to report; 921 were rejected by the medical board; 573 were rejected by the joint action of the academic board and the medical board; 698 passed, for whom no vacancies existed; 198 failed to complete the examination; 188 declined appointments after completing the examination, and 53 appointments were canceled.

It thus appears that the process of selection is countrywide; that the requirements, from a purely academic standpoint, are adequately high, and that the standards are rigidly enforced.

If the comment of President Eliot be based upon a belief that college entrance examinations in this country have blighted the usefulness of secondary schools by making ability to pass into college the objective, rather than the education of the pupils who attend secondary schools, I, of course, agree with him. While I think the evil is lessening, I still think that vast numbers of young men and women have in the past gotten out of high school only ability to pass into a college which they never expect to attend, rather than the degree of culture which the high school could have given had that been its main objective.

But taking American secondary education as it is, for rich and poor, in the city and in the country, East and West, I am persuaded that no college drawing its students from a wide geographical area compares with West Point in the quality of the material which it receives, and if more uniform excellence could be obtained by sectional or class selection, surely the exchange would be a bad one for the national constituency which the academy has always had.

2. "No school or college should have a completely prescribed curriculum."

I would not attach any value to any opinion I might express in the controversy between the prescribed curriculum and the free elective system of collegiate education. I am told by educators that the tendency is somewhat away from the degree of freedom at one time permitted in our greatest colleges, and that somewhat more supervision is being retained over students' election with a view to according recognition to special capacities but still requiring a balanced, if special, education at the end. Without entering that discussion, however, I venture to point out that it can not be conceded that West Point has a fixed, inelastic, and unchanging curriculum. In 1917 I appointed a board to examine the curriculum at the academy, recognizing that the relation of military art to science was constantly changing, and that the requirements of military men, both in their military and civil relations, were modified with every real change in scientific knowledge or social organization. The chairman of this board was Maj. Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, himself a West Point man, it is true, and a veteran soldier, but limited by no military traditions in the originality, fertility, and freedom of his intellect; a broadly cultured and scholarly man. America's entrance into the World War interrupted the immediate modification of the course and required an intensive devotion on the part of the academy to the rapid training of an increased number of officers. But the Bliss board was only one in a continuing series of investigations and inquiries, and since the termination of hostilities modifications have been made, and are being made with the object of adapting the instruction at the academy to the demands which this war has shown will be made upon military men, and to bring the spirit of the academy into the fullest harmony with the spirit of the country toward the Army, and, I may say, a most handsome and democratic spirit, as shown by our recent experience.

After all, West Point is a special school, as is the Naval Academy at Annapolis, as is any school of mines, or of chemistry, or of languages. This does not justify the turning out of soldiers, or mining engineers, or chemists, who know nothing else; but it does justify a course of instruction which emphasizes the specialty, while it produces an educated man. The purpose of West Point, therefore, is not to act as a glorified drill sergeant, but to lay a foundation upon which a career of growth in military knowledge can be based, and to accompany it with two indispensable additions; first, such a general training as educated men find necessary for intelligent intercourse with one another, and second, the inculcation of a set of virtues admirable always, but indispensable in the soldier. Men may be inexact, or even untruthful, in ordinary matters, and suffer as a consequence only the disesteem of their associates, or the inconveniences of unfavorable litigation, but the inexact or untruthful soldier trifles with the lives of his fellow men, and the honor of his Government, and it is, therefore, no matter of idle pride, but rather of stern disciplinary necessity that makes West Point require of her students a character for trustworthiness which knows no evasions.

I ought to point out that West Point is but the beginning of education in the Army. In each of the services there are continuation schools of growing breadth and usefulness, and the plan toward which Army education is tending will more and more seek only the fundamentals, both of education and character, at West Point, and look more and more to the special schools for the technical, scientific completion. This, I believe, is in harmony with the relation between the modern college and university, and it is already far advanced in practice. How much further it can go without sacrificing the necessary special or military training at West Point it is impossible to say, but military science is a varied and intricate body of learning, relating itself to all the sciences which deal with material things, and coupling them up with the subtler bodies of knowledge which control the actions of men singly and in the mass.

Army education, therefore, like the purpose for which armies are made, must concentrate on its objective, and however wide a field it covers, and however many elements it must comprehend, it can not be diffuse in its result.

A perfectly practical test can be challenged, I think, without fear by West Point. Its graduates will bear themselves as well in a mixed company of educated men as any other similar group from any other college in expression, comprehension, and that cultured restraint which characterizes the intercourse of educated men.

Another test may be appealed to with confidence. During the first hundred years (1802–1902) of its existence, 2,371 graduates of West Point left the Army to go into civil life. The occupations of these graduates are shown in the following table:

Not all of the foregoing occupations are significant of intellectual supremacy or necessarily superior training, but the list is one which could not have been made by a college with an inadequate or archaic system of education. These men have stepped out of West Point into civil life and qualified in large numbers for positions from the very highest within the gift of the people, in all walks of life; a list quite too large and imposing to represent the triumph of talent over obstruction.

3. "No school or college should have its teaching done almost exclusively by recent graduates of the same school or college who are not teachers and who serve short terms."

The special character of the education which West Point must give limits the field of selection of its teachers, but two observations can be made with regard to this criticism:

First. It is a very common practice among educational institutions of all grades and kinds in this country. Successful students are singled out and made instructors in our colleges and universities generally, and for very excellent reasons. Their loyalty to their alma mater makes them desire the distinction of being on her teaching staff; their talents have been under actual observation, and they are chosen on the basis of knowledge rather than reputation; they know the institution, its ideals, and its traditions, and they can be relied upon to maintain and improve the things which have been to them an inspiration.

And, second, there is much more permanency in the academic staff at West Point than is at all commonly supposed. Of the 12 heads of departments, 7 are permanent and 5 are detailed for periods of four years. Assistant professors are detailed from officers of the Army having had previous experience as instructors; instructors are detailed for periods of four years. Hence, a man does not become an assistant professor who has not had actual, successful teaching experience as an instructor; similarly men are not detailed as instructors immediately upon graduation, but must normally serve at least four years as officers before being considered as eligible to return to the academy. Under the Army system of education alluded to above, this means further study in higher schools and actual experience in the field in the application of that knowledge.

Two of the 12 department heads are nongraduates of the institution; some of the instructors are nongraduates. The whole system of instruction is under the direct, personal, and daily supervision of the department heads; classes are divided into sections, which are in turn supervised by the head of the department, and the number of instructors at the academy is in the ratio of 1 to each 6 cadets.

Whether or not it would be wise to bring in more nongraduates as instructors may be open to question, but it can not be fairly said of the academy that its teaching is done by recent graduates, or, to any large extent, by men who are not teachers, or by men who serve short terms.

4. "The graduates of West Point during the World War, both in the field and in business offices, did not escape, with few exceptions, from the methods which they had been taught and drilled in during peace. The methods of fighting were, in the main, new and the methods of supply and account ought to have been new. The red-tape methods prescribed to the American Regular Army officers of passing the buck were very mischievous all through the actual fighting and remain a serious impediment to the efficiency of the War Department to this day."

Nothing short of omniscience can analyze the intricate, multiplied, and scattered activities of the War Department during the recent war at home and in the field, give just weight to the circumstances surrounding these activities, and apportion either the credit for success or the blame for mistake as between the persons engaged in those activities. The handful of West Point graduates, the larger handful of Regular Army officers drawn from civil life, reserve officers, officers of the National Guard, and the vastly larger body of officers hastily instructed in officers' training camps altogether comprised approximately 205,000 men, of whom the West Point graduates numbered 3,081. In the performance of their work these officers were aided by an immense body of civilians—captains of industry, masters of business; scientific, technical, commercial, industrial, and all other kinds of experts worked side by side. A substantial part of the purely military business of the Army was thus done by men fresh from civil life, while the business questions of Army supply—from the mining of ore and the raising of sheep to the bullet in the soldier's belt and the coat on his back—were subdivided into great departments, supervised by the most expert men in those subjects in the civil life of the country. Any enumeration of names, even of the most distinguished men of business who cooperated, either as appointees or "dollar-a-year" men or as volunteers in the reorganization of the Nation's industrial facilities around the Army, is unnecessary, for everybody knows them. There was no talent or capacity in this country not available to the Nation's service, and it is equally well known that these talents and capacities were used in places of influence and discretion. It is my settled conviction that the commercial and industrial organization of America during the war was a colossal success; but whether it was or not, the result was not an outcome of the system of education at West Point. The thing done was done by the Nation and all the varied processes by which our citizens are trained contributed.

The business of the Government of the United States and of its great executive departments is necessarily large. It is conducted under a system of statutes, supplemented by regulations, which, as the result of experience, undertake to fix the responsibility for official action to safeguard the Public Treasury and to provide for the orderly dispatch of public business. That this system may be slow at times may be conceded; it is constantly undergoing modification in the direction of simplicity, but considerations of public safety require that these transactions be matters of record and that the person who is responsible for a decision should make the decision. The consequence is that many persons, unfamiliar with the extent of the Government's business, become impatient at delay and characterize as "red tape" obstructions which stand in the way of the immediate dispatch of their business. Those who are familiar with the requirements of the Comptroller of the Treasury and the auditor, those who know what the statutes require and appreciate the sleepless vigilance necessary to protect the Public Treasury against improvident expenditures and unauthorized disbursements, have less sympathy with such a characterization.

In the same way this criticism speaks of a tendency to "pass the buck," which no doubt refers to the experience of those who approach a man in uniform, ask him to decide some question affecting their interests, and are referred by him to somebody else for a decision. The citizen naturally does not understand the distribution of responsibility in a great public department. He finds himself referred from one person to another and is both mystified and irritated. This was more especially true during the war than in ordinary times, and yet the explanation in both instances is simple: There is as to each question a proper person to decide it; to ask the wrong person can have but one or the other of two results, either to be referred to the right person or get an unauthorized answer. In the expansions and reorganizations entailed by the war subdivisions of functions and authority were multiplied, and often men in responsible places, busy about their own concerns, were uncertain as to the allocation of other functions, and consequently not helpful when they tried to refer questioners to others.

The War Department has been under continuous investigation by committees of the Senate and the House of Representatives from the day war was declared. These investigations have not been concerned, for the most part, with the result achieved but rather with the methods used. If so-called "red tape" had been thrown to the winds, shortcuts and direct approaches preferred, prudential considerations abandoned, and safeguards upon the Public Treasury neglected, it is impossible to say whether the war would have been shortened, but the inquiries of the Congress would have been shortened by the absence of records and of any sort of process by which responsibility could be fixed upon anybody for anything. As it is, as each transaction is inquired into, complete and detailed public records are supplied, and the persons produced who decided all questions upon which action was based. Large recoveries of public money have been effected, just settlements accomplished in thousands of complicated contracts, innocent persons protected against aspersion and calumny, and the public mind permitted to rest on evidence that vast expenditures were honestly made.

The statement to which this comment is addressed alleges that the methods of fighting were, in the main, new. Of course, the exact opposite is the fact. Methods of fighting were, in the main, old, and the success of the American Army lay in the fact that those who were responsible for it required it to be trained in accordance with fundamental military experience and knowledge. It is said that by reason of the tremendous emergency the British Army was for a time able to train its fresh levies only in the new kind of warfare, which grew up out of the trenches. But the final breaking of the lines and overthrow of the Germany Army was accomplished by men who had been taught not merely to hold a trench but to break a line and to maneuver in the open after the line had been broken.

The comment seems to imply a belief, on President Eliot's part, that graduates of West Point have not shown up well in the military history of the United States. It is incredible that he could really entertain this belief. In every war in which the United States has been engaged since the academy was established, its graduates have been conspicuous, alike for heroism and success. The following list is made up of names which illustrate American history. They are graduates of the Military Academy, and they are men whose memory we teach our children to revere:

Indian Wars: Custer, Crooke, Wright, Mackenzie, Cooke, A. S. Johnston, Jefferson Davis, Abercrombie, Casey, McCall, Canby, Rains.

Mexican War: Swift, Sherman, Totten, Bragg, R. E. Lee, McClellan, Beauregard, Huger, Reno, Grant, Jefferson Davis, Early.

Civil War: General officers in Union Army, 294; in Confederate Army, 151: Grant, Sherman, Sheridan, Schofield, Buell, Burnside, Gillmore, Halleck, Hancock, Heintzelman, Hooker, Howard, Humphreys, Kilpatrick, Lyon, Meade, Merritt, McClellan, McDowell, Ord, Pope, Porter, Reynolds, Rosecrans, Slocum, Thomas, Warren, Wright, Beauregard, Bragg, Cooper, Hood, A. S. Johnston, J. E. Johnston, R. E. Lee, Kirby Smith, Anderson, Buckner, Early, Ewell, Hardee, A. P. Hill, D. H. Hill, Holmes, Jackson, S. D. Lee, Longstreet, Pemberton, Polk, A. P. Stewart, Wheeler, Fitz. Lee, Lovell, Pickett, J. E. B. Stuart, Van Dorn.

Spanish War: Otis, King, Fitz. Lee, Wheeler, Bell, Pershing, Lawton, Barry.

Explorers, builders of railroads, canals, lighthouses, etc.: Swift, Totten, McClellan, Poe, Abbott, Warren, Humphreys, Talcott, Comstock, Bache, Wheeler, Wright, Whistler, Sidell, Porter, Wilson, Greene, Du Pont, Ludlow, Meigs, Griffin, Holden, Black, Goethals, Sibert, Gaillard, Casey, Hodges.

Public life: Grant, Polk, McClellan, Hancock, Porter, Buckner, Lee, Longstreet, Du Pont, Briggs.

World War: Pershing, March, Bliss, Bullard, Liggett, Goethals, Summerall, Jervey, Scott, Graves, Biddle, McAndrew, Black, Richardson, Connor, etc.

Only one other aspect of this particular criticism requires comment. It is plainly suggested that the Regular Army officers, and by inference especially West Point graduates, did not show up well in the business requirements of the war. Again the names of successful administrators in the Army would be too long for enumeration. But the Army's present difficulty is that its officers, having become known to the great business executives of the country who worked with them during the war, are now being eagerly sought for absorption into their enterprises to such an extent that it is difficult for us to retain their services in the Army. About 2,500 officers of the Regular Army have resigned since the armistice to accept invitations in industry and commerce. Most of these have been nongraduates of the Military Academy, upon whom no criticism is made, but the vast and uninspiring task of closing up the business of a great war has fallen upon the shoulders of those who remained, and they are performing it not merely with a willing spirit, but with competence and loyalty to the interests of the Government which are a credit alike to their character and to the training which has made them soldiers.

5. "The Regular Army ought to be abolished as soon as the United States becomes a member of the League of Nations. No nation should be allowed to maintain an army of the kind called regular; that is, an army all of whose officers are men who have embraced for life the profession of soldier."

It will be conceded that if we are to maintain any kind of an Army it ought to be efficient. It will further be conceded by those who know the facts that the essentials of military science can not be adequately conserved for the use of a country by the casual interest of unsystematized volunteer organizations. Some organization seems to be necessary to study, develop, and in time of necessity disseminate those effective principles which protect our own soldiers and citizens and give them maximum efficiency against the enemy. Whether this body be called a Regular Army or not is immaterial. Every humane and enlightened mind sympathizes with the aspiration of Dr. Eliot for the coming of the time when armament can be reduced and armies demobilized. I personally heartily agree with him that the League of Nations is the best hope of the world for the advancing of that time; indeed, I see no other way in which even partial disarmament can be secured except by international concert of opinion and power.

If this criticism, however, is to be taken to imply that a Regular Army in the United States is a menace to free institutions or is provocative of wars of aggression, I frankly challenge its historical truth. I know of no war in which America has been engaged, offensive or defensive, which was brought about by Army pressure or, indeed, stimulated by military desire, nor has there been within my lifetime or within the history of the country, so far as my knowledge of it goes, a time when the Army or Army opinion was in the slightest degree menacing to the liberties of the American people or insubordinate to civil control.

I regret to have trespassed to such an extent upon your time. The Military Academy at West Point has won the admiration of foreign soldiers and statesmen; its graduates have served the Nation in every crisis of war, as they have ornamented the life of the Nation in times of peace. Largely as the result of the war and the experiences engaged in it the whole Regular Army is becoming an educational institution; it is to-day the largest university in the world; more than 100,000 soldiers are being trained vocationally or educated in the Army, and recruits are flocking to it professedly to take advantage of its educational opportunities. That this opportunity for service to the public life of the country has been sympathetically received and is being energetically applied by the Regular Army officers would seem to be an additional indication of the liberality of mind which pervades the Army as an institution.

House resolution 551, upon which this letter comments, calls upon the Congress to cause an investigation to be made into the situation at the Military Academy. I respectfully call to your attention the fact that the Board of Visitors at the Military Academy, consisting of Members of the Senate and House of Representatives, annually visits the academy and keeps in close touch with its courses of instruction and all of its interests and activities, and I do not believe any further investigation can add anything to the knowledge already in the possession of your committee and of the Congress generally.

Respectfully, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

RELIEF OF SNAKE RIVER SETTLERS.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 12626 and agree to the Senate amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a bill which the Clerk will report and agree to the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 12626) for the relief of certain persons to whom, or their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands along the Snake River, in the State of Idaho, under an erroneous survey made in 1883.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Unanimous consent has not been granted yet, has it?

The SPEAKER. No unanimous consent has been asked.

Mr. BLANTON. It is necessary in order to take it from the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WALSH. It is a Senate amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh!

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 1, lines 5 and 6, strike out "not less than."

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, the House bill reported by the committee provided that the Secretary of the Interior might sell these lands at $1.25 an acre to these settlers who have been on the lands for some 30 years. It seems that on account of an erroneous survey the lands which they have been living on for years are not the lands described in the patents. And the House committee bill provided that on the payment of $1.25 for these lands they may secure patent to the same. And then an amendment was put in in the House to make the price not less than $1.25 an acre. That was stricken out in the Senate for the reason that the Department of the Interior holds that the phrase "not less than" $1.25 an acre would require the appraisal of these lands, and the men who have been living on the lands would have to pay the appraised price. Some of these lands are worth $150 and $300 an acre. These men have been living on the land for some 30 years. Very valuable orchards and very valuable improvements are upon the lands in question.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, as I understand, this bill was under consideration in the House, and the House amended it by inserting the language "not less than." After consideration the bill passed by unanimous consent. The gentlemen in charge of the bill blithely consent to put in this amendment, and then walk over to the Senate and allow it to be struck out.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I want to say that the bill was reached on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and one of the conditions that the bill should be considered was to accept the amendment.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I say that they blithely accept the amendment in the House and walk over to the Senate and ask some interested Senator to strike out the language, and then walk into the House at this stage of proceedings and blithely ask the House to accept the Senate amendment. That is not good faith to the House, in my opinion.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The statement of the gentleman is unwarranted by the facts.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I did not state anything that was not a fact.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The gentleman certainly intimated that we had not acted in good faith with the House. When this amendment was accepted in the House we supposed it was harmless, but after the bill was passed the legal officer of the Department of the Interior stated that the words "not less than," if left in the bill, would, under an opinion rendered in connection with the use of the same words in the coal-land law, require an appraisal of the land. That statement was made to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Public Lands, and it is made to this House in absolutely good faith, and the gentleman from Illinois or no other Member of Congress has any right to impute any wrong motives to any Member of the House unless he has good reason for it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not imputing wrong motives. But I say that it is unfair to the Members of the House to come here and ask us to pass bills on the Unanimous Consent Calendar, and agree to the amendment at the time, and then go to the Senate and have that amendment stricken out and ask that the House agree to the Senate amendment without consideration.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I have not the floor.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I want to make this statement: While I have not served in the House as long as the gentleman from Illinois, I will leave it to the Members whether I am not as honorable and frank in the consideration of legislation as is the gentleman from Illinois. I consider his insinuation a direct insult to me and the other members of the Public Lands Committee, and I resent it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not care whether the gentleman resents it or not. I am not trying to reflect on the honorableness of the gentleman from Idaho. I am calling the attention of the House to the fact what when unanimous consent is given to the consideration of a bill and we agree to the amendment in the House, they go straight to the Senate and ask that it be stricken out, and then come back and ask the House to consider the amendment of the Senate.

Mr. OLIVER. Was there anything that indicated that the House desired these men to pay more than the dollar and a quarter at the time the amendment was accepted?

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Absolutely not. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] said that he did not think they should pay anything, but the bill was drawn by the department and the price fixed at $1.25 per acre, and we consented to the amendment of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. The reason the gentleman from Illinois was giving the gentleman from Idaho a little chastisement was for not knowing the reason for this amendment when he permitted it to go on the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I did not know that the gentleman from Idaho was the author of the bill.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. It is an Idaho matter.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There is nothing here to indicate it. It does not make any difference. It is not fair to the House.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I will leave it to the membership of this House whether it is not fair to consider the Senate amendment after explaining the facts to the House.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the amendment which the Senate has stricken out in this bill was offered in the House by me and accepted by those who had charge of the bill. Now, the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. SMITH] said that he accepted it because he thought the amendment was harmless, but I am sure I offered it because I thought the amendment might be of some public benefit.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Did not the gentleman say in the debate that he did not believe these settlers should be required to pay anything, because they had been living on the land for 30 years and had a patent to it, and supposed it belonged to them?

Mr. GARD. I do not know.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. The RECORD will show it.

Mr. GARD. I am willing to stand by the RECORD. I do not recall what I did say. What I say in regard to this amendment is this, that the amendment had been accepted by those in charge of the bill. Then we had word—so I get it from those now in charge of the bill—that some one in the Department of the Interior said it would be necessary to have an appraisement of this land if the amendment of the House were not stricken out. I do not see that very much harm would result either way. I maintain the position I took in the House before, that if these people had the land and thought they had the land and had it rightfully, but could not acquire it legally under an erroneous survey, then I am in favor of seeing that they get the land they should have, whether they pay $1.25 an acre for it or whether they do not pay anything for it. I want to do entire justice to these people who had the land, but I do not see how harm would come from the appraisement of this land at this time, because the bill still would provide that the Department of the Interior could sell it to the people who were entitled to it—assuming that they are entitled to it by their previous occupation—for not less than $1.25 per acre.

Now, the only dispute is about the words "not less than." If you make it "$1.25 an acre," they can make the transfer without any appraisement. On the other hand, if that language remains in, then they do require an appraisement. I do not see that any harm results; but, in fact, some good may result to the great body of the people of the United States in knowing the value of the land, because the only criticism I have regarding matters of this kind is that we do not have as much information about them as we should have. That may be a criticism upon myself individually, but I am sure the membership of the House generally are not as well informed on these matters of public lands as they should be, and are obliged to take the word of the gentlemen of the committee, and therefore we should have a full and fair and frank discussion always by members of the committee in informing us just what the conditions are.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Is not this the practical difficulty: If these people had gotten the lands which they supposed they were getting, they would have gotten them at $1.25? Now, an error is discovered in the survey, and these people have established their homes there and planted their orchards and put improvements on the land, which have brought up its value, and under appraisement the lands might be shown to be worth two or three hundred dollars an acre.

Mr. GARD. That would not make any difference. Still under the bill they would get the land for $1.25.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. But suppose under the appraisement these lands were shown to be worth $300 an acre, and the man would be compelled perhaps to pay $300 an acre, and much of that $300 an acre has resulted from his own industry after he has gotten this land which he expected to get, and which he did not eventually get by reason of a mistake for which he was not responsible, and for which he would have only paid $1.25 an acre. Is not that the situation?

Mr. GARD. The gentleman apparently does not understand the bill, because the bill provides in its present form that under the direction of the Department of the Interior these lands may be properly adjusted on the basis of not less than $1.25 per acre.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I understand from gentlemen in charge of the bill that if these lands are appraised and the appraisement shows that they are worth around $300 an acre, then the Secretary of the Interior is under obligation to get about that figure.

Mr. GARD. Oh, no. There is nothing of that kind in the bill. They say the Secretary of the Interior, under an old ruling, when it is necessary to appraise them shall appraise them.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. What is the use in appraising them?

Mr. GARD. Let us have them appraised.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Suppose the appraisement shows that they are worth what the gentleman says, $300 an acre. Do you think any department official would undertake to sell them for $1.25? Do you not think he would be open to public censure if he attempted to do that?

Mr. GARD. No. The facts are that these people are occupying lands which they thought they legally owned. Owing to an error in the survey it has developed that they do not own that land in the bottoms, but land up on the mountain side. It is really an adjustment of survey lines. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Yes; but the gentleman has no doubt heard many statements brought in here and charges against public officials for selling things for less than they are worth, such as trucks and automobiles and things like that. Does the gentleman think they ought to put up this land and sell it for less than the appraised value?

Mr. GARD. No. My own position would be that if it were thoroughly established that these men had lived on the land and cultivated it and improved it, they should have it without the payment of any money. That would be my own opinion.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Your position is that if this land is appraised at $150, the Secretary of the Interior can still sell it for $1.25 an acre?

Mr. GARD. Absolutely.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. That is not my understanding of the law. If it is appraised by the Secretary of the Interior he must sell it at the appraised value.

Mr. GARD. No. It was in the bill "not less than $1.25."

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. It requires them to have it appraised, and the gentleman says that under the law they have to have it appraised. What do they have it appraised for? Simply in order to determine its value, and they must get that value for it in the Government's behalf.

Mr. GARD. There is no such contention. The only contention is that it is necessary to appraise it.

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. TINCHER. What possible good could come from the appraisement of this land?

Mr. GARD. The only possible good to come of it would be the information, as I assume Members of Congress generally want to find out the value of public lands that they are acting upon.

Mr. TINCHER. As we passed the bill, and as I understand the gentleman himself says it should be passed, they would pay only $1.25. If they do, what is the use of that appraisement? It would be just the cost of that thrown away.

Mr. GARD. No. The records of the appraisement would remain in the Department of the Interior as a guide as to the value of land in that vicinity. That would be the effect of it.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman again yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If you appraised the lands and by reason of the fact that the settlers had planted orchards on those lands and made them worth $300 an acre, if the Secretary of the Interior acts upon that information, he does an injustice to the man who has honestly tried to comply with the contract with the Government, and if you do not act upon that appraisement you will be spending the public money for no good. But if you do not act on the information you have spent the money to no good end, as it looks to me.

Mr. GARD. There is no great expenditure of public money in that, as far as I can see.

Mr. FRENCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. FRENCH. Let me give an illustration. Suppose the Government should sell and deed to some one here in the city of Washington a few lots supposedly down in Potomac Park near the river and in the course of a few years it should develop that the purchaser, who perhaps had erected a manufacturing plant on the land that had been sold, found when he turned to his deed that it described land not in the former park site but in the middle of the river itself. Would there be any good or any justice in requiring an appraisement of the lands that were sold in order to correct the deed? Surely the Government would not ask the purchaser to pay for the lands over again even if in 30 or 40 years they had increased in value. Now, that is exactly a parallel case. The Government issued patents to lands to these settlers under the homestead laws. The settlers built their homes on what was supposed to be the lands. They cultivated the lands, they put out orchards. Those lands have increased in value until perhaps they are worth $150 an acre. I do not know what they are worth.

Mr. GARD. That is the point. None of us know, and that is the only reason for the appraisement, to ascertain the value.

Mr. FRENCH. But the gentleman does not follow me.

Mr. GARD. I think I do.

Mr. FRENCH. The Government issued patents to lands on the canyon sides. The settlers took the patents and the settlers and the Government have assumed that they described the bottom lands, and it had been so supposed for 30 or 40 years. Now, according to certain surveys, it develops that the lands actually described are on the mountain or canyon side. I submit that no good could come from having a new appraisement, any more than if the city of Washington should sell lots in Potomac Park and it should develop later that the description in the deeds placed the lots in the Potomac River. No good could come from appraising the lots again, and no good or benefit to anyone could come from having an appraisement of the lands in question, and it would mean added expense to the Government.

Mr. GARD. The only suggestion that came from the department.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question. Has the gentleman from Ohio finished?

Mr. GARD. No; I had not finished.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. GARD. I do not care to pursue it any further. If the gentleman wants to move the previous question when I am making a statement, he can do so.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. I thought the gentleman had finished.

Mr. GARD. Go ahead. I do not care to speak any further.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Idaho moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on concurring in the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

HOSPITAL FOR SOLDIERS, SAILORS, AND MARINES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 13627) to amend paragraph (e) of section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines."

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of H. R. 13627, which the Clerk will report by title.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. The bill ought to be reported.

Mr. LANGLEY. Let the bill be reported, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (e) of section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(e) The sum of $550,000 is hereby authorized for the purchase of the land and buildings of the National School of Domestic Arts and Science, located at 2650 Wisconsin Avenue, in the District of Columbia, now under lease to the United States Government as a hospital, and for the construction of such additions and improvements thereto as may be necessary to suitably adapt them to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service: Provided, That the purchase price of said land and buildings shall not exceed $460,000: Provided further, That in addition to the $550,000 hereby authorized, the sum of $250,000 from the amount appropriated by section 5 of the act hereby amended and of $6,000 and of $154,000 from the amounts appropriated by section 6, paragraphs 1 and 2, respectively, of said act, are hereby made available for the above-mentioned purposes and shall remain available until expended."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, this seems to be a rather important matter, and apparently involves the expenditure of some money, a part of which or all of which has been appropriated heretofore, but I do not think we ought to take up a matter like this by unanimous consent without any notice. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I submit a privileged report from the Committee on Rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas submits a report from the Committee on Rules, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 536.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13627) to amend paragraph (e) of section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines," and after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill, and shall continue not to exceed one hour, to be equally divided between those for and against the bill, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule; that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to, when the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the resolution just read merely provides for the consideration of the bill for which unanimous consent has just been refused. The rule provides for not to exceed an hour of general debate and the reading of the bill for amendment.

There is need for additional hospital facilities in the District of Columbia. Indeed, the law already provides for such a hospital, but need for this legislation has been found to enable those in charge to purchase the hospital in question.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Is this a unanimous report from the Committee on Rules?

Mr. LANGLEY. It is.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It is a unanimous report from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and also from the Committee on Rules.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For a question.

Mr. WALSH. What kind of a hospital is this to be?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. A hospital for the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines of the late war—a general hospital.

Mr. WALSH. How does it come to be reported by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. It provides for the purchase of buildings.

Mr. WALSH. I grasp that from having heard the bill read.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. For the reason that the purchase of buildings is provided for, and by the rules of the House such a bill goes to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds.

Mr. LANGLEY. Let me say for the information of the gentleman that this seeks to amend an act which was reported from the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the last session.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps that is where the committee gets jurisdiction, because the bill amends something.

Mr. LANGLEY. It has jurisdiction of all these buildings. This is to provide hospital facilities for soldiers of the late war.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division there were 57 ayes and 8 noes.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, we ought to have a quorum here to consider a matter of this importance, and I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts makes the point of no quorum. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 339, nays 0, answered "present" 1, not voting 87, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13627, and pending that I ask unanimous consent that one half of the time be controlled by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] and the other half by myself.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Texas opposed to the bill? The rule provides that one-half the time shall be controlled by those opposed to the bill.

Mr. LANGLEY. There being apparently no one against the bill, I ask that the gentleman from Texas control it.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I will claim the right to control the time.

The SPEAKER. Is the gentleman from Ohio opposed to the bill?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rule says that those opposed to the bill shall control one-half of the time.

The SPEAKER. But the rule does not say who shall control the time in opposition.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a vote on my motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13627.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly, the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13627, with Mr. GREEN of Iowa in the chair.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (e) of section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(e) The sum of $550,000 is hereby authorized for the purchase of the land and buildings of the National School of Domestic Arts and Science, located at 2650 Wisconsin Avenue, in the District of Columbia, now under lease to the United States Government as a hospital, and for the construction of such additions and improvements thereto as may be necessary to suitably adapt them to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service: Provided, That the purchase price of said land and buildings shall not exceed $460,000: Provided further, That in addition to the $550,000 hereby authorized, the sum of $250,000 from the amount appropriated by section 5 of the act hereby amended and of $6,000 and of $154,000 from the amounts appropriated by section 6, paragraphs 1 and 2, respectively, of said act, are hereby made available for the above-mentioned purposes and shall remain available until expended."

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I shall detain the committee for only a few minutes. I have always had a reverential admiration for our soldiers who fought in all our wars. From my boyhood they have stood apart in my estimation as the real heroes of the Republic. [Applause.] I think everyone will concede that we can never pay fully the debt of gratitude that we owe to them. I am in favor of giving them all as liberal consideration and aid as the finances of our country will permit. I think also you will concede that our first and highest duty is to provide proper hospital facilities for the sick, injured, and wounded soldiers. [Applause.] That is the purpose of this bill, as far as it goes. Our committee has had extensive hearings on the general hospital situation, and I think these hearings will show that we have fully developed all the material facts bearing upon the situation. The Secretary of War, the Secretary of the Treasury, the Director of the War Risk Bureau, the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service, and several subordinate officials, Gen. Wood, chairman of the Board of Managers of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, famous experts on mental and nervous diseases and tuberculosis and their treatment, and many others have all been heard. We discovered during our investigation that there are a good many thousands—I believe about 16,000—of our returned disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines who are without proper hospital treatment. We ascertained that there were available in the national homes for disabled volunteer soldiers something over 9,000 vacant beds. At one hearing we had before us the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service and other officials of that bureau.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANGLEY. In a moment. We had also Gen. Wood, chairman of the board of directors of the national homes, and others, all participating in the hearing and debating the matter fully. They reached the conclusion, and so did we, that those beds could be made available for the treatment of these soldiers. That will still leave several thousand more not properly provided for.

We requested the Secretary of War to appear before our committee a second time, which he did, with a view to determining if we could not obtain space in the unoccupied Army posts so as to further curtail the authorizations which the Secretary of the Treasury and the Public Health Service were asking for. Secretary Baker explained the situation quite fully, and the most that he would consent to was to give us a revocable permit to admit our returned disabled soldiers of the World War into the hospitals attached to these posts, which meant that he could at any time order the patients removed so that these posts could be used for military purposes, for which they were originally intended; and he added the further condition that no tubercular patients were to be admitted to these post hospitals. He explained that if the Mexican situation cleared up it would be necessary for the department to have these posts reoccupied, although at least two of them have not, I am informed, been used for several years, except for housing a sufficient number of persons to look after the buildings. The committee reached the conclusion that it was not wise to undertake to utilize these unoccupied posts for hospital purposes under the circumstances.

This bill is only a step in the direction of providing proper hospital facilities for these men. The committee is now engaged in the consideration of additional legislation, with a view to establishing other hospitals in other sections of the country, particularly for tubercular and mental and nervous diseases, or neuropsychiatric cases, as the doctors call them. We hope to be able to report that bill to the House with a unanimous recommendation and at a very early date. Now, I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman has just stated the matter I was about to inquire respecting, and that is relative to tubercular patients. Does this bill provide for that also?

Mr. LANGLEY. It is to be a general hospital. The purpose of the Health Service is to segregate tubercular patients as much as possible. That will all be embodied, as I have already indicated, in a bill that we will report at an early date—within the next few days, I hope.

I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. ANDREWS], who is the chairman of the subcommittee appointed by the chairman of the committee to investigate the question, and who has well and faithfully performed that duty. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, on the 5th of last December the Secretary of the Treasury submitted a letter to the Speaker of the House with memoranda covering what was supposed to be needs for proper hospitalization for our disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines of the World War. By reference to House Document No. 481 you will find that the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance states that there are 641,000 soldiers, sailors, and marines discharged from the service with some degree of disability. Under the law it becomes the duty of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance to cause a medical examination of the applicants for aid. When the examination discloses a disability exceeding 10 per cent the applicant is regarded as entitled to the provisions of the law for hospitalization.

You will find that under the act of March 3, 1919, certain sums of money were set apart to be used, at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury, for the purpose of caring for such cases. Paragraph (e), section 7, of that act reads as follows:

(e) The sum of $550,000 is hereby authorized for the construction, on land owned by the Government, on a site to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, of a hospital plant complete in the District of Columbia or vicinity.

That money stands at the discretion of the Secretary, to be used by him under the limitations imposed in the paragraph. A diligent search was made by the department for a suitable site on Government ground in the District. They failed to find one that was satisfactory. Consequently no action was taken toward the construction of the buildings. The money, therefore, remains intact, still to be used by the Secretary under these limitations as he may see fit. When the report of the Secretary of December 5 came before your committee for investigation, this appropriation was brought under consideration in the hearings. It occurred to your committee that it would be wise for us to confer with the Surgeon General and the Secretary of the Treasury in the hope that some agreement might be reached on the lines of practical economy and efficiency for the service. That conference led to the conclusion that the property in question ought to be secured for the benefit of the service.

An explanation now in regard to the property: This property was developed for educational purposes by the School of Domestic Arts and Science. When the war came the girls went into the war work and the school closed.

The buildings were then leased for hotel purposes and were in use as such for some months. The Secretary of the Treasury afterwards leased the property for hospital purposes, as he had full authority to do under other provisions of the act of March 3, 1919, and since the 10th of June, 1919, it has been used by the Public Health Service for the benefit of disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines of the World War. When your committee visited the institution they had about 80 or 85 patients. We found upon examination that this, as stated by the Secretary, is an ideal location for a hospital. After proper negotiations by the Treasury Department a price was agreed upon, $460,000, for the purchase of the buildings and grounds. All of the sewer, water, and lighting facilities are complete, in good order. The four stone buildings are comparatively new, and the architect's inspection shows that the value of the improvements on the property is $289,000, in round numbers.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Does the gentleman know what it is assessed for in the District of Columbia, for the purpose of taxes?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I can not answer that question. I did not inquire.

Mr. LAYTON. Where is this property situated?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. At 2650 Wisconsin Avenue, in the vicinity of the Naval Observatory.

Mr. LAYTON. Is it on elevated ground?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. We are informed that the second story of the main buildings is almost on a level with the top of the Washington Monument, and that is about as good as you are going to get. There is a beautiful view from the buildings overlooking the city, attractive in every particular. Property in that locality is selling at from 75 cents to $1.25 per square foot.

The price, after deducting the value of the improvements, will leave the cost of the land at about 34 or 35 cents per square foot. We find that upon the basis of cost we are well within the limits of practical economy. This, perhaps, will answer in part the inquiry made by the gentleman a moment ago. The patients, about 80 or 85 in number, seem to be in cheerful spirits and express great satisfaction because of the favorable location. Now, the Secretary recommends that, in addition to this $550,000, the amount of $410,000 from that same act shall be set apart and used for the enlargement of the institution, which, when so enlarged, will accommodate approximately 300 patients.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Just for two questions. Can the gentleman tell the committee about what we are paying per month now for this property?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Three thousand dollars per month.

Mr. RAKER. One other question: Is that the building that is there where the street car comes along; does that belong to the property?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. The frame building?

Mr. RAKER. Yes, sir.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. So the property comes clear to the street where the street car line runs?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes, sir.

Mr. RAKER. This property was known a year ago as the Mount Alto Hotel?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Exactly.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. MacGREGOR. What is supposed to be the average cost of a building to accommodate one patient?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Well, I can not answer that. I can simply answer in these terms: We will have this property at $460,000, 11¼ acres of ground; $500,000 for enlargement of the institution, which, according to the estimate of the Surgeon General, would accommodate 300 patients.

Mr. MacGREGOR. That is $3,200 per man.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That is the ordinary estimate given by the hospital service in computing the cost of a building, but I might say to the gentleman he will be greatly surprised when he finds in many instances in the construction of hospitals that the price may run from $3,500 to $4,000 per bed. Your committee has tried to adopt a plan by means of which that item will be reduced, and we hope we will be successful.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman excuse me for saying that I wish he would take out of the RECORD the word "plant." I do not like to hear the word "plant" used in connection with a hospital where people may die, and it may look like we were planting them.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Accepting the suggestion of the medical authority from the "empire" of Delaware, I would be glad to change to any word he suggests——

Mr. LAYTON. Institution.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Institution, and I will ask the reporter to so record it. Let me invite your attention to this paragraph of the Sweet bill, which is a reproduction and a slight enlargement upon the provisions of the original war-risk act of October 6, 1917:

Paragraph 6 of section 302 of the Sweet bill (Public, No. 104, 66th Cong.) contains the following:

"(6) In addition to the compensation above provided, the injured shall be furnished by the United States such reasonable governmental medical, surgical, and hospital services, and with such supplies, including wheeled chairs, artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances as the director may determine to be useful and reasonably necessary, which wheeled chairs, artificial limbs, trusses, and similar appliances may be procured by the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in such manner, either by purchase or manufacture, as the director may determine to be advantageous and reasonably necessary."

The certifications thus made by the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance impose upon the Government the duty of furnishing adequate hospital facilities.

Mr. Chairman, let me ask the members of the committee to pause for a moment and meditate upon that provision of law. There is the foundation of the liability of the Government for the work of hospitalization. Now, when your committee was called upon by that communication from the Secretary of the Treasury on December 5, 1919, to provide hospital facilities to the extent of $85,000,000 we thought we had a tremendous problem before us, and so we did. We have reviewed all the facilities of Army posts and cantonments; we have reviewed those services; and we have found that they were not properly supplied with the facilities to meet the permanent necessities resulting from chronic cases. Note for a moment: Out of that 641,000 cases of disability discharged from service, 155,000 applicants have been examined and found entitled to the benefits of the service. One hundred and twelve thousand of that 155,000, having been analyzed carefully, show 15,000 seriously affected with mental trouble, 15,000 and a little more with tubercular troubles, and 81,000 cases of general disability. There is our problem. The certifications are increasing at the rate of 1,200 per month. We have assumed the liability. Under the law we are obligated to meet that, and more than that. We stop not to plead the law, but we stand in recognition of the fact that our first and imperative duty is to provide for the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines to the best possible advantage. [Applause.] Now, when these cases appear these certifications are made by the director, and we are under obligation to find the hospital facilities. Sixteen thousand patients are now under the charge of the Public Health Service alone. The State hospitals and private hospitals in various communities are also used to the limit. Some provision is being made, however imperfect it may be now and then, for all thus far. But here are chronic cases, here are the general disabilities in the numbers I have indicated. How are we providing for them? We must make that provision.

The sundry civil bill recently passed by the House aided your committee very materially in the solution of its problem. Forty-six million dollars was carried by that act to be distributed at the discretion of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and therefore the national home for soldiers came more readily into service than any other institution we might find, and the director now makes the distribution. In the use of that fund he can utilize every Government facility for the care of those men and thus avoid additional expense and the construction of buildings to meet the exigencies. There are 9,000 vacant places in those homes. We bring the boys to fill the places and we may find that the space is then inadequate, and it will be comparatively inexpensive to add new units to those institutions and increase the hospital facilities, the heating plant and overhead charges already being provided for. With that fund your committee can solve that part of its problem easily and well and economically. Moreover, we not only have these tubercular cases and mental cases in the numbers I have indicated, but I am sure that if each one of you will take those figures and the report of the hearings and study them you will find that a large number of chronic cases are there to be provided for during the lifetime of the men.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. I understood the gentleman to say that the Government was now paying $3,000 a month rental for this property. How many beds does that provide for at that rental?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. They have about 80 or 85 patients there now.

Mr. McKEOWN. How long is this contract made for?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. That contract ends as soon as the bill passes. The Government takes the property. And if we refuse to do that, then on the call of the individual who owns the property. He has already called it.

Mr. McKEOWN. The contract was entered into for the purpose of selling the property at the time?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. No, sir. The Secretary of the Treasury practically took charge of it. Not because the owner of the property was hunting for a tenant; he had one. The Government wanted the property and found it best adapted of anything available and practically went in and took it. That is the reason we are there. Let me call your attention to this fact, that the Secretary of the Treasury—and his letter is in the report—the Surgeon General, and the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds are unanimous in their indorsement of this proposition and urge its acceptance as promptly as it can be made.

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will.

Mr. RAKER. Practically all the facilities provided for the disabled ex-service men are now occupied? Is that correct?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes, sir; and we are crowded and troubled at every meeting to find increased facilities. I am told that 500 of these soldiers are in St. Elizabeths. They and their friends are pleading that they may be removed to some place where they will not be mingling with people from all conditions and walks of life.

Mr. RAKER. The idea is to take these men entirely away?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. By and by.

Mr. RAKER. The gentleman thinks that ought to be done?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Yes; I certainly do.

Mr. RAKER. At what particular place now are they providing for the tuberculosis patients?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. They are scattered hither and yon, and they can not be put together.

Mr. RAKER. At what particular point are they providing for the temporary insane?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. As I say, there are 500 here. Those at St. Elizabeths would come in from the ordinary hospitals, or institutions, or any place else.

The appropriations made by the present Congress for the disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines approximate $300,000,000 for compensation, vocational education, medical and hospital care and treatment. The building of a few hospitals for chronic cases is absolutely necessary.

Without taking the time to review in detail the hearings in relation to individual plants, I may invite attention again to the provision carried in the last sundry civil bill for an appropriation of $46,000,000 to be placed under the control of the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance. That appropriation and the methods of its use will aid the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds very materially in the solution of their problems. It will furnish the method by means of which all of the agencies now owned and controlled by the Government suitable for hospital purposes can be used harmoniously and in the line of practical economy. For instance, the national homes for disabled soldiers of prior wars have at this time about 9,000 beds that can be used to assist in caring for the soldiers of the recent World War. Adjustments can be made at this time whereby the soldiers of the World War may have their quarters and suitable hospital provisions without interfering with those who are already in the homes. If hospital facilities at any one of those homes should not be adequate for the enlarged demands placed upon it, it will be a comparatively inexpensive and easy matter to erect a building or buildings to meet such needs. Thus the overhead charges can be avoided and practical economy exercised with respect to grounds and buildings as well as overhead charges. In other words, the board of governors of the soldiers' homes can proceed with their management without interference, and the Public Health Service can be furnished space in which to prosecute its work without interference from other sources.

As the law makes the Director of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance the responsible agent to ascertain who are entitled to hospitalization, it follows naturally that he is the person to make the distribution of the patients where institutions with suitable accommodations can be furnished. As experience will point the way, particular classes of cases can be segregated wisely and assigned where specialization can be properly given.

Two other distinct lines should be carefully studied to provide for those who are suffering from mental troubles and those who are afflicted with tuberculosis. The horrors resulting from the poison gases and the terrible experiences of the war are revealed in most forcible form in many of those cases. From the 15,000 already mentioned who are afflicted with tuberculosis there will be a considerable number of chronic cases. Of the 15,000 afflicted with mental troubles a considerable number may never regain the power of reason. It is therefore very evident that we must make suitable provision for those two classes without delay. The duty is upon us. While financial pressure is tremendous from every direction this demand stands first and is imperative.

I am sure there is no division of opinion at this point. I will not pursue it further at this time.

Your committee will submit very soon definite recommendations in regard to these cases.

The study of this question grows with intensity as we come in contact with the boys who have sacrificed even more than life for their country. As we have mingled with a few of the men in the hospitals that we have visited we have been deeply impressed with the frightful horrors of war. But out of it all there comes a refreshing suggestion in the thought that a kind and overruling Providence has used this chastisement toward the development of a stronger bond of union among the people of the United States of America. The boys from the southland, the northland, the eastland, and the westland, all together making an American land, have united the people of America in bonds of union, in fraternal ties, which we hope will never be broken. They bring our boys from all sections of the country with oneness of purpose, and with a patriotic devotion to the flag, the Constitution, and the Union which none can sever.

Mr. GARD. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. To ask what has been the amount of time consumed by the gentleman from Kentucky?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has consumed altogether 25 minutes and has 5 minutes remaining. In case there is any gentleman opposed to the bill, then that gentleman will be recognized at the conclusion of 30 minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. A parliamentary inquiry. If there is no one that announces he is opposed to the bill——

Mr. GARD. When the Speaker was in the chair he propounded the question, and I announced I was opposed to some of the provisions in the bill, and I understood that the gentleman from Kentucky controlled one-half hour and that I should control one-half hour.

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not think the RECORD will show that. I merely withdrew the request.

Mr. GARD. That is my understanding of what the RECORD shows.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to be right about it, of course.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state the parliamentary situation. Under the rule there was one hour of time, to be equally divided between those in favor of and those opposed to the bill. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that he control 30 minutes of the time, and I think it also included the request of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LANGLEY. I also coupled with that request that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD] control the other half, and the point was raised that he was not opposed to the bill, and I renewed that part of my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The whole point is that no agreement was reached, but if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] is opposed to the bill, then, when the gentleman from Kentucky has exhausted his time, the gentleman from Ohio will be entitled to recognition.

Mr. GARD. I so stated to the Speaker, and I understood the time was allotted to me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky has five minutes more at his disposal.

Mr. LANGLEY. I reserve that.

Mr. KINCHELOE. Will not the gentleman yield one minute more to the time of the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. LANGLEY. I can not do that.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] desire to be recognized?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I claim recognition. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCKEOWN]. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am frank to say that when this bill was first read from the Clerk's desk I thought it was a bad policy to launch upon. Since I have heard these gentlemen explain it and since I have talked with a number of members of the committee, it seems that this property is well situated and well adapted for hospital purposes. But the thing I want to call attention to is that this ought not to be a precedent. I have supported legislation to take care of our wounded soldiers. I voted for the Speedway Hospital at Chicago because I believed it was modern, that it was up to date, that it was the best of its kind in the country, and that is the kind of building I want the United States Government to put its money into when it goes to building hospitals. And I do not want to set a precedent here of buying old buildings or buying buildings that have been constructed that are not modern and not up to date, and will not make suitable hospitals for the future years.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. I will.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I will say that the Surgeon General said to us that he could not construct more suitable buildings for hospital purposes than these are now, and that is the reason he took them. They are fireproof and modern.

Mr. McKEOWN. As I said at the outset, I am not complaining about this particular building, because I do not know anything about it, and I put my confidence in the good judgment of this committee. But I do say it is not good policy to follow up this plan of buying buildings that are not suitable for hospital purposes, not saying that this is not suitable for those purposes, but the policy of spending your money for anything but the very best hospitals.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield at that point?

Mr. McKEOWN. I yield.

Mr. LANGLEY. I desire to assure the gentleman that such is not the policy of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. It is not intended to buy any unsuitable buildings.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am glad to have the assurance of the chairman of that committee. But, gentlemen, there is something else I want to call your attention to. There seems to be a disposition to concentrate these hospitals all around Washington.

Now, gentlemen, here is what we find from our experience: The soldier boy improves more quickly in the neighborhood of his own State or in the vicinity of his home. I have had boys that were brought down in North Carolina and in Georgia in the hospitals write me that they would just as soon be dead as to stay there, and we have had those boys transferred out West, where they came from, and it was but a short time before they were out on the street walking, and they immediately improved. I say it is not right and it is not fair to locate all the hospitals here in the city of Washington, in the District of Columbia. Let us scatter them throughout the United States and put these boys nearer where their relatives live. [Applause.]

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. This law provides—the act of March 3, 1919—for the building of the hospital here. We have left that stand as it is. The need is clearly defined. It is clear that we need an institution here. The program of the committee runs all the way from Oklahoma to California and to the Atlantic coast. Now we have got Oklahoma in line.

Mr. McKEOWN. I am glad that the gentleman has not overlooked that good State, because it has always been hooked up hitherto with the State of Texas, or else they have gone out farther West. If they have got to go to any Southwestern State, Texas is all right; I have no fault to find with the Lone Star State, but feel that Oklahoma is entitled to consideration. Gentlemen, you will make a serious mistake if you permit all the hospitals to be located here in the District of Columbia. The patients ought to be sent out so that they will be within reach of their relatives when they are being taken care of in the hospitals. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM].

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I wish to disclaim at the outset any attitude of opposition to the spirit of this bill. I rise rather for the purpose of making an honest inquiry. I take it for granted that we are all in sympathy with such proper efforts as are being made to get suitable and adequate accommodations and hospital facilities for the wounded and disabled soldiers. If further accommodations of this character be needed here, in that same spirit we are willing to establish them here.

Mr. MacGREGOR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. I have only five minutes. I should like to complete my statement before I yield.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. LANHAM. I notice that the report of this committee says:

> This property consists of four new fireproof and two wood-frame buildings, located on a very desirable site containing 11½ acres of ground, unusually well adapted to hospital purposes. It is estimated, as of June 10, 1919, that the buildings and other improvements were worth $289,920. It appears that unimproved lots in that immediate locality have been selling recently at prices ranging from 75 cents to $1.25 per square foot. It is also stated that these grounds contain 500,940 square feet. At the minimum price of 75 cents per square foot the value of the land alone would be $375,705. Deducting the value of the improvements from the proposed purchase price the actual cost of the land would be $170,080.

Now, adding those two sums, $289,920 and $375,705, for the buildings and the grounds, respectively, we find that in the opinion of the committee the property is worth $665,625. In other words, we are geting it here under this bill at a bargain of $460,000, or approximately $200,000 less than its real worth.

Now, I do not mean to criticize the committee, nor do I mean to criticize the assessor of property for taxes in the District, but I took occasion to inquire of the assessor as to the value of this property. It is assessed for taxes, as you all know, upon a two-thirds valuation. The full value, according to the assessment of 1920, is $183,376, covering both the land and the improvements. In other words, if the statement of the committee be correct as to the value of these buildings and this ground, subtracting the full value as per the 1920 assessment from the full value as estimated here we find a discrepancy of $481,749.

Now, I say I have no disposition to criticize either the committee or the assessor, and I rise simply in order to ask for accurate information. We are living at a time when economy is necessary. We are studying about it and preaching it day and night, and very properly, because the taxpayers are overburdened. We see a great deal in the newspapers of Washington to the effect that the people who reside in the District of Columbia can not afford a substantial raise in their tax rate. They are paying now very much less proportionately than the people in the respective States. And yet, if the committee estimate be correct, the full value of this property, according to the 1920 assessment for taxes, is very much less than one-third of its actual value. It does seem to me that if the committee is correct in its figures and if this case is indicative of the general situation here the people of Washington are not paying their proportionate part for the support of their Government. If the assessor is correct in his figures, then we are paying an exorbitant price for this property.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I think it should be stated in justice to the owners of this property that their first price for the sale of the property to the Government, as I recall it—and I am sure I am correct—was $500,000, and then $475,000, and finally they agreed to accept $460,000. In other words, the owners of the property themselves have never asked $650,000 for it. The report says that property in that vicinity has been sold recently at prices ranging from 75 cents to $1.25 per square foot.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say for the information of the gentleman——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. LANHAM. Can the gentleman give me more time?

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman put in the RECORD the respective assessed value of the land and the buildings?

Mr. LANHAM. I have that according to the report of 1918.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for two minutes more.

Mr. LANHAM. The assessment for 1918 shows the improvements assessed at $83,700 and the land assessed at $25,127, making a total of $108,827. That being two-thirds of the real value, then the real value in accordance with the figures of the assessor in 1918 was $162,941. Now, I have not the respective amounts assessed on improvements and lands for 1920, but the full valuation for 1920 is $183,876, and, of course, taxes are paid upon two-thirds of that.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Does the gentleman know whether the property here is assessed for half its value?

Mr. LANHAM. It is assessed presumably at two-thirds of its value; but in this case, if the figures of the committee be correct, it is assessed for less than one-third of its value.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Does not the gentleman think the fact that it was first used for a girls' school, and in some measure at least for a public institution, may have had some influence upon the placing of the valuation on the property?

Mr. LANHAM. I can not say as to that; but I do know this, that in 1910, 8 acres of this property, with the main frame building on it, sold for about $28,500.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask to be admonished when I have used 10 minutes of my time.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, H. R. 13627 is founded on a bill approved March 3, 1919, to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines.

I am sure every one here would wish to afford every possible facility for the best possible care and treatment of all the disabled and wounded soldiers of the Great War, and in saying what I do about this bill I call attention to some of its provisions rather for information than for the purpose of opposition, so that we all may know just what the bill means.

The original law in section (e) provided that the sum of $550,000 was authorized for the construction, on land owned by the Government on a site to be selected by the Secretary, of a hospital plant complete in the District of Columbia. Now, what I have observed regarding this, as well as the matter we had up yesterday, is that we are facing a tendency to expend great amounts of public money lightly and without consideration.

The time is now here when public expenditures must be looked after and considered in the light of their reason and of their necessity. If they be reasonable and necessary, I am sure there can be no objection. But here, under the guise of building a hospital for $550,000 on land owned by the Government. the committee now come in with a proposition to amend that so as to provide for the purchase of outside land in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ELLIOTT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I can not yield just at this time. It is proposed to take with this land not facilities for hospital purposes but facilities at their best for school purposes, and, of course, the two are not at all consistent. What is sought to be done now under the authorization of $550,000 is to spend $460,000 for an additional site, ground in the District of Columbia, and on top of that the proposition is to spend $90,000 in addition, to take up the full appropriation of $550,000, and then to take from other authorizations in the bill, in section 5, $250,000, and in section 6, paragraphs 1 and 2, $6,000 and $154,000, all for these purposes, which together make up the sum of $910,000.

I am not criticizing any of the real estate transactions in this case. I do not care to comment upon the report of the appraiser or the assessor and on what you are proposing to pay for the land, but I am commenting upon this proposition that no sooner does Congress give an authorization for certain purposes, such as affording a modern, up-to-date hospital at a cost of $550,000 on Government-owned land for disabled and sick soldiers of the late war, than the Treasury Department comes in and wishes to expend an increased amount. We all recognize what the departments do. There is a strife in every department to make itself bigger, to get more things under its jurisdiction. So the Treasury Department now says that it can not find any place in the District of Columbia where land owned by the Government is a proper hospital site, and therefore we must buy new land, and that is what is proposed here.

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LANGLEY. I wish to state that the committee has for several months been engaged in holding hearings having for their primary purpose the cutting down of the expenditures and estimates that were presented to us and urged by the Public Health Service and the Secretary of the Treasury. If we had followed these we would have asked for a much larger authorization than this bill does. Furthermore, the estimates of the value of the property and the additional amounts required are based upon the recommendation submitted to the committee in detail by the department.

Mr. GARD. I do not dispute that the committee has been endeavoring to cut down these appropriations.

Mr. LANGLEY. A total of over $8,500,000 was asked.

Mr. GARD. But the first evidence of it is that they not only do not cut down the appropriation, but they go outside and recommend additional appropriations. Here is what we are doing: Section 5 provides that the sum of $300,000 be appropriated for a contract with any existing hospital or sanatorium. Out of that $300,000 we take $250,000 for this bill.

Section 6 provides for $150,000 for emergency needs of the Public Health Service. We take $6,000 of that. It provides $1,500,000 for emergency fund for the purchase of lands and buildings. We take $154,000 of that for this purpose, going outside of that which Congress has heretofore authorized, because when Congress appropriated $550,000 it was supposed that that would erect here in the District of Columbia a splendid hospital building, put up for hospital purposes. Instead of that we now acquire for $460,000 an old schoolhouse building site, and on top of that we propose to expend nearly $500,000 in order to get the thing in shape.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARD. If I have the time I will.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Has the gentleman seen this "old schoolhouse building site"?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I have.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Your committee have been there and examined it in detail.

Mr. GARD. Yes; I know that. I appreciate that you have, and I do not refer to it in any offensive sense. I referred to it as an old schoolhouse building site, and that is what it was, because it belonged to this domestic-science school.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman state when these buildings were built?

Mr. GARD. I do not know. My recollection is that I was up there at one time when it was called the Mount Alto Inn, I believe. My recollection is that there are three or four stone buildings up there that look like they have been there a long time. I do not know. They are not new buildings; they are old buildings.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. They were built probably three or four years ago.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If the gentleman means that the site is old, I think he is correct, but the buildings are not old.

Mr. GARD. I will accept the judgment of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I will state that the buildings are modern, fireproof, and that the partitions have already been rearranged until they are absolutely suitable for hospital purposes. I went all through them a week ago.

Mr. GARD. This is the point that I desire to call attention to. We appropriated $550,000 in the act of March, 1919, a year ago, for a most excellent purpose, and now we are asked to advance that $550,000 close up to the one million dollar mark. We are leaving our construction of the building on Government property and buying new property and not doing as we were instructed, constructing a new hospital, but revamping a school building more or less old for hospital purposes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. Will the gentleman tell us if the United States has any Government-owned land in the District of Columbia suitable for hospital purposes?

Mr. GARD. I do not know.

Mr. BROOKS of Illinois. The Government owns land down by the navy yard and around the Mall, which is all low land.

Mr. GARD. I am not conversant with the fact, but of course am willing to take the opinion of medical men. But this is not confined to the District of Columbia. It provides for a hospital plant in the District of Columbia or vicinity. In section (e), which the gentleman has before him, the sum of $550,000 is appropriated for the construction on land owned by the Government of a hospital plant complete "in the District of Columbia or vicinity."

Now, my objection, if it be an objection, and I would not have it characterized as an objection if it hindered the bringing of remedial care to any soldier of the Great War, but what I desire to call attention to the membership of the committee and the House and of the country is that it seems to be the policy of the administrative function of this Government to crowd in everything they can; once getting the camel's nose under the tent, there is no question of the amount they seek to claim. That is what they are doing in this case. The appropriation of $550,000 is changed in its meaning and intent and purpose. We leave all that now, buy new land, more land, which we possibly do not need, more room to expend money, put up more buildings, fix up the schoolhouse building, build it according to the latest standard, and possibly tear down some, and all under the guise of an appropriation which we now abandon and wholly change.

Mr. Chairman, I reserve the balance of my time, and I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to correct the impression which might possibly arise from the criticism of the gentleman from Ohio, who has so kindly yielded me time. In reference to his construction of the purpose of the bill, I would like to assure the Members of the House, and the gentleman from Ohio in particular, that it was never the intention of the committee in drafting this bill to give the Public Health Service any power to buy additional land other than that which is acquired under this act.

The paragraph of the bill on page 2 provides that the sums of $250,000, of $6,000, and of $154,000 appropriated under section 5 of the act of March 3 are specifically limited to the improvement of this particular tract of land. There is no authority in this bill giving the Public Health Service or the Secretary of the Treasury any power to buy land outside.

Mr. GARD. It is the intention of the bill to give outside of the $550,000 the sum of $250,000 and $6,000 and $154,000 for the hospital improvements at Mount Alto.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is the purpose of the bill, but I think the gentleman will admit that his comments would lead to a misapprehension as to the purpose of the bill. The money must be expended on these premises under the terms of the bill.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. Has the committee made any effort to secure a proper site outside of the District of Columbia where land can be had very much cheaper?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; under the act of March 3 we were specifically confined to Government-owned land.

Mr. LAYTON. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to say that you were not.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The gentleman from Ohio is wrong if he said that. Under section (e) of the act of March 3 the Public Health Service is required to build a hospital within the District of Columbia on Government-owned land.

Mr. LAYTON. Will the gentleman allow me to read the provision?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON (reading):

(e) The sum of $550,000 is hereby authorized for the construction, on land owned by the Government, on a site to be selected by the Secretary of the Treasury, with the approval of the President, of a hospital plant complete in the District of Columbia or vicinity.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The Secretary of the Treasury has construed that to mean the District of Columbia. The term "vicinity" really gave no latitude, because the Government owns no land in the vicinity that is not preempted for other purposes. The search for a suitable site, however, embraced both the District and vicinity. The Government-owned land, for instance at Tacoma, was reserved and occupied for hospital purposes by the War Department for the benefit of men in the service. The Public Health Service can only extend its beneficence to the discharged soldier.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Did not the fact that these buildings are ready for occupancy at once enter into the consideration?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; they are occupied, and I will say that that fact madé this project appeal to us as a purely business proposition. The Secretary of the Treasury could not secure a tract of land on which a hospital could be constructed in the District of Columbia or in the immediate vicinity. He did find this tract of land upon which there were buildings already erected which can be used for hospital purposes. He acquired the property by lease and immediately put it into good use. By this act of forethought he was able to give hospital accommodation to discharged soldiers a full year ahead of the time in which a complete hospital structure could be erected.

Now, as to the price to be paid for the land and buildings. This committee felt that it could not afford to assume any responsibility on that head and refused to dicker with the owner as to price. We put it up to the Secretary of the Treasury to arrange the terms of the deal and advise us of the result of his negotiations, with his recommendations. His report, as contained in his letter of March 23, 1920, to the chairman of our committee, was couched in the following language:

And concurring in the statements of the Surgeon General of March 23, hereto attached, I have the honor to transmit herewith a proposal from the National School of Domestic Art and Science (Inc.) to sell to the Government their property now under lease to the United States for the sum of $460,000, and to recommend that the legislation providing for a hospital within the District be so amended as to permit the purchase of this property and the further extension and improvement of the accommodations thereon as may be necessary to meet the needs of the Public Health Service for hospital accommodations in the District of Columbia.

Respectfully, D. F. HOUSTON, Secretary.

I wish to add further that his recommendation was based upon no idle or hasty assumption. He had the architect of the Public Health Service make a very careful and painstaking appraisal and estimate of the cost of reproducing the structures as they stood. His appraisal showed that it would cost $289,920 to reproduce the buildings and equipment as they stood, taking into account all proper deductions for depreciation. This left the demand for the land $170,080. Whether this is too high or not I do not pretend to know. We purposely kept our hands off that question, preferring to leave it to the discretion and judgment of the highest financial officer in our Government. His estimate is good enough for me, and the fact that he thinks it fair and reasonable entitles his recommendation to respect. And I would not set up against his judgment the fact that the property happened in 1918 to have been assessed for the amount mentioned by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. LANHAM]. We can all take judicial notice of the fact, I venture to say, that real estate assessors in the District of Columbia have been more than commonly indulgent to landlords, much more so than they have been either to their tenants or intending purchasers.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANGLEY. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER].

Mr. TINCHER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I am somewhat impressed with the statements of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. Of course, no one is going to vote against this bill, because it provides for the purchase of a hospital. The men in charge of the department have said that we must have it for the use of the soldiers, and we will all vote for it, but to the extent of these departments wedging in when you give them a chance, I agree with the gentleman from Ohio. I do not believe that we have any better example of that, or ever will have, than what has recently happened here in the city of Washington. In April the Secretary of War appeared before the Committee on Military Affairs and recommended that the surplus of the nitrate of soda then on hand in possession of the Government—100,000 tons—be loaned to the trust. I was in the Committee on Agriculture at the time that happened, when members from the Committee on Military Affairs came into the Committee on Agriculture and asked us what we knew about it, that being a product which is used in the manufacture of fertilizer. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. HUTCHINSON], a member of that committee, knew all about it. He said, "You do not want to do that," and he took his lead pencil and fixed the resolution so that it was all right, because it provided that the Government should sell the nitrate now, at a time when the price for it is higher than it has ever been or ever will be again. He said, "We either ought to reduce the price and sell to the farmers at a reasonable rate, or, looking at it from a commercial standpoint, sell it for what it is worth and put the money into the Treasury." The resolution provided that we should not loan it but should sell it in lots of not less than 1 ton or more than 100 tons. What has the War Department done? They have entered into a written agreement with the trust, the three men, by which they have sold it to them ostensibly at a rate of $80 per ton, allowing them $890,000 for handling it, but they have not sold it to them, because they have bought it back next June, a year from this, for $80 a ton. They are making the trust a present of $4,000,000 based on any reasonable hypothesis as to what this nitrate will be worth at that time. Every man knows that, and the department has just simply ignored the act of Congress and ignored our rights to pass laws, has violated its obligations, if it has any, toward the people, toward the Government, and is standing in with that profiteering combination, and in my remarks I shall name them, and in my remarks I shall print a copy of the contract and I shall call upon the Department of Justice of the United States to bring action to nullify the contract and prevent this fraud on our Government. That contract was entered into on the 11th day of this month, and it can still be stopped.

If the Department of Justice is against profiteering and against the trust and for the people and for the Treasury, if the things that department says are not idle words, then that action will be brought. There is not a lawyer in this House who, if this would happen in his State and he held a prosecuting office, would bring suit and stop that unfaithful officer, such as the Secretary of War—this conscientious Secretary of ours. He would stop him from absolutely doing what he wanted to and what the law we passed says he shall not do. Some may say that it has nothing to do with profiteering. Let me tell you. He has set the price of this product that goes into fertilizer, for one year from now, at $80 a ton, a higher price than ever was paid. He has fixed that price. That price fixing has only one equal in history, and that is the price fixing by the Department of Justice on sugar. It is in the interest of the profiteers, against the people, against the Government, against the taxpayers, and I call upon the Department of Justice, if there is one iota of sincerity in the make-up of that department, to bring action to prevent this nefarious fraud upon the people. I propose to put all of these documents into the RECORD. [Applause.]

The copy of the resolution passed by Congress is in the contract. The three firms are Wessel Duval, 28 Broad Street, New York; W. R. Grace & Co., New York; and J. H. Baker & Bro., New York.

These three firms get the 100,000 tons. Congressman HUTCHINSON performed a good service for the farmer and his country. The Secretary of War stood against him, and, with the three companies having a monopoly on this product, they have nullified the law and acted for the profiteers.

A copy of the contract follows:

[War-Ord-O-PM-13-146-a. Wessel Duval & Co. and United States of America. Ordnance Department, United States Army. Contract for the sale of nitrate of soda under Senate joint resolution No. 180, and the replacement thereof. Dated May 10, 1920. RHH: mch.]

This agreement, entered into this 10th day of May, 1920, by and between Wessel Duval & Company, a copartnership, having its general office at No. 25 Broad Street, New York City, New York (hereinafter called the contractor), party of the first part, and the United States of America, acting through and represented by R. H. Hawkins, lieutenant colonel, Ordnance Department, United States Army (hereinafter called the contracting officer), acting under the authority of the Secretary of War and by direction of the Chief of Ordnance, United States Army, party of the second part,

Witnesseth:

Whereas the Congress of the United States has enacted and the President has approved as of April 23, 1920, a Senate resolution No. 180, which provides:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to meet the existing emergency in the shortage of fertilizers the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to sell for cash at the prevailing market price, at the time of the sale thereof, to such distributors or users thereof in the United States as shall request the same and in such quantity to each, not less than one ton nor more than one hundred tons to any purchaser as he shall see fit, not to exceed in the aggregate one hundred thousand tons of nitrate of soda now held as a reserve supply of the War Department, the proceeds of such sale to be repaid to the proper item of the current appropriations originally made for such purposes: Provided, That the Secretary of War shall report to Congress not later than December 6, 1920, the names of all purchasers of said nitrate of soda, together with the prices for which sold."

Whereas by direction of the Secretary of War and through circular advertisements for proposals, persons, firms, corporations were invited to submit proposals for the sale to distributors and users prior to October 1, 1920, in amounts not to exceed one hundred (100) tons or less than one (1) ton, to any purchaser, a supply of nitrate of soda belonging to the United States, not to exceed one hundred thousand tons (of 2,000 lbs. per ton), and to replace the amount so sold subsequent to December 1, 1920, and prior to June 30, 1921; and

Whereas the lowest and best bids were submitted by Wessel Duval and Company, W. R. Grace and Company, and H. J. Baker & Brothers, as per copy of proposal dated May 6, 1920, hereto attached and made a part hereof, marked Exhibit "A"; and

Whereas in accordance with said invitation and proposal an award for the furnishing of the services and the delivery of the materials has been made to Wessel Duval & Company, W. R. Grace & Company, and H. J. Baker & Brother, as per copy of notice addressed to the said bidders under date of May 8, 1920, copy of which notice is hereto attached and made a part hereof, marked Exhibit "B."

Now, therefore, under the laws of the United States in such cases made and provided, and particularly under the provisions of the Senate resolution hereinbefore recited, and in consideration of the mutual agreements herein contained, the said parties have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE I. The contractor agrees that it will, acting as agent for the United States, sell nitrate of soda for cash and dispose of the same prior to October 1, 1920, at the prices hereinafter specified, to such distributors and users of nitrate of soda in the United States as shall request the same (selling, however, not less than one ton nor more than one hundred tons to any purchaser). The contractor shall not sell or dispose of any amount which, together with the amount to be disposed of by W. R. Grace & Company and H. J. Baker & Brother, shall exceed an aggregate of one hundred thousand tons of nitrate of soda. The contractor shall not be required to sell and dispose of more nitrate of soda than is requested by the respective distributors and users who shall apply for or request the delivery of nitrate of soda within the meaning of Senate joint resolution No. 180, and within the terms and meaning of this contract. The contractor shall sell for cash, nitrate of soda at a selling price of $88.90 per ton of 2,000 lbs., f. o. b. cars at warehouse. It is understood that the nitrate of soda available for sale and disposition under the terms of the said Senate joint resolution is available as and when released by the office of the Chief of Ordnance at the points mentioned below and in the amounts enumerated below, although the amounts are stated without exactness, but only in approximate figures. The said points and approximate amounts are as follows:

	Pounds.
Nitro, West Virginia	36,252,000
Brunswick, Georgia	7,356,000
Hopewell, Virginia	114,000,000
Fernandina, Florida	3,828,000
Galveston, Texas	4,928,000
Jacksonville, Florida	22,780,000
Little Rock, Arkansas	17,000,000
Mobile, Alabama	11,356,000
Mt. Union, Pennsylvania	6,216,000
Pensacola, Florida	15,616,000
Tampa, Florida	8,840,000

No warranty or representation is or shall be made as to the condition or quality of the nitrate of soda to be sold to distributors or users.

ARTICLE II. The contractor shall, in the first instance, assume and pay all necessary cost for bagging, weighing, reconditioning, shipping, and similar incidental expense (including clerical work) of placing nitrate of soda so sold on board cars at the respective points of present storage. It is estimated that the cost for bagging, weighing, reconditioning, shipping, etc., will be approximately $0.0033 per pound, but this estimate shall be subject to modification by written notice from the contracting officer as the estimate needs or requires modification in the light of experience. The United States shall (by credit or payment as provided in Article VIII hereof) reimburse the contractor for the proper items of expense for such bagging, weighing, reconditioning, shipping, etc., in the amount actually expended therefor, as determined by an audit and investigation, to be conducted on behalf of the United States, of the books, accounts, invoices, and vouchers of the contractor, and the contractor agrees to keep and preserve for such audit all books, accounts, invoices, and vouchers necessary for the proper determination of such cost.

ARTICLE III. The United States shall pay to the contractor for its services as agent in so selling and disposing of nitrate of soda a fee or commission of 2½% computed on the selling price f. o. b. cars at warehouse. The price or sum of $88.90, mentioned in Article I, is hereby fixed as the price at which nitrate of soda shall be sold to the distributors and users until such time as the contractor shall be notified in writing by the contracting officer that a different sum is to be charged for nitrate of soda sold thereafter to distributors or users.

ARTICLE IV. Title to nitrate of soda so sold to distributors and users shall pass upon loading f. o. b. cars at warehouse as evidenced by invoices, shipping receipt, or bill of lading, and the quantity shall be determined by the weights appearing on such invoices, bill of lading, or shipping receipt.

ARTICLE V. The contractor agrees that as a part of the consideration to sell and deliver to the United States the United States agrees to buy, receive, and pay for nitrate of soda of equal quality and nitrogen content in an amount equivalent to the nitrate of soda sold by the contractor to users and distributors in accordance with the said Senate resolution, to the end that all nitrate of soda sold prior to October 1, 1920, by the contractor shall be replaced by nitrate of soda of equal quality and nitrogen content. The nitrate of soda so replaced shall be delivered ex vessel or ex store at Mobile, Alabama, subsequent to December 1, 1920, and prior to June 30, 1921. The contractor shall pay and assume all expenses, including demurrage, accruing prior to delivery, ex vessel or ex store. The said replacement nitrate of soda shall be sacked in customary bags. The United States shall pay to the contractor as a just and fair compensation for such replacement nitrate of soda, four dollars ($4.00) per hundred pounds, ex vessel or ex store, Mobile, Alabama, and payment shall be made upon the usual Government voucher for deliveries as made from time to time.

ARTICLE VI. The contractor shall not be held responsible for delays in delivery of replacement nitrate of soda in the event of the closing of the Panama Canal by slides or otherwise, and the delivery time shall be extended by a time equivalent to the number of days the Panama Canal may be closed to navigation through the period extending from November 15, 1920, to June 15, 1921.

ARTICLE VII. The contractor shall require each person, firm, or corporation applying for nitrate of soda to certify that the aggregate amount of nitrate of soda requested, together with the amount theretofore sold, to such person, firm, or corporation out of the United States reserve stock does not exceed one hundred tons.

ARTICLE VIII. The contractor shall submit a weekly report to the Office of the Chief of Ordnance setting forth the name and address of each purchaser of nitrate of soda to whom nitrate of soda has been sold under the provisions of this contract, together with the amount of nitrate of soda so sold and the price at which sold, and the designation of the point from which shipment or delivery was made.

The contractor shall make payment to such officer or agent as the Chief of Ordnance or as the contracting officer shall designate in writing on or before the twentieth day of each month and in funds acceptable to the United States at Washington, D. C., for the amount of nitrate of soda sold during the preceding month. Such payment shall be at the rate of four dollars ($4.00) per hundred pounds of nitrate of soda sold, and payment shall be made to the order of the Treasurer of the United States for deposit to the credit of the appropriation designated "Armament of fortifications 'C'," no year. As soon as practicable after October 1, 1920, the contractor shall make a complete detailed report of all expenses incidental to the sale of the nitrate of soda for bagging, weighing, reconditioning, shipping, and similar items referred to in Article II of this agreement, and if the amount of such items or expenditures shall be less than the amount retained by the contractor (exclusive of the fee or profit of 2½%) the contractor shall refund and repay to the United States the amount of such excess in funds acceptable as aforesaid and payable as aforesaid, and in the event that the amount actually expended for said items (plus the fee or profit of 2½%) is in excess of the said retained amount, the United States will pay to the contractor the amount of such excess.

ARTICLE IX. The contractor shall give a proper surety bond conditioned upon the full and faithful performance by the contractor of all of the terms and conditions upon its part to be kept and performed under the terms of this contract, and conditioned particularly upon the payment to the United States of the proceeds of the sale of nitrate of soda, and further conditioned particularly upon the replacement of the nitrate of soda. The bond shall be in such form and with such sureties as shall be approved by the contracting officer, and shall be in the penal sum of fifty thousand dollars ($50,000.00). The contractor may, with the approval of the contracting officer, deposit so-called Liberty bonds issued by the United States in par or face value of $50,000.00, and these bonds shall remain as a pledge or security for the faithful performance by the contractor, and such Liberty bonds, if deposited, shall be taken and considered in lieu of surety upon said performance bond, and such Liberty bonds shall be returned to the contractor upon the contracting officer's certificate in writing that the contractor has performed the terms and conditions of this contract.

ARTICLE X. No Member of or Delegate to Congress, or Resident Commissioner, is or shall be admitted to any share or part of this contract, or to any benefit that may arise therefrom; but this article shall not apply to this contract so far as it may be within the operation or exceptions of section 116 of the act of Congress approved March 4, 1909 (35 Stats., 1109).

ARTICLE XI. Neither this contract, nor any interest herein, shall be transferred by the contractor to any other party, except to the extent permitted by section 3477, United States Revised Statutes.

ARTICLE XII. Except as herein otherwise specifically provided, any doubts or disputes which may arise under this contract or as to its performance or nonperformance shall be referred to the Chief of Ordnance for determination. If the contractor shall feel aggrieved at his decision, it shall have the right to appeal to the Secretary of War, whose decision shall be final.

ARTICLE XIII. The members of the copartnership of Wessel, Duval & Company are George L. Duval, Teodosio F. Bridge, Robert Jaffrey, Guillerino E. Purcell, Harry L. Wessel, Thomas Peake, Paul W. Alexander, Edmundo Eastman, Anson McLoud, Pedro M. Wessel, Elizabeth F. Parker. This contract shall, however, bind and benefit the present firm and its successors regardless of any change in the membership thereof, as well as the individual members of said firm and their legal representatives and assigns.

ARTICLE XIV. Whenever in this contract the words hereinafter enumerated are used, they shall mean what is set opposite them:

Contractor: The party of the first part and its legal representatives, successors, and assigns.

Chief of Ordnance: The Chief of Ordnance, the Acting Chief of Ordnance, or any duly authorized representative of either.

Contracting Officer: The officer in whose name this contract is executed, his successor or successors, his or their duly authorized agent or agents, and any one from time to time designated by the Chief of Ordnance to act as contracting officer.

In witness whereof, the parties hereto have caused this contract to be executed in quadruplicate, and the firm of Wessel, Duval & Company has caused this to be executed by a member of the firm duly authorized, and the United States has caused this contract to be executed by its contracting officer, the day and year first above written.

COMMANDING OFFICER,
Ammunition Division, Ordnance Department,
Room 6-300, Building B, Sixth and B Streets NW.,
Washington, D. C.

Attention Col. J. H. Pelot.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned offer to act severally as agents of the United States to distribute for its account not to exceed 100,000 tons, or any part thereof, of nitrate of soda to which reference is made in circular advertisement and proposal published by you as of May 1, 1920, under the following terms and conditions.

We will endeavor to dispose of the entire quantity of 100,000 tons, but assume no obligation to distribute all or any part thereof, nor responsibility for inability to sell at the price and terms fixed by the United States.

The nitrate of soda distributed by us is to be sold at a price to be published by the War Department; in fixing the selling price it is understood the department proposes to take the cost of replacement as hereinafter named by us and add thereto the cost to the Government for bagging, reconditioning, shipping, and contingent expenses, amounting to 33 cents per pound plus the successful bidder's commission as agent. It is understood that sales are to be made to distributors and users desiring same prior to October 1, 1920, in amounts not to exceed 100 tons, or less than 1 ton to any purchaser. The title to nitrate shall pass on loading as evidenced by bill of lading, and the Government selling price to be basis f. o. b. cars. The Government is to allow the successful bidded 33 cents per pound on all nitrate sold to cover cost of weighing, bagging, reconditioning, etc., but any cost in excess of this amount is to be absorbed by the agent.

We are to receive a commission of 2½ per cent on all nitrate of soda sold by us hereunder. As a part of our understanding we offer to replace ton for ton of nitrate of soda of equal quality and nitrogen content, any nitrate so sold and distributed by us individually; in other words, replacement is to be made by us individually and separately, in proportion, quality and quantity equal to the amount sold and distributed for the Government by each of us. Replacement is to be made at $4 per hundred pounds, ex-vessel or ex-store, Mobile, Ala., subsequent to December 1, 1920, and prior to June 30, 1921. In the event of the closing of the Panama Canal by slides or otherwise the delivery time to be extended for a time equal to the number of days canal is closed to navigation.

Very truly, yours,

Subject: Ordnance proposal 13–13, nitrate of soda.

GENTLEMEN: 1. I am directed by the chief of manufacture to advise you that ordnance proposal 13–13, known as agency proposal for the sale and replacement of not more than 100,000 tons of subject material, was opened at the hour advertised, and it has been tentatively decided to name you to act severally as agents of the United States, to distribute for its account the said amount of nitrate of soda, conditioned on the approval of the action taken by this division of the advisory purchase board of the Ordnance Department.

2. It is further understood that the amount of 33 cents per pound is a handling cost, used solely for the purpose of arriving at a selling price to be published by the War Department. If the actual cost of weighing, reconditioning, loading, and contingent expenses at any point is less than 33 cents per pound, the Government is to receive the benefit of any saving effected at such point; on the other hand, if said costs exceed the figure, then the Government will absorb same.

3. Should a contract be placed with you severally, paragraph 3 of your letter of May 6 is to be incorporated in same and to form a part of said contract.

4. This letter is not to be construed as authority to proceed as agents, and you are advised that any expense to which you may go prior to receipt of a contract from the contract section of the Ordnance Department is to be at your own risk.

Respectfully,

(Signed) J. H. PELOT,
Colonel, Ordnance Department, United States Army,
Chief Ammunition Division.
By J. H. HUNTER,
Major, Ordnance Department, United States Army,
Chief Explosives Section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph (e) of section 7 of the act approved March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to authorise the Secretary of the Treasury to provide hospital and sanatorium facilities for discharged sick and disabled soldiers, sailors, and marines," is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(e) The sum of $550,000 is hereby authorized for the purchase of the land and buildings of the National School of Domestic Arts and Science, located at 2650 Wisconsin Avenue, in the District of Columbia, now under lease to the United States Government as a hospital, and for the construction of such additions and improvements thereto as may be necessary to suitably adapt them to the needs and purposes of the Public Health Service: Provided, That the purchase price of said land and buildings shall not exceed $460,000: Provided further, That in addition to the $550,000 hereby authorized, the sum of $250,000 from the amount appropriated by section 5 of the act hereby amended and of $6,000 and of $154,000 from the amounts appropriated by section 6, paragraphs 1 and 2, respectively, of said act, are hereby made available for the above-mentioned purposes and shall remain available until expended."

Mr. ELLIOTT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am a member of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, which has had the handling of this bill. I am not in favor of locating all of the public institutions of this country within the District of Columbia, but this institution is one that will have to be located in the District because it is needed here and has nothing whatever to do with the hospitals that we will have to build in other parts of the country to take care of the soldiers of the late war.

I am unacquainted with the value of real estate in the District of Columbia. I have an idea, however, that this land is being sold to the Government for all it is worth. Notwithstanding that fact, I believe it is about as good a proposition as we can get for a hospital in the District. The Secretary of the Treasury looked all over the District and said that he could not find any land owned by the Government which was suitable as a site for a hospital for these soldiers. He found this proposition and recommended that it was the best that he could do.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. NOLAN. Some time ago—a couple of years ago—we bought a considerable lot of land out there close to the Walter Reed Hospital for hospital purposes. Is it not possible that we could enter into some arrangement with the War Department, that has control of that property, to get enough of it to locate this hospital upon it.

Mr. ELLIOTT. In answer to the gentleman from California I will say this: Whenever you start to encroach on any bureau or department of this Government you have a fight on your hands. The Secretary of the Treasury had the right to utilize any property inside of the District of Columbia that he could get hold of for the use of this hospital, and he comes back and reports to this committee that he can find no Government-owned land that is suitable for it. I do not know whether he tells the truth or not, but I presume that that is his judgment upon it.

Mr. NOLAN. If anybody goes out to the Walter Reed Hospital and goes over that land, sizes up the situation, then he knows that we have got to get rid of a lot of those shacks that we built during the war, and also that we have hundreds of acres of land out there available for hospital purposes.

And if it is a question of going into this thing as between department and department and bureau and bureau, then we ought to have something to say when it comes to a matter of almost a million dollars.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I agree with the gentleman from California that we ought to get these departments by the ears and crack their heads together [laughter], but we have not time to do it with this proposition. This hospital is needed for the care of these boys, and needed at once, and it is ideally located, and the buildings are now being used for hospital purposes and it can be easily enlarged to make it an ideal hospital.

Mr. LANGLEY. I was just going to call attention to the fact that in connection with the difficulty of attempting to intrench upon the jurisdiction of different departments the gentleman will recall that Secretary Baker was before our committee and his attention was called to the fact that there were several unoccupied Army posts, and we endeavored to get permission from him, or rather from his department, to use some of them for these disabled soldiers, and we were unable to make any progress with him except to get a revokable permit, and that on the condition that no tubercular patients should be put in there.

Mr. ELLIOTT. That is right.

Mr. LANGLEY. That is one of the difficulties we have encountered in reference to this question.

Mr. ELLIOTT. We have run up against all sorts of difficulties in the handling of this hospital proposition. We had the Secretary of War before the committee——

Mr. LANGLEY. Two or three times.

Mr. ELLIOTT. And we tried to get him to consent to the use of two abandoned Army posts, Fort McKenzie and Fort Meade, two posts which cost this Government millions of dollars to build and are located in such places that the surroundings are healthy, with a vast amount of land surrounding them for grazing purposes, and all we could get out of him was this, that under this new Army reorganization bill all of this space will have to be utilized to take care of the soldiers that we would have under this new Army reorganization, and the only thing they could do would be to give to the Public Health Service a revokable permit to use this. In other words, it is a permit that they could take away from them the next day after they got started. And I want to say those two Army posts have been lying vacant for years with nobody there looking after them except a few soldiers as caretakers. But that has nothing to do with this proposition. We need this hospital in the District, and need it right here, and it is as good a site as there is in the District of Columbia, so far as I know.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. ELLIOTT. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Did the gentleman's committee have this property appraised as to its value?

Mr. ELLIOTT. It did not; not that I know of.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ELLIOTT. I ask for two more minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. If the gentleman will permit, that point was laid with the Secretary of the Treasury as the executive officer to make the negotiations in regard to the purchase of the property, and upon his recommendation, as stated in the communication here, your committee based its action after ascertaining that this was the most economical proposition in sight.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That does not control, of course.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. I understand.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The statement is made here that the appraised value of their property is less than $200,000. Of course, any investigation made by the Secretary of the Treasury was made by the Public Health Service, and unless they got some experts I have my doubt as to their special qualifications for judging the value of the property, and I inquire whether there was any actual valuation made of this property by anybody who knew the value of the property?

Mr. ELLIOTT. The question of what the property was assessed at for taxation cuts very little figure in regard to its actual value. I have a piece of property of my own that was assessed at $3,500, and I have refused $7,000 for it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know; but the gentleman knows the value of his property.

Mr. ELLIOTT. And all the property right in the neighborhood was assessed the same way, but that does not control as to value. I do not know whether this property is worth this much, and I do not pretend to know.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman does not know, and I think we are entitled to know something as to whether somebody who does know the value of the property has made the appraisement of its value.

Mr. ELLIOTT. They have not, as far as I know.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words in order to get the floor. I do this for the purpose of getting some information, if possible, from the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER]. I remember when this nitrate bill was before the House on April 10 there was insistence made by a number of us, including the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], and others, to put into that bill certain safeguards that would protect the individual farmer in getting this nitrate in small quantities at a reasonable price. If the gentleman from Kansas who brings this criticism against the War Department will say that such a contract has been entered into right in the teeth of the legislation passed by this House, why I would join with the gentleman in the criticism; but I would like to know whether the gentleman from Kansas can advise the House whether there is any farmer who has ever applied to the War Department for any nitrate under the provisions of this act whose request was turned down and refused?

Mr. TINCHER. Yes, sir; a Member of Congress, one of my colleagues, wrote a letter May the 6th trying to buy the limit of 100 tons of nitrate from the department, and the department did not answer the letter until the 11th, and answered that on the 8th they had sold all to the trust——

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I can understand——

Mr. TINCHER. That is one case I know of.

Mr. BLANTON. I can understand why the Secretary of War turned down the request of a Member of Congress to buy 100 tons of nitrate from the Government, because a Member of Congress did not have any right to do it. We can not take advantage of legislation that we pass here ourselves, and we ought not to try to do it——

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman asked——

Mr. BLANTON. I want to ask if the farmers over the country, for whose benefit we passed that legislation—have they ever made any application to buy a ton or more and been turned down by the War Department?

Mr. TINCHER. Well, the gentleman knows I have been here, and I have not been with the farmers; but I do know gentlemen insisted on this safeguard in respect to buying the small amount of 1 ton and that there could not be over 100 tons sold to any one man.

Three companies or three disbursers have bought 100,000 tons of it, and they got a contract, and I have a copy of the contract that the Government should take it back.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the distinguished gentleman from Kansas, who is a member of the Agricultural Committee, which stands here as a protector of the farmers' interests of this country, will take some steps through his party, which has charge of the legislation of this country at this time, to stop such an unlawful contract, if such a one exists.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two minutes more.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Delaware asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Texas be permitted to proceed for five more minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to object, but I want to finish this bill as soon as we can. A member of the committee wants to talk for a few minutes, and I want to ask unanimous consent to close debate on this paragraph in 10 minutes, 5 of it to be consumed by the gentleman from Texas.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky prefers a unanimous-consent request that the debate on this paragraph close in 10 minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. And amendments thereto, five of which shall be used by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] and five by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. McKEOWN. Reserving the right to object, does that cut off debate on any additional amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that it will not cut off offering an amendment, but it will cut off further debate.

Mr. McKEOWN. I have an amendment to offer to the paragraph, and I would like to have two or three minutes to explain it. I do not care to take up the time of the committee at all.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will modify that and make it 15 minutes.

Mr. CROWTHER. Make it 25 minutes.

Mr. LANGLEY. I will make it 20 minutes, then.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the debate on this paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 20 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. CROWTHER. I object.

Mr. LANGLEY. If the gentleman insists upon being heard, I will make it 25 minutes. I will amend the request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that all debate on this paragraph and amendments thereto close in 25 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. LANGLEY. The time to be controlled by the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I promised first to yield to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER] and then to the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON].

Mr. TINCHER. The gentleman hopes that as a member of the Agricultural Committee I will try to remedy this wrong. I want to call the gentleman's attention to this, that we have the law, and I am a little out of the practice of law, but I would give anything if I could step into the Department of Justice, as crude as I am, and bring an action against the Secretary of War for violating the law, squandering the people's money, and encouraging the profiteers.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman can go into the courts as a citizen of this country and ask that any department be enjoined from making an illegal contract—restrain the carrying out of an unlawful contract.

Mr. LAYTON. Now, there are some of us that stood here in the interests of agriculture, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is one of them.

Mr. BLANTON. I mentioned that a moment ago. I mentioned that the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. LAYTON], and the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], and the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. QUIN], and several others, sought to protect the farmers with this measure when it was before the House.

Mr. LAYTON. We sat here to protect the farmer at a time when production was being lessened, and when we were all interested in increasing production, for the reason that everybody knows. But I want to ask the gentleman this question, namely: Why is it that he eternally and constantly blames the Republican side of this House when we pass laws and when the administration here will not execute the laws, but stands silent and allows the laws to be absolutely nullified?

Mr. BLANTON. I will answer the gentleman. I said a moment ago that if the Secretary of War has disobeyed the mandate of Congress with respect to this nitrate bill and has made this unlawful contract he ought to be condemned for it, and if such were the fact that I would join in the criticism. But in answering the other part of the question of the gentleman from Delaware, I am not in favor of the Congress continually "passing the buck." Whenever there is a question that involves our action, whereby we can protect the people's rights by proper action, I do not believe we ought to sit here like a bunch of ninnies and not do our duty and criticize somebody else.

Mr. LAYTON. Just a moment. I do not understand the logic by which you assume that this body here has got both legislative power and executive power.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, we could have put some directory provisions in that bill.

Mr. LAYTON. We put every directory provision in it that we thought necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. There were one or two proposals that were not looked upon with favor.

Mr. TINCHER. We did not "pass the buck" this time.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I have not had occasion recently to make any investigation of fertilizers, but I have had some occasion to look into this question of hospitals, which our wounded and diseased soldiers are now very much in need of. The buildings that are proposed to be purchased by this bill are located upon the highest point in the city of Washington, a place that the Surgeon General of the Public Health Service informed the committee was an ideal spot in point of public health for the location of such an institution. It would be a crime for this Congress to locate hospitals for the care of our sick soldiers and put them down here upon the swamps simply because the Government now owns the land there.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I agree with my colleague this hospital ought to be established, but I want to ask him if there is any special reason why it should be established here in the District of Columbia, where the land costs an excessive price, it seems to me?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I will state to the gentleman that the price contemplated by this bill includes five first-class stone buildings, already completed, now occupied, and soon will be open for several hundred more patients—buildings that were erected before the war-time prices prevailed. I doubt seriously if you can construct buildings such as these to-day, under the prices of material and the cost of labor that now prevail in this city and around here, for the money that is provided for in this bill, even on land owned by the Government.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. GRIFFIN. The reason why the proposed hospital is to be in the District of Columbia is due to the fact that Congress has already directed the placing of it there under the act of March 3, 1919.

Mr. LANGLEY. Yes; and the money can not be expended anywhere else under that act.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. MURPHY. Are these stone buildings constructed in accordance with the latest developed ideas with reference to taking care of tubercular patients?

Mr. MANSFIELD. It is not to be a tubercular hospital, but these buildings have the approval of every physician connected with the Public Health Service. I can only take their word. I think perhaps they know more about it than I do or than any other layman does. The surgeons of the Public Health Service and every physician connected with that service, including Col. Rucker, the public-health adviser connected with the War Risk Insurance Bureau, approve of this as an ideal group of buildings and an ideal location for the purpose. They are all arranged with proper accommodations, and the construction is fireproof, and these buildings are absolutely suitable for hospital purposes.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. LAYTON. I am not opposed, of course, to this measure, but did the committee as a matter of fact look outside of the city of Washingotn, where prices are very high, to find a site for this hospital?

Mr. LANGLEY. The law confines it to the District of Columbia.

Mr. LAYTON. Is that the law? If so, I did not read it correctly. It says "in the District of Columbia or vicinity." Now, "in the vicinity" of the District of Columbia is not necessarily in the city of Washington.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. I do.

Mr. GRIFFIN. If the gentleman will permit for a moment, in answer to the gentleman's question, the burden was not on the committee to look for a hospital site in the District of Columbia or vicinity. That burden was placed upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and it was only on his announcement to the effect that he was unable to find a site in the District of Columbia or the vicinity that we assented to this proposal. The burden was on the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of March 3, 1919.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I have offered an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 2, line 14, after the word "expended," insert "And provided further, That said buildings shall be appraised by the Secretary of the Treasury, and the price to be paid shall not exceed the appraised value of the buildings plus $175,000 for the land."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman and gentleman, I do not know whether this amendment would do any good or not. The value of this land as fixed by the report of the committee is about $175,000, if I recall the report correctly. I understand the report says that we will be able to get this land at a value not to exceed $175,000.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Oklohama yield to the gentleman from Nebraska?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Referring to the amendment, let me call attention to this fact, that an option was offered for 30 days from the time it was given—which was passed some time ago—and at the request of the Assistant Secretary the owners of the property made another stipulation, that time should be given to make the appropriation—a reasonable limit—and if that was not done it should be understood that the owner would withdraw the offer to sell at $460,000. Now, the result of this amendment will be that if it is adopted the option by the owners of the property to the Government will be set aside and we lose the chance of getting the hospital.

Mr. McKEOWN. I just yielded to the gentleman for a question.

I take it that property in the District of Columbia is now at the highest price that it will be for years to come. Right now everything is at the pinnacle. It is as high as it can possibly be. You have a limitation in here that the purchase price shall not exceed $460,000. I am simply trying to safeguard it and place on it a further limitation, that the buildings shall be appraised by the Treasury Department, which can be done by the Supervising Architect of that department; to appraise the value of the buildings as they are now and $170,000 for the land, and that ought to be all that that property is worth.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Let me say that the department did the very thing that the gentleman is now suggesting. The committee not being in a position to go and negotiate with real estate men, that being a function belonging to the executive branch of the service, we left it with the Secretary of the Treasury, who did the very thing that the gentleman is now suggesting.

Mr. McKEOWN. I understood one of the members of the committeee, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], to state that they had not had this property appraised.

Mr. LANGLEY. We did not feel that it was in the province of the committee under the peculiar conditions existing to take that step.

Mr. McKEOWN. How does the Secretary of the Treasury arrive at the value of this property?

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Just exactly as he does in determining upon a site for a public building anywhere. An appropriation may be made for $5,000 or $10,000 or $500,000, and the Secretary goes and determines the value.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. McKEOWN) there were—ayes 13, noes 21.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, first I wish to say that I am heartily in favor of this bill and in favor of anything for the relief of the boys who bore the burden of the war. After the boys came back one of the saddest sights was to see those out here at St. Elizabeths, just gazing off into vacancy. Those who have seen them realize that they paid a greater price, as did their fathers and mothers, than those who lost their lives on the other side.

In regard to the nitrate situation, I want to say that after the bill was passed by the Senate and House and signed by the President I tried very hard to get 20 tons of nitrate from the storage warehouse in Schenectady, my home town, for the use of the farmers in my district. I went down to the War Department and was sent to a Mr. Shults, who, I had been informed officially, was holding a hearing that afternoon with some manufacturers or agriculturists in regard to the disposition of the nitrate. Although the meeting had been scheduled for 4 p. m. and I appeared at 4.15, nobody else appeared to attend said hearings. I asked him if he knew anything about it, and he said no. He then sent me to a lieutenant colonel on the fourth floor, who sent me to a major on the third floor, who recommended me to another major at the corner of Sixth and B Streets, a mile away. None of these various officials could give me definite information on the subject. I finally gained the information that the War Department desired to distribute this from plants where the Government was paying storage upon the nitrate instead of from where it was stored in one of the Government-owned buildings. The result was that we were unable to get the nitrate for the farmers in my district in time for it to be of any value to them. And I say it was an injustice and absolutely unfair to the farmers, who, greatly handicapped by the lack of farm labor, are making every effort for a maximum production. These farmers would have driven their wagons or trucks there and backed up to the door of the warehouse and taken it away themselves without the expense of a penny for delivery or handling. This is but another example of binding up the wounds of necessity with departmental red tape, so pronounced under the present administration.

And I am glad the gentleman on the other side of the House [Mr. LANHAM] made the speech he did in regard to the assessed value of property here in Washington. I think it is a crying shame, the small valuation that is put on property in Washington for assessment purposes. Why, these high-binding, high-handed, hold-a-pistol-to-your-head people here charge $40 a month for a single room. How can a girl live in Washington and pay $40 a month rent for a room? People here charge as much rent for one room as they pay for the whole house. They build a garage across the back end of the yard and charge $240 a year for a $400 building and get a 60 per cent dividend on the investment. I voted to sustain these dormitories down here in order that the girls working in the departments here for small salaries might have a place where they could live and get a room and board for $45 a month and as a protest against the high-binding, high-handed tactics of the profiteers of the city of Washington. [Applause.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, how much time is remaining under the agreement?

The CHAIRMAN. Five minutes, which the Chair understood was allotted to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. MURPHY] if he cared to use it.

Mr. MURPHY. I do not care to use the time.

Mr. McDUFFIE. Mr. Chairman, a very serious charge has been made here by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TINCHER], and although I hold no brief for the War Department or the Secretary of War on this particular matter, I can not and do not believe that the Secretary of War has sold the nitrate of soda to three big corporations. I want some evidence from the gentleman. I called up the department myself, and I want to tell the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] and the gentleman from Kansas that if they will write or have their constituents write to Maj. J. H. Hunter, Ordnance Department, Sixth and B Streets, he will place the order with the proper authorities and have the nitrate delivered to their constituents when called for.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. No; the gentleman would not yield to me, and I do not want to talk about dormitories or girls either. [Laughter.] I will yield in a minute to the gentleman; that was in a spirit of fun. You say the nitrate of soda has been sold to these companies. I think that on examination you will find that they have made a contract with them to handle the nitrate of soda. They simply agreed upon a small fee for the handling, on the theory that these companies are in a position to handle it better and more cheaply than is the War Department. The War Department would have to have an extra clerical force and additional help, and these companies have that help and can more easily carry out the plan of delivering it to the farmer. I will not believe the War Department has intentionally done wrong in this matter.

Mr. CROWTHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. McDUFFIE. Yes.

Mr. CROWTHER. That was in direct contradiction to the statement that they made to me. They said they wanted to deliver it but instead of that they put it into the hands of the importers. They had it in storage where a man could drive right up and get his load without costing a cent.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, as a member of the committee which brought in this bill, I want to say that there is no nitrate of soda on the hospital site of Wisconsin Avenue. [Laughter.]

Mr. McDUFFIE. I am glad to hear that. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment on page 2, line 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, beginning with line 8, strike out the remainder of the section.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate is closed.

Mr. GARD. I ask unanimous consent to discuss my amendment for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, this bill is complete in so far as the original authorization of the $550,000 is concerned without the proviso beginning on line 8. The original bill provided, in section 5, that $300,000 is appropriated for an existing hospital and of this amount $250,000 is taken by this bill. It provided in section 6 that $150,000 is to be had for emergency in the Public Health Service to purchase a site to build hospital facilities at Corpus Christi, Tex., and $6,000 is taken from that and put in this bill. It says: Provided $1,500,000 is to be held as an emergency fund for the purchase of land and buildings and $154,000 is taken from that sum and put in this building.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the amount to which he refers has been transferred by the Secretary of the Treasury as set out in the report of the committee.

Mr. GARD. What I am calling attention to is the original purpose of the appropriation as made by Congress and its diversion from its original purpose to the use contemplated in this bill.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. ANDREWS of Nebraska. To strike out that portion included in the gentleman's amendment will make it impossible to enlarge the present facilities for the boys, and the owners of the property will demand possession.

Mr. GARD. I am not concerned about the owners of the property demanding possession. They are getting good compensation for the property. What I am concerned about is to show the diversion from the original appropriation. It is a diversion of the appropriation when there has been no investigation in the vicinity of the District of Columbia, no appraisal of property in the Virginia or Maryland hills, nothing to satisfy the public mind that a real hospital may not be built in the vicinity of the city of Washington for $550,000.

Mr. LANGLEY. May I interrupt the gentleman a moment?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. LANGLEY. I want to say that this was the exercise of an executive function of the Secretary of the Treasury under the act of March 3, 1919. He had the right to do that and to distribute the funds carried by the act.

Mr. GARD. What I am seeking to convey is that Congress appropriated money for certain purposes—$550,000 for a hospital in the District of Columbia or vicinity. That we go beyond that, we do not look around the vicinity, do not appraise the property, do not try, but buy something at practically the owner's own terms. Then we divert a part of it that was for emergency cases where they may be actually needed, and take about $410,000 away from their emergency fund.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 45, noes 0.

So the motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. GREEN of Iowa, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 13627, and had directed him to report the same back to the House without amendment with the recommendation that the bill do pass.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANGLEY, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently there is no quorum present.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. RANSDELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report from the Committee on Rules, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 540.

Resolved, That immediately upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13500) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii, approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish a Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes"; and, after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed two hours, to be equally divided between those favoring and those opposing, the bill shall be read for amendment under the five-minute rule; that at the conclusion of the consideration of the bill for amendment the committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been agreed to, when the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate upon the bill, provided for in the rule, be limited to 30 minutes instead of 2 hours.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas asks unanimous consent that the rule be amended by limiting the general debate to 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, is it expected to complete the consideration of the measure to-night?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, I do not know. We would like to run until 5.30 at least, if it can be done.

Mr. WALSH. I did not catch the reading of the rule. What situation does it leave the bill in, provided consideration of the bill is not concluded to-night?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The rule provides that it shall be in order to move to go into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union upon the adoption of the rule, so that the bill will have a privileged status.

Mr. WALSH. Is it a continuing order?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes, sir.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if the gentlemen of the Rules Committee wanted two hours' debate, why is the chairman seeking now by unanimous consent to change their action of passing legislation by rule?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. The Rules Committee did not want the two hours' debate. The rule as introduced provided for that, and by consulting Members on this floor who are interested in the bill they thought they could get on with less time for debate.

Mr. BLANTON. I would like for the gentleman to cut it down to five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is it the intention to begin the discussion to-night?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Yes; and to run for a time.

Mr. DOWELL. If this can be limited to 30 minutes, general debate can be closed to-night.

Mr. GARD. It is seemingly a very important bill.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, the rule provides for the consideration of a bill of very great importance to the native Hawaiians. There are no people under the flag more loyal to it, more interested in it, more devoted to it, than the people of Hawaii. They are so far out in the Pacific that sometimes they think that we forget that they have interests to which we should give attention, and it is for the purpose of considering a matter of very great importance to those people, who never miss an opportunity to show their devotion to our country, that this rule has been brought forth.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the rule.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the rule.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Is it meant that the previous question is ordered on the adoption of the rule as amended as suggested it be amended by unanimous consent?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Oh, yes.

Mr. GARD. I think that had better be included.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the rule as amended.

The question was taken, and the resolution as amended was agreed to.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, before going into the discussion I want to ask unanimous consent, if there is no objection, that the time be divided equally between myself and the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the 30 minutes for general debate be divided equally, half of the time to be controlled by himself and half by the gentleman from Louisiana. Is there objection. [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 13500.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13500, with Mr. SANFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 13500, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13500) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish a Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the legislation under consideration has some very important provisions. First, and most important, the provisions creating the Hawaiian homes commission, which has supervision over the homesteading of certain lands by the Hawaiian people; second, amendments to the Hawaiian organic act relating to homesteading and the leasing of public lands.

This proposed legislation grew out of the recommendations of a legislative commission of the Territory of Hawaii, which came to Washington some months ago and presented resolutions adopted by the Hawaiian Legislature relative to proposed changes in the Hawaiian homestead laws and suggested the plan of homesteading presented in this bill for the rehabilitation of the native Hawaiians. This legislative commission was composed of C. J. McCarthy, governor; Harry Erwin, attorney general; Robert W. Shingle, member of the senate; John H. Wise, member of the senate; W. T. Rawlins, member of the house of representatives; and Henry J. Lyman, member of the house of representatives.

The commission appeared before the Committee on the Territories early in February, and in the extensive hearings held the commission presented a state of facts existing in the Territory showing that the Hawaiian people are fast declining as a race and the lands in the Territory are rapidly getting into hands of others than Hawaiians. The members of the commission, after setting forth the facts, presented their views as to the solution of the many problems confronting the people of the islands. The most important legislation suggested by the commission, and which is the basis of this legislation, was the plan known as the "Senator Wise plan for the rehabilitation of the Hawaiians" by restoring them to the lands.

The commissioners made a strong showing before the committee in the hearings in favor of this general plan. When this matter was first presented to the committee the details of the plan had not been carefully worked out, but the general purposes and intent of the plan were thoroughly and carefully presented. Senator Wise went into the plan of this legislation in minute detail and gave interesting and important information concerning the Hawaiian people and their history. He set forth facts and conditions existing in the islands upon which the proposed legislation is based. I will not attempt to go into the history of this people nor the facts concerning the previous divisions and land distributions in the Territory. The Hawaiian Delegate [Mr. KALANIANAOLE], who is quite familiar with these facts, will be able to give to you this information and this interesting history.

I desire, however, to refer briefly to these conditions, and I quote from a statement of Senator Wise before the committee:

I would like to have the committee just pause for a moment and look back at the Hawaiians, a noble race, who in 1778, according to Cook's estimate, were 400,000 individuals. Allowing that Capt. Cook's estimate was much too high, the first official census was taken in 1832 and the number was placed at 113,319. The estimated population in 1919 was 22,600 pure Hawaiians and 16,600 part Hawaiians.

This statement of Senator Wise clearly indicates the entire disappearance of the Hawaiian race in the not distant future. Senator Wise further stated, and I quote from the hearings before the committee:

The Hawaiian people are a farming people and fishermen, out-of-door people, and when they were frozen out of their lands and driven into the cities they had to live in the cheapest places, tenements. That is one of the big reasons why the Hawaiian people are dying. Now, the only way to save them, I contend, is to take them back to the lands and give them the mode of living that their ancestors were accustomed to, and in that way rehabilitate them.

Secretary Lane, who has given to this matter careful consideration, appeared before the committee in behalf of this legislation. He visited the islands and became interested in this people. I wish to quote briefly from his statement before the committee:

The land was owned by the King originally, and they had in 1848 what they called a mahele, in which there was a division. As a result of that, and legislation that passed subsequently, we have approximately 1,600,000 acres of public lands in the islands. Most of that land is not suitable for making homes. Large bodies of it are lava land or grazing land. Some of it is the very finest quality of land, perhaps 120,000 acres approximately. * * * In my judgment, from the limited knowledge I have of the history of the islands, those people, the natives, were not treated fairly in the division of the lands that was made in 1848. At any rate, they are a problem now and they ought to be cared for by being provided with homes out of the public lands; but homes that they could not mortgage and could not sell. They are a most lovable people, a kindly people and a generous people. They have arts of their own which endear them to the people who visit the islands. It is not altogether the beauties of the islands that attract people there. It is the spirit that they see and the old civilization that they meet. There is a thriftlessness among those people that is characteristic among people that are raised under a communist or feudal system. They do not know what the competition system is and they will get rid of property that is given them. They do not look forward. They can not see to-morrow. Therefore, they should be given as close identification with their country as possible, and yet be protected against their own thriftlessness, and against the predatory nature of those who wish to take the land from them, and who have in the past.

The statement of Secretary Lane gives to you in a concise way the conditions existing in the islands and the history and characteristics of the Hawaiian people. All of the evidence before the committee clearly demonstrated that if this race of people is to be protected and perpetuated, the strong arm of the Government must, in the very near future, in some way protect and rehabilitate this splendid race.

Your committee has been convinced that what is known as the Wise plan will do something, and we hope will do much, to aid in the rehabilitation of this race. There are to-day on the islands, as estimated June 30, 1919:

Japanese	110,000
Portuguese	25,000
Hawaiians:
Full-blood	22,600
Part-blood	16,600
Chinese	22,800
Filipinos	22,000
Porto Ricans	5,400
Spanish	2,400
Caucasians, other than specified	31,000
All others	5,806
Total	263,606

This estimate of the population in 1919 perhaps is a little large, as the results of the census for 1920, just announced, show the total population of the Territory at 249,992.

The hearings before the committee indicate that a great many of these lands homesteaded by this people have been lost, and too frequently the lands have fallen into the hands of the corporations and wealthy classes. The tax returns for 1919 in the Territory of Hawaii show that only about 6.23 per cent of the property of the islands is held by native Hawaiians. The tax returns show the following:

Taxpayers.	Number of taxpayers.	Valuation of personal property.	Number of taxpayers.	Valuation of personal property.	Total valuation.	Percentage.
Corporations, firms, etc.	783	$88,909,410	1,023	$96,715,185	$185,624,595	74.09
Anglo-Saxons	3,312	26,656,188	3,499	4,723,276	31,379,464	12.53
Hawaiians	5,878	13,670,508	1,913	1,934,609	15,605,117	6.23
Portuguese and Spanish	2,665	5,619,076	1,622	917,411	6,536,487	2.61
Chinese	1,631	3,140,305	1,367	1,656,250	4,796,555	1.91
Japanese	1,183	1,907,764	3,461	4,684,364	6,582,128	2.63
Total	15,452	130,893,251	12,885	110,631,095	250,524,346	100.00

The tax returns for 1919 show the total value of the real property owned in the Territory to be $139,893,251; that the lands owned by 783 corporations, firms, and so forth, is valued at $88,909,410; that native Hawaiians, 5,878 in number, own lands only of the value of $13,670,508. These facts show that in the short time these islands have been populated by other races, out of land worth approximately $140,000,000, the native Hawaiians are now in possession and control of only about $13,000,000 in value.

It is clearly demonstrated by these facts what has happened in the Territory and what will continue to happen unless Congress by legislation makes provision for this race. The Government has now the title to approximately 1,600,000 acres of land in the Territory, and it is with these lands that this legislation is intended to deal. The legislation proposed contemplates the return to the lands of at least a number of the Hawaiian people, and certain parts of these lands are set aside for that purpose.

The bill under consideration provides for the establishment of a commission in the Territory to be known as the Hawaiian homes commission, this commission to be composed of five members appointed by the governor of the Territory, with the consent of the senate of the legislature of the Territory, with the governor as chairman of the commission. At least two of the appointed members must be native Hawaiians.

The Hawaiian home lands, which are particularly described in the bill, consist of approximately 185,000 acres of the Government lands. It is provided in the bill that these lands are to be given, or rather leased, only to native Hawaiians in homesteads of not less than 20 acres nor more than 80 acres of agricultural lands, or not less than 200 nor more than 500 acres of first-class pastoral lands, or not less than 500 nor more than 1,000 acres of second-class pastoral lands, the title to the lands so leased to remain in the United States.

The bill further provides that each lease shall contain the following provisions:

The lessee shall be a native Hawaiian. He shall pay $1 per year rental, and the term of the lease shall be 99 years.

The lessee shall occupy and commence to use or cultivate the lands as his own within one year after the lease is made.

The lessee shall occupy and use said lands for at least a part of each year, as the commission may prescribe.

The lessee shall not in any manner transfer or mortgage to any person, except a native Hawaiian, his interest in the lands, and that only upon the approval of the commission.

The lessee shall pay all taxes provided by law and perform such other conditions as the commission may prescribe.

Provision is made for the forfeiture of the lease, after a full hearing, in the event the lessee fails to comply with the provisions of the law.

The commission is authorized to return any of these lands not used for homesteading by native Hawaiians to the commissioner of public lands, to be leased temporarily until they are needed for homesteading, at which time they are to be returned to the Hawaiian homes commission for that purpose.

It was clearly shown in the hearings that the mere turning over of these homesteads, so called, to the Hawaiian people will not serve the best purpose without further legislation to assist them in improving and cultivating the lands. Most of the Hawaiians who will likely avail themselves of this homestead right have not sufficient means to provide a home and to make necessary preparations for the cultivation and improvement of the ground. It, therefore, is necessary to make provision for the financing of these homesteaders to assist them in improving their homesteads.

The bill provides for the establishment in the treasury of the Territory of Hawaii a revolving fund, to be known as the Hawaiian home-loan fund, this fund to be raised by the leasing of the highly cultivated lands of the Territory and from water licenses of the Territory, as hereinafter explained.

Under the original organic act, as amended in 1910, it is provided in section 73 that further leases of agricultural lands shall not be made without the inclusion of what is known as the withdrawal clause, which provides that the lands may be withdrawn from the lessee when petition is properly filed of 25 or more who desire to homestead the land. Under this system of leasing, where the leases may be withdrawn at any time, it has been shown that the rentals from these lands have been very small.

The legislation proposed provides that the commissioner of public lands may, with the approval of the governor and at least two-thirds of the land board, lease the sugar-cane lands in the future without the withdrawal clause. The evidence before the committee shows that the estimated value of these cane lands is from $200 per acre to $1,000 per acre, and it is estimated that if these lands are leased without the withdrawal clause the rental will be much larger than has been received under the present plan. The bill merely authorizes the land commissioner, as indicated, when he deems it advantageous to the Territory of Hawaii, thus leaving it to the commissioner of public lands and the land board to meet conditions as they exist or may arise from time to time.

The present annual rental for the agricultural and pastoral lands is about $154,600. It is estimated that these lands, without the withdrawal clause, will bring a rental of approximately $400,000 per annum. In addition to this the annual receipts from water licenses will approximate $123,000. In this bill it is provided that 30 per cent of the Territorial receipts derived from the leasing of sugar-cane and agricultural lands and from water licenses shall be covered into the Hawaiian home-loan fund. From this fund the commission is authorized to make loans to the Hawaiian homesteaders for the following purposes:

For the erection of a dwelling and other permanent improvements.

For the purchase of live stock and farm implements.

And for otherwise assisting in the development of the lands.

These loans are to be made on certain conditions, some of which are as follows:

The amount of the loan not to exceed $3,000.

The loan to be paid upon an amortization plan in annual installments within an agreed period not exceeding 30 years.

The commission to have a lien upon the lessee's interest in the improvements, and so forth, to the amount of the loan.

The commission is further authorized to undertake general water and other developments in respect to the Hawaiian home lands, and the Territory is authorized to issue bonds therefor. Provision is also made for the commission to use surplus waters and government-owned waters for certain purposes in connection with carrying out the homestead provisions.

This, in brief, is a general outline of the legislation proposed. This legislation has received the careful consideration of the committee. Perhaps there is no precedent for this legislation, and no legislation of a similar character has been adopted by this Congress. It differs materially from the general plan adopted in this country for homesteading, but the evidence submitted to the committee set forth a state of facts which justify the legislation proposed. It was the unanimous opinion of the committee that if this legislation is to be effective the lessees or homesteaders of these lands should not receive a title that can be disposed of, and should not have a homestead they are not able to personally occupy or cultivate.

I think your committee began this investigation with much doubt as to its propriety, but I am pleased to say that at the conclusion of the investigation and after a full and thorough consideration of the whole matter your committee is unanimous in its recommendation that the legislation proposed be adopted. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire now to yield——

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman from Hawaii begins I wish to say that whatever time he needs from this side will be accorded to him, and when he has finished, if he has not consumed all the time, then I will utilize the remainder of my time; and in this connection, Mr. Chairman, I would like the privilege, if all the time is consumed without my having an opportunity of making a few remarks, to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I now yield the balance of my time to the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE].

Mr. WATKINS. And I yield to the gentleman as much of my time as he desires to use.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, before going into Titles II and III of this bill, I feel constrained to say a few words on Hawaii, its history, and its achievements.

Twenty-one hundred miles southwest from San Francisco, between 154° 40′ and 162° west longitude and between 19° and 23° north latitude, below the Tropic of Cancer, lies the Territory of Hawaii. A glimpse at the map of the world will instantly reveal the strategic position these islands occupy.

The Territory of Hawaii consists of a group of islands, eight of which are inhabited, having an area of approximately 6,449 square miles and a population of about 250,000.

They were discovered January 17, 1778, by Capt. James Cook, an English navigator. At the time of the discovery Capt. Cook wrote them down as the Friendly Islands, and spoke of the people as highly civilized, classed them as the most industrious, and labeled them as few would object to be labeled, as being stalwart, manly, upright, straightforward, fearless, candid, and open-minded. [Applause.]

The civilization of the islands in the early period was of an exceptionally high standard. Their games were planned to make men of them. The Hawaiians, from the very nature of the life they lived, were great athletes. The training of a boy in those days was to make him excel in feats of great strength and to be skillful in the arts of warfare. Running, wrestling, boxing, sled riding, swimming, surf riding, diving under water, disk throwing, javelin throwing, and the handling of a canoe were taught every boy in those days. One's education was not considered complete unless he could stand up to the hardest of these exercises. To-day a Hawaiian boy in the great schools on the mainland can hold his own in any sport requiring skill and strength, and this after many years of neglect from the games that were so indispensable to the make-up of his forefathers. In the great World War we are told that the athletes made the best soldiers. Surely the Hawaiians must have had a high standard of civilization. Even their business was so planned. We speak of the splendid navigation of men like Columbus, and we speak of the splendid navigation of the men of to-day, but the Hawaiian, starting out with his double canoe, sailed the length and breadth of the broad Pacific, over tempestuous seas, with only the sun and stars as guides, proving that they had some knowledge of astronomy. They had an advanced knowledge of medicine, knowing every bone, muscle, and nerve of the body and its structure, and the treatment given for certain ailments then is still recognized by the medical profession of to-day.

It was a time of industrial enterprise and peaceful and prosperous growth; arts and crafts developed to a very high standard. Their feather helmets and capes and the method of their manufacture are still a wonder to the scientific world. Great engineering enterprises were undertaken, irrigation systems and fish ponds were constructed. The land boundaries established during this period are recognized by the engineers and surveyors of to-day.

The religion of my early people was also highly developed. Every act and deed performed was for the glory of their god and for the benefit of humanity.

All laws were edicts of the King, commonly called tabus, and the breaking of them was punishable.

The tabu was, in fact, the ancient law of the Hawaiians. There were religious tabus, there were tabus which prohibited certain acts, such as the killing of man, the eating together of husband and wife, the eating of certain fish, the eating of certain fruits by women—these were the King's tabus. Then there were certain tabus which went with the land; for instance, the right to fish was recognized as a public right by the natives, the fish being the property of all, still the occupier of land upon the seashore had the privilege of naming certain fish in the adjacent waters as his own property. Any person could fish upon the fishing grounds, but was forbidden to catch the fish named as the tabu fish. This system of the tabu runs all through history, and is sacred to them. Even to-day, if you were to go down to the seashore while the Hawaiians are bringing in their nets, you would be entitled to a share of the catch, the natives still maintaining the old custom that the fish, except the tabu fish, belonged to all.

The population increased and colonies were established. Men who were accomplished in science as well as in warfare became chiefs of these colonies. As time passed, in order to effect a more stable government, the chief gathered about him powerful retainers for military service and protection against invasion, and in return for such service the chief granted them large tracts of land, which the subchiefs in turn subinfeudated to their followers. Thus a system remarkably like the old feudal system of Europe developed and continued to the time of Kamehameha I.

Prior to the reign of Kamehameha I each island had its own King. The King of the largest island—Hawaii—left half of the island to his son and the other half to his nephew, Kamehameha. This naturally brought about ill feeling between the cousins, and war was soon declared; Kamehameha, the greater strategist, being the victor, became King of the whole island.

He then conquered Maui, Molokai, and later arrived on Oahu, landing at Waikiki beach, drove the natives through Nuuanu Valley and over the Pali. Thus, after long and desperate fighting, he succeeded in amalgamating the islands into one kingdom, and by a treaty of annexation with King Kamualii, of Kauai, whom he met at sea and asked Kamehameha that if he waited until the black tapa covered him he could have the island, became, by virtue of his conquest and treaty, the supreme monarch of all the islands.

Though Kamehameha I may have appeared to be a heathen to the outside world, yet during his long and vigorous reign there was manifest in everything that he did a superior intelligence and deep reverence for a power greater than his. With such an influence governing his life, he ruled his people, even those whom he had conquered, with justice.

He it was who established the independence of the individual by that oral decree which reads:

> The old and feeble man and woman and the small child may walk and rest unharmed on the public highways of my kingdom, and no one shall molest them. Death shall be the penalty.

He followed the example of his predecessors and divided the lands among his chiefs and followers, retaining, however, a portion to be cultivated by his own servants and attendants, who were considered as having rights in the lands so cultivated or the productions thereof. The proportions were not clearly defined but nevertheless universally recognized.

He recognized the benefits of trading with the outside world, and the immense sandalwood traffic with China which later developed was inaugurated by him.

Seeing the ill effects from the use of alcohol upon his people, he proclaimed the first prohibitory law against the liquor traffic ever promulgated by any Government. [Applause.] The earnest reformers of America, who may have taken to themselves the credit of having accomplished an almost unbelievable phenomenon, may be astonished to learn that this great monarch, the unifier of his people, and farsighted statesman, sometimes called the Napoleon of the Pacific because of his military genius and leadership, had that law enforced a century before.

Education during his time was advanced, even though their language had not been reduced to writing. The high priests took the young and in song and story related to them the history of their ancestors and the principles of medicine and science.

His ability and sense of justice have been an inspiration down through the years; and even to-day the Hawaiian people, as well as those of other nationalities who have lived in the islands and have learned to know and to love the memory of this great man, gather on his natal day to do him honor.

During his reign Opukahaia, after seeing both of his parents slain in war, then a boy of 12, determined to run away to some other country. About this time a ship arrived from New York, Capt. Brentnall, master, and anchored a short distance from shore. The boy swam out to the ship, and when the captain was ready to leave the Hawaiian signified that he did not wish to go ashore. The captain, who had taken a fancy to him, consented to his going with him, taking along also another young Hawaiian, Thomas Hopu. After leaving the islands the ship sailed to the Seal Islands, off the coast of Alaska, thence to China, and around to New York by way of the Cape of Good Hope, arriving there in the year 1809.

Opukahaia and Hopu went to Cornwall, Conn., where they attended school, and were joined later by John Honolii, William Kenui, and George Kaumualii, and other Hawaiian boys.

After they learned the English language they often spoke of their home country, and especially the needs of their people. This unusual bit of information thus coming to the attention of the American Board of Foreign Missions influenced it, and by the appeal of these Hawaiians the board decided to send a band of missionaries to the islands.

Opukahaia, who was a member of the Foreign Missions School, had translated in his native language a portion of the Bible, having finished the Book of Genesis and made considerable progress toward completing a grammar, a dictionary, and a spelling book, as well as a translation of the Hebrew Bible, when he became ill and died in February, 1818. From the start that he had made in his translations the missionaries were enabled to have books already printed in the Hawaiian language when they arrived in Hawaii in April, 1820.

The missionaries, accompanied by J. Honolii, Thomas Hopu, William Kenui, and George Kaumualii, upon their arrival in the islands did not find what they expected. They landed upon an island not infested with savages, but by a people who prior to their arrival had overthrown their gods, burned their temples, and destroyed the tabu, the ancient and terrible power of the priesthood, the king and chiefs over the common people, all of this being done by their own act, and with that behind them the islanders stood ready and welcomed the new religion. [Applause.]

The first education was undertaken by the missionaries soon after their arrival in 1820. There was a passion exhibited for education. The chiefs themselves put the innovation to a test. "If learning is bad, we will keep the people from it," they said, and added, "If it is good, we will share it with all." The desire for learning was so widespread that at the end of five years the number of pupils were 20,000, and at the end of 10 years the number had increased to 53,000, out of an estimated population of 130,000. This large number of pupils necessitated the establishment of a high school. In June of 1831 Lahainaluna School was established to educate teachers for the common schools and prepare young men for vocational pursuits. This school is still maintained by the Territorial Government as a vocational institution.

Boki, a high chief, and Liliha, his wife, observing the benefits derived by their people through education, gave a vast tract of land in Punahou, near Honolulu, to the missionaries, in order that they might further the cause of education, and Oahu College was thus created, which is the oldest educational institution west of the Missouri River. It was to this institution in the early forties that the young men and women of California sought their education.

Following the precedent set by Boki and Liliha, Princess Bernice Pauahi left her entire estate, worth millions, to establish and maintain the Kamehameha Schools, an institution for Hawaiians, where they may secure an education in academic subjects, as well as in agricultural and industrial pursuits.

I might also add here that besides these educational institutions charitable institutions were established by the chiefs, who were ever ready to assist in the uplift of their people. Lunalilo Home for the aged Hawaiians was established by King Lunalilo, leaving his entire estate for that purpose; the Queen's Hospital, where Hawaiians receive treatment free of charge, by Kamehameha IV and his consort, Queen Emma; and the Kapiolani Maternity Home, also where Hawaiians receive treatment gratis, by King Kalakaua and Queen Kapiolani; and the estate of Queen Liliuokalani was left to establish an orphanage. This she was able to do even though she was dethroned. Besides these named, numerous others gave to the cause of religion.

From the start made then, practically 100 years ago, we have our present school system, modeled after the best American schools, and embracing grammar, trade, industrial, and high schools, and ending with the University of Hawaii. [Applause.]

A larger percentage of Hawaii's wealth has been expended for education than has been done in almost any State of the Union. So widespread was the desire for learning among the Hawaiians, and so generally have both the rich and poor availed themselves of our educational privileges, that to-day the percentage of illiteracy among our Hawaiian and Anglo-Saxon population is practically nil.

During Kamehameha I's long reign affairs became settled to an extent to which the country had not been accustomed. Long and undisturbed possession of their lands by chiefs was a preparation for the development of a sentiment favorable to permanent individual rights in land, and such a sentiment had become well defined in the mind of Kamehameha before his death, and may be regarded as the seed germ of a system of land tenures which afterwards developed.

After the death of King Kamehameha I his son, Liholiho, came to the throne as Kamehameha II. He was then not of age. The administration of the Government was under the regency of Queen Kaahumanu. She was the premier or minister having a veto on the King's acts and Kamehameha's widow, a woman of great force of character. Right here I might call the attention of the Members of the House to the fact that the Hawaiian women of noble birth, as many as six at one time, sat as members of the House of Nobles—equivalent to the Senate—and assisted in solving the problems of the country and in making Hawaii what it is to-day. [Applause.] Thus, Hawaii was far in advance of the mainland in having women in its national council. Even to-day, we must appeal to the Hawaiian women if we intend to be successful in our campaigns, even though the right of suffrage has not yet been extended to them.

When Kamehameha II reached his majority and became King, it was his desire to make a redistribution of the lands of the realm according to custom, but Queen Kaahumanu was opposed to it, and her influence was too strong for him, and beyond a few assignments among his intimate friends he relinquished his purpose. The distribution of lands, therefore, by Kamehameha I remained for the most part as a permanent settlement of the landed interests of the kingdom, to be afterwards modified in favor of the common people but never ignored.

I might also note that the King, being much impressed by what he had heard of the reforms introduced in Tahiti by the London Missionary Society, resolved to take a trip to England, so in November, 1823, the King and his Queen and a strong delegation sailed for England to educate themselves and to see whether there were other teachers equally capable or possibly better, and other religions more ancient and very likely more satisfying to the hungry soul than the one so lately taken in 1820, and on the day of his departure asked his people to continue in this new faith until his return to the islands, but both the King and his Queen died shortly after their arrival in London, and their remains were brought back by Lord Byron on the British frigate Blonde.

In 1833, Kamehameha III, known to the Hawaiians as Kamehameha the Good, then 20 years old, assumed the throne, and soon became deeply interested in public affairs. In many ways the unsatisfactory status of land matters was pressed upon his attention. The growing sentiment toward permanence in tenure powerfully influenced the situation. The defenseless and wretched condition of the common people in regard to their holdings appealed to his sense of humanity and to his sense of responsibility as their ruler. The inconsistency of his sovereign control of all the lands of the kingdom with any progress based upon the incoming tide of civilization became more and more evident every day.

The King consulted the great chiefs of the realm, who were in favor of permanence in tenure, and in 1839, on the 7th day of June, he proclaimed a bill of rights which has made his name illustrious and the day on which it was announced worthy of being forever commemorated by the Hawaiian people. It is especially interesting and impressive as the Hawaiian Magna Charta, which was not wrung from an unwilling sovereign by force or arms, but the free surrender of despotic power by a wise and generous ruler, impressed and influenced by the logic of events, by the needs of his people, and by the principles of the new civilization that was dawning on his land.

The following is a translation of this enlightened and munificent royal grant:

God has made of one blood all nations of men to dwell upon the earth in unity and blessedness. God has also bestowed certain rights alike on all men and on all chiefs and all people of all lands.

These are some of the rights which He has given alike to every man and every chief of correct deportment: Life, limb, liberty, freedom from oppression, the earnings of his hands, and the productions of his mind—not, however, to those who act in violation of the laws.

God has already established government and rule for the purpose of peace, but in making laws for the nation, it is by no means proper to enact laws for the protection of the rulers only, without also providing protection for their subjects; neither is it proper to enact laws to enrich the chiefs only, without regard to enriching their subjects also and hereafter there shall by no means be any laws enacted which are at variance with what is above expressed, neither shall any tax be assessed, nor any service or labor required of any man in a manner which is at variance with the above sentiments.

The above sentiments are hereby proclaimed for the purpose of protecting alike both the people and the chiefs of all these islands while they maintain a correct deportment; that no chief may be able to oppress any subject; but that chiefs and people be able to enjoy the same protection under one and the same law.

Protection is hereby secured to the persons of all people, together with their lands, their building lots, and all their property, while they conform to the laws of the kingdom, and nothing whatever shall be taken from any individual except by express provision of the laws. Whatever chief shall act perseveringly in violation of this declaration shall no longer remain a chief of the Hawaiian Islands, and the same shall be true of the governors, officers, and all land agents. But if anyone who is disposed shall change his course and regulate his conduct by law, it shall then be in the power of the chiefs to reinstate him in the place he occupied previous to his being disposed.

It will be seen that this bill of rights left much to be done in defining the rights in land granted by it. It appears by the constitution enacted by the King, the kuhina nui, or premier, and the chiefs the following year, that the feudal right of controlling transfers was still retained in the sovereign in the following words:

Kamehameha I was the founder of the kingdom, and to him belonged all the land from one end of the islands to the other, though it was not his own private property. It belonged to the chiefs and the people in common, of whom Kamehameha I was the head, and had the management of the landed property. Wherefore there was not formerly, and is not now, any person who could or can convey away the smallest portion of land without the consent of the one who had or has the direction of the kingdom.

During these years of undefined rights the common people were protected in their holdings by law to a certain extent. The question of proportionate interests of the King, the chiefs, and the common people in the lands of the kingdom was one of great difficulty. The constitution of 1840 distinctly recognized such a community of interest, but Hawaiian precedents threw no light upon the problem of division. It had been a new departure to admit that the people had any inherent right to the soil, and now to carry out that principle required the adoption of methods entirely foreign to the traditions of Hawaiian feudalism.

During this transition period the necessity of an organized government separate from the person of the King became apparent to the chiefs, and this was carried out by three comprehensive acts in 1845, 1846, and 1847. The first, "to organize the executive ministry of the Hawaiian Islands"; the second, "to organize the executive departments of the Hawaiian Islands"; and, third, "to organize the judiciary department of the Hawaiian Islands." As soon as the existence of a responsible government detached from the person of the King became an accepted feature of the political system, it was felt that in some way or other the Government ought to have public lands and become the source of land titles.

The act creating the executive department contained a statute establishing a board of royal commissioners to quiet land titles. This board considered the claims of various tenants and its decision was binding upon the Government.

This board decided that there were but three classes of vested or original rights in land, which were in the King or Government, the chiefs, and the common people, and these three classes of interest were about equal in extent.

Later in 1848 the great mahele or division was made, setting apart the land in three portions. The King and chiefs received for their portion 1,619,000 acres; the Government, 1,505,460 acres; the balance, amounting approximately to 984,000 acres, was not conveyed to the common people but reverted to the Crown.

The common people, being left out in the division after being recognized as owners of a third interest in the Kingdom, believing that new methods had to be adopted to place them in possession, assumed that these lands were being held in trust by the Crown for their benefit. What the trust was and whether or not it was performed is not clear. However, the lands were not reconveyed to the common people, and it was so held by each monarch from the time of the division in 1848 down to the time of the dethronement of Queen Liliuokalani in 1893.

Having shown the history of our land system and the injustice done the common people by those in power, I will now relate incidents showing the troublous times the Hawaiian Kingdom had from time to time with foreign powers, principally growing out of the selfish greed of individuals of those several Governments who had taken up residence in Hawaii, including the incidents whereby these same lands came into the possession of the United States Government.

The first foreigners to give the islands concern were the Russians. Gov. Baronoff, of Alaska, in pursuance of a determined design to establish a Russian colony in the islands sent the ship Bering in the year 1814 on a cruise to the islands. This ship was wrecked, but was followed soon after by three other vessels. The Russians constructed a fort at what is now Honolulu and mounted cannon there. This resulted in great excitement amongst the inhabitants and caused Kamehameha I to build a fort on Punchbowl, directly back of the city of Honolulu, and ordered the Russians to leave the islands. They did so without resistance, and subsequently the King received a communication from the Russian Government assuring him that the action of the Russians had been wholly without the consent of the Russian Government.

Upon the arrival in Honolulu of Mr. Richard Charlton, the British consul, in 1825, began a policy of diplomatic interference with Hawaiian affairs and harassed the Government continually, causing friction between the Hawaiian people and the British subjects. So in 1829 the King issued a proclamation over his name and that of Kaahumanu and 10 others of the highest chiefs, in which he declared that the laws of his country forbade murder, theft, licentiousness, the retailing of ardent spirits, Sabbath breaking, and gambling; and that these laws were in force against foreigners residing on the islands as well as his own people. The English consul threatened them with vengeance of Great Britian if they should presume to make any laws without first obtaining the sanction of his Government. The King replied that the law applied to the British consul as well as to the humblest native.

This continued until the year 1843, when Lord George Paulet arrived in Honolulu and immediately made harsh demands upon the King, at the same time clearing his ship for action in case the demands were not complied with. To forestall him and to avoid any further difficulty the islands were conditionally ceded to Great Britain, a commission being dispatched to take up the matter with the British Government. His act was condemned by his Government, and on July 25 of the same year Rear Admiral Thomas, commanding the British fleet in the Pacific, arrived in Honolulu and issued a proclamation restoring the monarchy.

Likewise the little island kingdom had its troubles with France, growing out of similar disregard of the Hawaiian law. France insisted on importing and selling intoxicating liquor within the kingdom. Trouble continued, and the King was forced to dispatch a commission to France. The King, seeing the insistance with which the French violated the local law regarding the selling of ardent spirits, formed the first temperance league ever known in an endeavor to curtail the illicit traffic, and which was composed of himself and his chiefs, the resolution adopted being as follows:

We will not drink ardent spirits for pleasure.
We will not traffic in ardent spirits for gain.
We will not engage in distilling ardent spirits.
We will not treat our relatives, acquaintances, or strangers with ardent spirits except with the consent of a temperate physician.
We will not give ardent spirits to workmen on account of their labor.

This unsettled condition remained until 1857, when matters were finally adjusted satisfactorily.

The American residents, seeing the possibility in sugar-cane growing and the manufacture of sugar, developed the industry to some extent, but it did not reach its height until King Kalakaua made a personal visit to Washington, and in 1876 a reciprocity treaty was negotiated and ratified by both the United States and Hawaiian Kingdom.

This prosperity lasted until 1890, the year the United States Congress passed the McKinley tariff bill, placing sugar on the free list and giving the American producer a bounty of $40 per ton. This act took from Hawaii all of the advantages it had enjoyed under the reciprocity treaty. The McKinley bill and the anxiety of those who had invested money in sugar production and the ever-present Japanese bugaboo furnished the necessary excuse for the overthrow of the Queen.

In 1893 the monarchy was overthrown. On the face of things it appeared as though the monarchy was overthrown from within by the people residing in the islands, but as a matter of fact the monarchy was overthrown by the superior forces of the United States, who landed marines from the U. S. S. Boston without permission or request of the Hawaiian Government and took their position between the palace and the Government building. At this time the most friendly relations existed between the United States and the Hawaiian Kingdom, dating from the first treaty made on December 23, 1826. On this particular day business of all kinds was being carried on as usual without interruption. Perfect quiet and good order existed throughout the city, there being not even a suggestion of disorder or danger to the life or property of either citizen or alien.

On the following day, nearly 24 hours after the landing of the American troops, on my way to the palace I saw a dozen or so foreigners, who had been previously assured of a recognition by the United States minister as soon as a provisional government was proclaimed, proceed to the Government building, where the leader read a proclamation deposing the Queen and establishing a provisional government. The only audience to this function that I could see besides their own number was the native janitor.

The marshal and the commander of the Queen's troops were ready and anxious to proceed immediately to take the Government building and arrest the parties in possession, but the presence of the American troops and certain rumors with regard to the attitude of the American minister caused the Queen's cabinet to confer with him officially before taking any action. They learned from the American minister in writing that he had recognized the provisional government and would support it with the United States troops.

As any action on the part of the Hawaiian officials meant a collision with the United States troops, the Queen decided, upon the advice of her cabinet, to surrender to the superior forces of the United States and await a settlement of the case on a presentation of the facts to the authorities in Washington.

The provisional government thus created, later made a protectorate of the United States, was then succeeded by a republic.

I mention these troublous times not with any malice toward either those who established the provisional government or toward the United States. My one desire is to point out how these lands, which we are now asking to be set aside for the rehabilitation of the Hawaiian race, in which a one-third interest of the common people had been recognized, but ignored in the division, and which had reverted to the Crown, presumably in trust for the people, were taken over by the Republic of Hawaii by an article of the constitution of the Republic of Hawaii, which reads as follows:

ART. 95. That portion of the public domain known as Crown lands is hereby declared to have been heretofore and now to be the property of the Hawaiian Government and to be free and clear from any trust of or concerning the same and from all claim of any nature whatsoever, upon the rents, issues, and profits thereof. It shall be subject to alienation and other uses as may be provided by law. All valid leases thereof now in existence are hereby confirmed.

By annexation these lands became a part of the public lands of the United States, and by the provisions of the organic act are under the custody and control of the Territory of Hawaii.

The tillable lands given to the Government at the time of the mahele or division of 1848 had practically all been disposed of prior to this time. So as soon as the Crown lands were available for purchase or settlement by virtue of article 95 of the constitution, as noted above, large areas were disposed of by the Government, and had it not been for the long-term leases made by King Kalakaua, which were extant at the time the constitution of the Republic of Hawaii was adopted, and which were recognized therein, the area of Crown lands at the time of annexation would have been considerably reduced.

The lands mentioned in this bill, which are to be set aside and leased for 99 years at a nominal rental to those of Hawaiian blood, are principally Crown lands on which the Kalakaua leases made 30 years ago are about to expire. I feel that as the United States came into possession of these lands after they had been confiscated by successful revolutionists, with the aid of the United States minister, Congress in its wisdom will recognize our claims.

Some of the Hawaiians who occupied lands at the time of the division as tenants by filing their claims obtained an allodial title to the land occupied. The total area received by them through this method was approximately 28,000 acres, and this area was divided among 3,000 families, while on the other hand 33 missionary families received 41,000 acres.

It is regrettable, however, that from the very beginning the missionaries did not use their influence to safeguard the title to this land, making it inalienable in years to come, as they had, no doubt, used their influence to have the division made on the plea that it would assist in Christianizing the islands, for, as time showed, the shrewd newcomer, who saw far ahead the industrial possibilities of the islands, outwitted the Hawaiian, who for generations had looked only upon the land as a means of producing his sustenance. Gradually the land passed away from him and in many cases the land went without hardly any return. Hence to-day the great majority of the Hawaiian people own no land.

The Hawaiian race is passing. And if conditions continue to exist as they do to-day, this splendid race of people, my people, will pass from the face of the earth. At the time of the discovery, in 1778, Capt. Cook estimated the population at 400,000, which he probably overestimated. Two hundred and fifty thousand would be about the correct number. The official census taken in 1832, 54 years later, revealed the fact that there were 130,319 Hawaiians, and to-day only 20,000 pure Hawaiians are left and an equal number of part Hawaiians.

The legislation proposed seeks to place the Hawaiian back on the soil, so that the valuable and sturdy traits of that race, peculiarly adapted to the islands, shall be preserved to posterity.

I think a situation is presented here that can be distinguished from any other. Perhaps we have a legal right, certainly we have a moral right, to ask that these lands be set aside. We are not asking that what you are to do be in the nature of a largesse or as a grant, but as a matter of justice—belated justice—and extend at least a helping hand, without cost to the Government of the United States, to the Hawaiians in their endeavor to rehabilitate themselves, a people who are thoroughly loyal to the Government of the United States.

It is a subject in comparison with which all others sink into insignificance, for our first and great duty is that of self-preservation. Our acts are in vain unless you can stay the wasting hand that is destroying my people. I feel a heavy and special responsibility resting upon me in this matter, but it is one in which you all must share; nor shall we be acquitted by man or our Maker of a neglect of duty if we fail to act speedily and effectually in the cause of my people.

Title III of this bill provides for amendments to the Hawaiian organic act.

In order to meet the increase in expense of the legislators who have come from the outside islands to attend the sessions of the legislature, it is provided by section 310 of this bill that the salary of the members of the legislature be increased from $600 for any regular session to $1,000 and from $200 for each special session to $500. The amendment also increases the mileage from 10 to 20 cents per mile for each member of the legislature in coming to and departing from the sessions. This is paid out of funds in the Territorial treasury.

Section 302 of this bill provides for the amendment to section 55 of the Hawaiian organic act whereby it is sought to permit the Territory to extend its indebtedness to 10 per cent of the assessed value of the property of the Territory. The Territory has found it necessary to extend its indebtedness in order to carry out projects in the course of construction and in contemplation.

I beg to call the attention of Congress to the fact that a good part of the then income necessary to meet the current expenses of former governments was derived from the customs receipts, post-office receipts, and postal savings bank, but by annexation we lost this revenue, which amounted at that time to half of the income of the Hawaiian Government. To meet that loss the Territory is forced to raise the taxes and issue bonds.

Hawaii has expanded rapidly in an industrial way since annexation, and the needs for public improvements to keep pace with this expansion have been great, far greater than could be provided by revenues from taxation alone, and in order to meet this vast outlay we have been compelled to issue bonds. While we have been running into debt consistently, we have been left out of consideration in the many bills enacted into law wherein the Federal Government assists the various States. Take, for example, the so-called good-roads act, passed in 1914. We do not benefit even though we have expended millions of dollars on the construction and maintenance of roads, which in a very large measure are used by the military forces located in the islands, and because of that it necessitates the building of a road of different type from that which our needs demand—a wider and heavier foundation of concrete.

Likewise, Hawaii was ignored in the last session of the last Congress, when by a rider on the Post Office bill a large expenditure of money was authorized for road construction in conjunction with the States, primarily to give employment to discharged soldiers, sailors, and marines.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, the mainland can point with pride to Hawaii and her participation in the great world conflict in the interests of humanity. Before and at the time of the declaration of war by the United States, Hawaii had already her full quota of 8,000 men in her National Guard. Before the draft law came into effect, our boys were already serving in great numbers in the allied armies. Besides these, many volunteered and served their country overseas. Later five of these Hawaiian boys were numbered among the first to give up their lives for their country and flag. [Applause.]

Still we were eliminated from participation in legislation beneficial to discharged soldiers and sailors. I might also add that not only did Hawaii go over the top in man power, but in addition oversubscribed its quota in each of the five Liberty loans and with the exception of the State of Nebraska was the only one of the States or Territories to oversubscribe its quota in war savings stamps. [Applause.] In addition we oversubscribed our quota in all the Red Cross drives and the united welfare campaign.

I want to call the attention of this House to the fact that some of the Members of Congress perhaps have the impression that Hawaii is foreign territory, not only in its institutions but also its people, somewhat in the same category as Porto Rico and the Philippines. Far from it, gentlemen. Hawaii came into the fold of this country not by conquest but by a treaty of annexation approved and ratified by both this country and the Government of Hawaii. By that treaty Hawaii was made a full-fledged Territory of the United States.

For 60 years prior to annexation Hawaii had a constitutional form of government, recognized by all the great powers of the world.

The system of government then was similar to that of this country. The American influence coupled with the natural love of liberty and justice among the Hawaiians brought about a system that needed very little adjustment in order to become an American Territory. The organic act provides that all Hawaiian laws not inconsistent with the Constitution and laws of the United States and the organic act should continue in force. This conclusion was reached after an investigation by a congressional commission who satisfied themselves that the dominating American influence for 75 years prior to annexation had resulted in a Government so like that of the United States that few changes were necessary. Among some of the laws repealed were the postal-savings law and the bankruptcy law, yet 10 years later Congress passed identically the same laws which Hawaii had before annexation and which the commission had repealed. The American flag in Hawaii floats over schools that have been essentially American for a hundred years and in which only the English language is taught. [Applause.]

It floats over the courts of justice conducted under the American system of jurisprudence, presided over by judges and impleaded by lawyers trained in the law schools of America. But we are not only Americans in our institutions and education, but also in the scientific development of our agriculture, the extent of our shipping, and most of all in our heavy payments to the National Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. I will.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It might be of interest to the membership to know that the first printing press in the State of Washington came from Hawaii. [Applause.]

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Our commerce has expanded with our industries. For the year 1919 our exports amounted to $88,000,000 and our imports to $55,000,000. Our shipping has also expanded from 1,800,000 tons in 1902 to 5,000,000 tons in 1914.

Hawaii, since annexation, has been and is contributing annually $3,000,000 into the National Treasury. I might also add that for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1918, the Territory of Hawaii paid $9,000,000 into the Treasury and she stood thirty-fourth amongst the States and Territories, including the District of Columbia, in internal revenue and returns. Bear in mind, gentlemen, this sum is over and above all expenses that the Federal Government incurs. We gladly contribute our share of the burden to the Federal Government the same as any other State does, but we do object emphatically in the rank discrimination in legislation wherein the Federal Government assists the various States and where we are left out. We have been and are continually burdening ourselves with indebtedness in the building and upkeep of our roads, which in a large measure are used by the military. We have our own workmen's compensation law, our vocational training law, and our farmer's loan law, besides expending over a million dollars a year in educating our alien population. In making these laws we never intended that the Federal Government should aid us in carrying them out, but if the Government wishes to assist the States in these laws, then why is Hawaii excluded from such benefits? [Applause.]

We do not ask for any favors, but we do object to having our citizens taxed for the benefit of the citizens of other States. All we ask is justice.

The Pacific every day comes more to the fore in our national affairs. Hawaii must be made easy of access from the mainland. Our harbors must be improved and our improvement projects must be carried out. If this extension of limit of indebtedness is permitted and our projects carried out, Hawaii will become not only in theory but in reality the crossroads and paradise of the Pacific.

It strikes me that when Congress passed the organic act it intended to permit the Territory to bond itself up to 10 per cent. Besides permitting the Territory to bond itself up to 7 per cent of the assessed value of property, it permitted the various counties to bond themselves up to 3 per cent. To date nearly 50 per cent of the money secured through bonds have been advanced to the counties, and they have not, on account of the credit extended by the Territory, issued any bonds.

Notwithstanding all this Hawaii still goes on and by the patriotic impulse of its citizens burdens itself with taxation and indebtedness so that Hawaii may still continue to be the paradise of the Pacific.

Section 303 of this bill seeks to amend section 66 of the organic act by making the governor a bona fide citizen and resident of the Territory. Section 311 seeks to place the same qualifications on the other appointees. Section 312 of the bill seeks to increase the salaries of the Territorial officials.

The governor, the secretary of the Territory, the supreme and circuit judges are appointed by the President of the United States, all of whom must be citizens of the Territory. By this bill it is sought to make them, besides being citizens, bona fide residents of the Territory, making them, in order to qualify, be residents of the Territory three years next preceding their appointment. The judges of the United States district court, the United States attorney, and the United States marshal are also appointed by the President, and it is sought by this bill to make them comply with the same condition. Under the present law there is no restriction as to residence within the Territory prior to appointment of the United States district judges, the attorney, and marshal. As a result many appointees were sent from the mainland. While in the main we have been fortunate in having men who were easily adaptable to our conditions, still I am a strong believer in the policy of home rule. We have men in Hawaii, born and raised there, who are capable of filling any Federal position, and, being familiar with the customs and conditions of our people, would make equally good and, I have no doubt, even better officials of the Government than those who are sent to Hawaii from the mainland.

I might add here that none of those officials are receiving salaries commensurate with their duties and responsibilities. The governor, particularly, is the first representative of the President of the United States to be met by the foreign traveler from the Orient or the Antipodes. He must maintain the traditional hospitality of the United States upon his comparatively small salary. I might also say right here that the Territory itself is paying its attorney general a larger salary than the Federal Government pays the governor.

Now, gentlemen, our Territorial judges are underpaid, and in order to secure the best of the legal profession we must allow them increased compensation. Take the United States district judges for example, who preside over our Federal court, the jurisdiction of which is very limited, having jurisdiction only over the military reservations and violations of Federal statutes and in admiralty. The great bulk of justice is dispensed in our circuit courts. Fully five times as much work is done by any one of the circuit judges as by the United States district judges. Litigation involving enormous sums of money come before our circuit courts. They have jurisdiction in all criminal and civil cases and matters in equity, and yet the Federal judges receive an annual salary of $7,500 and our circuit judges only receive $4,000. Even our police magistrate for the city of Honolulu receives more. This bill asks for proper adjustment of these salaries.

Section 313 of this bill provides a new section to the organic act dealing with the employment of citizen labor on Federal work in the islands. Let me call your attention to the existing labor conditions and the opportunity of skilled and unskilled labor in the Territory. You are more or less familiar with the fact that the Army and Navy maintain posts on the island of Oahu. Considerable construction work has been carried on in the past and still is being carried on by the Government on the military and naval reservations there. Upon this work the Government has been and still is employing cheap coolie labor who are not citizens and are ineligible to become citizens of the United States, and only because their labor is cheap.

In the efforts to Americanize the Territory and to induce Americans to come from the mainland and to assist the citizens to compete with this cheap alien labor, the Territory has laws which make it compulsory that citizen labor only be employed on all governmental work, either done by the Territory itself or by contractors for the Territory. [Applause.]

The American Legion of Hawaii is working diligently to the end that Hawaii become thoroughly Americanized. It has passed resolutions in favor of this provision, and also a resolution whereby it is sought to have the business houses of the Territory give preference to citizens in employment, and are seeking to have the business houses follow the resolutions to the letter. I call this fact to your attention, gentlemen, to show how every effort is being bent to bring about good results along this line, and I also bring this matter to the attention of Congress so that the people of the Union will be cognizant of the actions of this patriotic body of Hawaiians who served in the late war.

Mr. Chairman, I congratulate the American Legion of Hawaii for its patriotic stand in this regard. [Applause.]

The provision in this bill, if enacted into law, requiring the United States Government to do likewise, will have a beneficial effect, and if there is not a sufficient amount of a certain type of skilled labor within the Territory they will be attracted there by virtue of the fact that they are more or less assured steady employment, and thereby materially assist the Hawaiians to build up an American community. [Applause.]

The so-called supremacy of the alien labor in Hawaii is not solely due to the failure of the Federal Government in employing citizen labor. The Hawaiian Sugar Planters' Association has not aided and assisted along this line by giving preferential employment to citizens. In former years skilled citizen labor was employed on the plantations, but as the coolie or alien became well enough acquainted with the workings of the mill he supplanted the citizens. I regret that some of the plantations in the islands have placed their desire for increased return above the duty to Americanize the Territory. [Applause.] Had the plantations given preference to citizens in the skilled and semiskilled positions in the mills, pumps, shops, and so forth, and the Federal Government employed citizen labor, there would not have been the exodus of American citizen skilled labor to the mainland of the United States which has occurred ever since annexation. The Hawaiians, who for the love of their islands will not leave it, are compelled to remain under conditions adverse to their best interest and eke out an existence as best they can.

I feel very strongly that if Congress makes it mandatory that only citizen labor be employed on Federal work within the Territory, gradually the skilled labor from the mainland will come to the islands, and the Hawaiians and other citizens will return to their former trades from which they were driven by the alien, and thereby make Hawaii an American community. [Applause.]

As conditions have made the sugar plantations prosperous, and as the alien labor have clearly shown their atttiude in the recent strike, they would, I am sure, having seen the result of their former action, employ citizen skilled labor wherever possible.

Although Hawaii is paying more, yet the War Department objects to this section on the ground that it would make construction on the Army posts more expensive, as it would be necessary to hire citizen labor. What is a few dollars, gentlemen, when you consider citizenship and patriotism and the alien menace nursed and fostered in Hawaii by the Government itself?

Ever since annexation the Hawaiian people have been insistent that the policy of the Federal Executive and of Congress be to develop Hawaii as speedily as possible as an American community, still it must be evident to all that it will be impossible to build up an American community in those isolated islands in the mid-Pacific if the policy of the Government continues as it has since annexation.

Not only have the Hawaiian people been discouraged in their attempt to better their condition and to Americanize Hawaii under American rule but also have been deprived of the benefits of Americans visiting our fair isles.

We are entitled to the benefits which accrue from such travel, and we have hopes of attracting by that means settlers who will become a part of our community.

From the very foundation of the Government one of the fundamental principles of our Nation has been freedom of intercourse and commerce between the several States and Territories. That principle is written into the Constitution itself and has been elaborated upon in countless laws and court decisions. And yet, after 20 years of earnest effort since annexation, we still find Hawaii denied freedom of travel to and from the mainland through the application of a law never designed to apply to an insular Territory. [Applause.]

Mr. ALMON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Yes.

Mr. ALMON. Has Alaska the benefit of our law for national aid to roads? I do not remember.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. No.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. That is just the trouble. The Territories Committee has endeavored to have this aid to the States extended to Hawaii, but has not been able to succeed.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. The principal amendment to section 73 of the organic act is the proviso which allows the land commissioner, with the approval of the governor and at least two-thirds of the members of the land board of the Territory, to make leases of cultivated sugar-cane lands and to omit the withdrawal provisions, wherein these lands may be taken for homesteading purposes whenever he deems it advantageous to the Territory so to do. By this it is not the intention to abandon homesteading or to throttle it in any way. At the hearing before the committee on territories of the house of the Hawaiian Legislative Commission it was brought out that much of this land would bring $1,000 per acre were it possible for the Territory to sell it at public auction. It is safe to say that the average price on the whole area involved would be from four to five hundred dollars per acre. The committee did not think it expedient to release these valuable lands for homesteading purposes.

The leases on these lands which are about to expire were made about 30 years ago, without any reference to cane-land valuation, as the industry was small at that time and very little development had been made. The committee did not deem it fair to the Territorial government at this time, when these renewals can be made more advantageously and at a time when money is needed for schools and health, for harbor, road, and other improvements. They did not deem it sound judgment to turn over at a small fraction of its value all of this land at this time to homesteaders.

I have always been a consistent believer in homesteading, and all during my public career have sought to have the public lands cut up and given as homesteads to the people. However, when the Legislature of Hawaii was considering these highly cultivated lands, the leases of which were about to expire, they determined to lease one-fifth of them and approached Congress with such a resolution. The Legislature of Hawaii passed two conflicting resolutions—house concurrent resolution 28 and senate concurrent resolution 2. To avoid the conflict house concurrent resolution 28 provided "after adequate provision has been made by the Congress aforesaid to accomplish the purpose set forth in senate concurrent resolution 2." This clause gave the rehabilitation scheme the preference, and in order to properly provide for such a measure it was found necessary to lease the highly cultivated lands, and the committee having determined to assist in the rehabilitation of the Hawaiian race, as provided in senate concurrent resolution 2, decided to leave the proportion to the Territorial officials, in favor of the policy of home rule, which I have always backed. The present Territorial administration, I may frankly say, is the best that we have had, and no doubt they will arrange an amicable adjustment of these highly cultivated lands.

The area of these highly cultivated lands as compared with the total area of Government public land is very small, and as the success of the rehabilitation of the Hawaiian race depends largely upon the money raised from the leases of these lands, I am sure that the officials will weigh well the claims of the Hawaiian on the one hand and the homesteader who would benefit from the homesteading of these lands on the other.

I am a believer in giving the small man a piece of land and assisting him to become a prosperous member of the community. There is no patriotism so great as that which is rooted in the soil. I am a believer in and have been consistent in the policy of home rule, and I feel that this question should be settled by the Territory itself.

We have reached a point, gentlemen, where it is necessary to administer our land laws, particularly the homesteading law, for the benefit of the greatest number. It is useless under the peculiar conditions obtaining in Hawaii to cut up land and hold drawings if after the successful applicants go upon their land they are not assured financial assistance and such other help from the Government as would assist them in making a firm start. I believe that the idea as laid out in title 2 of this bill to assist those of Hawaiian blood in the Territory will be successful and will stand as an example to the homesteading of that large area of Government land which up to this time has only been used for pastoral purposes, but which, I am sure, can be made as fruitful as other lands of the Territory.

Charges were made by my opponents in the last election that if the Federal farm loan act should be so amended as to include Hawaii the homesteader would thereby be benefited and enabled to borrow Federal money to develop his homestead. Knowing that this was impossible under the provisions of the Federal farm loan act, for the reason that while the homesteader is in the process of proving up and securing title to his allotment he has no security to offer, I therefore urged upon Territorial Senator Wise that proper legislation be passed by the Hawaiian Legislature which would enable the homesteader particularly to borrow Government money and thus assist him in his efforts to make good on the land. Yet when this bill was before the House of Representatives of Hawaii it was so amended that it took away most of the benefits that were originally in the Wise bill, called the farmers' loan act.

Much has been said concerning the failure of homesteading in Hawaii, and the claim has been made that those who applied for homes on Government land were principally speculators, who were desirous of obtaining title to the land as quickly as possible, as easily as conditions would permit, and at a valuation which would be less than the actual value of the land itself. The governmental policy is to appraise land for homesteading purposes at less than the actual value. As soon as they obtained title they would sell their holdings and receive the actual value.

In my opinion one of the vital troubles in regard to homesteading in the past has been the hostility of the plantations to the homesteaders and the lack of interest and support of former Government administrations. Some of the Government lands have been cut into lots so small that it was absolutely impossible for a man to establish a home upon them and make a living for himself and family. These conditions, I am glad to say, are being remedied somewhat, but there is still much to be done.

The homesteader who draws a lot upon which cane has been growing naturally desires to continue the cultivation of cane, and as his cane is useless to him unless taken by the neighboring mill and converted into sugar his success or failure is entirely in the hands of the mills. Many of the contracts for looking after and grinding the homesteader's cane are such that it is impossible for him to make more than a bare living, and often when the crop is matured and is turned over to the plantation a debit balance is carried over against his next crop. This has a tendency to discourage the homesteader, and very often as soon as he acquires title he disposes of his holding.

Homesteading on other than cane land has not been a success for varying reasons. If it is possible to grow vegetables, fruits, and so forth, which could be profitably sold in Honolulu and other centers of population, freight rates have eaten up the profits. In the past considerable tracts of public land which the plantations could not cultivate for sugar have been opened to homesteading; much of it has been land which was more or less inconveniently situated and without roads and transportation facilities. In case the homesteader on this sort of tract did grow something for market, he would be doomed to failure before he started.

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, having explained the bill as fully as possible in the limited time granted me, I respectfully ask that the bill do pass as submitted. [Loud applause, the Members rising.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I.—DEFINITIONS.

SECTION 1. This act may be cited as the "Hawaiian homes commission act, 1920."

SEC. 2. When used in this act the term "Hawaiian organic act" means the act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is the committee going to rise?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13500) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS, COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 567.

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ such additional clerks as may be necessary during the remainder of this session of Congress, the payment of services not to exceed $100, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. IRELAND. Mr. Speaker, this is a resolution that is always passed just prior to the adjournment of Congress and is anticipatory to an adjournment or recess, and this permits the Committee on Enrolled Bills to employ additional help, which they need owing to the congestion just as this time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Can the gentleman tell us when we are going to recess or adjourn?

Mr. IRELAND. I am very sorry that I am unable to do so. I wish I might.

Mr. PARRISH. I understand that there are some three or four other bills that have been reported by the Committee on Accounts, and I wish to ask the chairman if he can give me any idea when those bills will be put before the House for action?

Mr. IRELAND. I can not.

Mr. PARRISH. Can the gentleman refer me to anybody who can?

Mr. IRELAND. I am sorry to say I can not.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRELAND. Certainly.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman intimated that the necessity for the passage of this resolution arises from the fact that it is the usual resolution which is passed just before adjournment or recess. That would carry with it that we are going to adjourn or recess. The gentleman would not make that statement without he has some foundation for it?

Mr. IRELAND. The gentleman knows nothing about what action the House may take.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has notified the gentleman that he has changed his plans differently from what he intimated some time ago?

Mr. IRELAND. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

USE OF ARMY TRANSPORTS TO OLYMPIC GAMES.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 179.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate joint resolution 179, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 179) authorizing use of Army transports by teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and international competitions.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Secretary of War to use such Army transports as may be available for the free transportation of teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and other international competitions.

With committee amendments, as follows:

First committee amendment. Insert the following preamble:

"Whereas many of the teams now planning to go to Europe to participate in the Olympic games and international competitions are members of the Army and Navy and Marine Corps; and

"Whereas one of the objects of these games and competitions is to stimulate interest in marksmanship and rifle practice; and

"Whereas there is a scarcity of shipping facilities, and it is impossible for the teams going from the United States to secure privately owned steamships: Therefore be it."

And the second committee amendment: Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Secretary of War, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to use such Army transports as may be available for the transportation of teams, individuals, and their equipment, representing the United States in Olympic games and other international competitions during the present year."

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I will be glad to.

Mr. BEE. How many does this resolution contemplate will go?

Mr. SANFORD. If the House will let me make a brief statement, I will say that the committee has been considering this matter for a long time. The Committee on Military Affairs has reported it. It has the earnest approval of the Secretary of War. Altogether there will be probably about 300 men in the party, of which number about one-third are members of the Army and Navy. Both the Army and Navy desire to send shooting teams to the Olympic games.

Mr. BEE. Is it contemplated that the transports shall go for this specific purpose, whether or no?

Mr. SANFORD. No; the committee would never have reported this resolution if it were not for this situation. On account of the steamship situation it is absolutely impossible for these men to get transportation abroad on privately owned steamers. We have investigated that matter and have taken it up with all of the steamship companies in New York, and unless we do this we can not have an American team take part this year in the Olympic games.

The Secretary of War says that it would be desirable for the American teams to compete. The Army and Navy both will send shooting teams, and, so far as we can see, it will not cost the Government a penny to carry on the transports the others who are not in the Army or Navy. It need not necessarily be considered as a precedent.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman spoke of the 300 men from the Army and Navy, and if 500 were transported that would leave 200 not accounted for; and that fact, following the suggestion of a recess or adjournment, might be considered significant. Can the gentleman tell us whether any of our colleagues are going on this summer trip?

Mr. SANFORD. I do not understand so. This resolution does not authorize any of our colleagues to go unless they qualify on the Olympic teams. If we have any sprinters or jumpers among us, perhaps they might go. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. All the expenses are to be paid by the Government?

Mr. SANFORD. The Government pays no expense, and the regulations of the Secretary of War will be such as are usual on such occasions, that each man will pay for his board on the ship. The resolution provides that the transports are to be furnished under such regulations as the Secretary of War shall prescribe.

Mr. BLANTON. But the other people who will go on this trip will undoubtedly involve some expense, will they not?

Mr. SANFORD. Of course, the Army can send its own men and the Navy can send its own men without this regulation.

Mr. BLANTON. But when they eat the food on the ship the people of the United States will have to pay for that food, at a time when we are not now raising more than a minimum amount of it.

Mr. SANFORD. The Secretary of War will by this resolution create no charge against the Government of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. I will not consent to the passage of this resolution without the presence of a quorum. I wish the gentleman would follow a good suggestion I heard a while ago. If the gentleman will send these 300 men down to the farms in Texas, they might produce something worth while.

Mr. SANFORD. These boys will come from all over the United States, from the teams in the various States in the country, and the Army and the Navy are interested in the matter on account of the athletic features involved. We want these boys to compete in the service in order to hold up the name of America in these Olympic games this year. The committee has gone into it very carefully and has agreed to bring this out.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, Mr. Speaker, I will follow the gentleman's advice and withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SISSON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point that no quorum is present.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 1 minute p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, May 22, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, May 22, 1920.

(Legislative day of Friday, May 21, 1920.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION (S. DOC. NO. 277).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $1,500,000, required by the Bureau of Internal Revenue for the employment of guards and watchmen, and other expenses necessary in the prevention of violations of the "national prohibition act," being for the fiscal year 1921, which, with accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 327) terminating the state of war declared to exist April 6, 1917, between the Imperial German Government and the United States, permitting on conditions the resumption of reciprocal trade with Germany, and for other purposes.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the motion of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13587) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. KENYON. I think the motion is debatable.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a debatable motion.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, this matter arose last night and I asked that it might go over until to-day, and announced that at that time I thought we might as well make a test as to whether or not the bill (S. 3944) to create a Federal live-stock commission should be brought up. A number of Senators have spoken to me and stated that they feel such an effort at this time would not be best, because they do not want to be put in the position of voting against the consideration of the Army appropriation bill, even though they favor bringing up the packers' regulation bill. I think there is a good deal of force in that statement, and the full strength of those who are in favor of bringing up the packers' legislation and having it considered would not be fairly shown in a vote as against the consideration of an appropriation bill.

On yesterday the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], in the course of the able address of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK], said:

> I am very glad to have heard the remarks of the Senator, and I think he can safely state that every Senator on this side of the Chamber would support him in a motion to take up the bill; and if there is any trouble about time, I feel equally as secure in saying that every Senator on this side of the Chamber would support a proposition on his part to fix a day for a vote upon the bill.

The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] in his address said:

> While I have no authority for such a statement, I feel justified in the assertion that every Democratic Senator in this Chamber would be willing and ready to vote to take up this measure and consider it before adjournment.

I think with those statements and the fact that there are a number of Senators on this side of the Chamber who will vote with the Senator from Wyoming to take up Senate bill 3944, if he should make the motion, or the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] if he should make the motion, or with myself if I should make the motion, it will insure bringing up the bill before adjournment.

Under those circumstances, speaking only for myself and perhaps a few others, we will do everything we can to expedite the passage of the appropriation bills, but at any time when appropriation bills are not before the Senate, we shall attempt to bring up this particular bill.

Mr. KENDRICK. Mr. President, I wish to say to the Senator from Iowa that in order to avoid any delay of legislation that is absolutely essential, as we all know, I should like to defer any effort to call up Senate bill 3944 until the appropriation bills are out of the way, and then when a motion is made to take up the bill, I should like to have it made so as not to interfere with other bills on the calendar, but ask for unanimous consent for a vote upon the legislation, and either accept it or reject it within a given length of time. I would be perfectly willing to see the discussion of it reduced to two days, or three days, or even, if thought best, to one day.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] have done more work on Senate bill 3944, which is now on the calendar, providing for the control and regulation of the packing industry, than any other two Senators or any other two men. I shall, of course, defer to their wishes with respect to making a motion to take up the bill. I was in hopes, however, that we could make it the unfinished business and then lay it aside whenever an appropriation bill or a conference report was ready for consideration.

Mr. President, I think there is a great deal of misinformation as to the provisions of the packing bill in the form it has been reported to the Senate. I assume that a vast majority of the Senators were opposed to the first draft of the bill because it provided for a licensing system. There is absolutely nothing in the bill which compels any one engaged in that industry to take out a license. It is true there is a provision in the bill for voluntary registration, but as I understand the disposition, while I do not want to make any misstatement with reference to any of the Senators, they are willing to let that provision go out.

Mr. President, what is there left in the bill that is objectionable to anyone? If I were a stockholder in a packing industry I would welcome this legislation. Without the voluntary system for a license there is nothing in the bill which will injure any of the packing concerns. I believe it would be a helpful condition for those engaged in the industry if this legislation were passed. It merely provides for the appointment of a commission, and it only gives that commission authority to make inspections and to make reports. Certainly no honest business, and I class the packers' business with honest business, ought to be opposed to a scheme of that sort.

What does the bill provide? I do not intend to take more than a few moments on it. The principal duties imposed on the agencies by the proposed legislation are:

(a) They are prohibited from engaging in unfair, unjustly discriminatory, or deceptive practices in interstate commerce;

(b) They are prohibited from buying or selling live stock in such manner as to apportion the supply, unreasonably affect the price, or create a monopoly;

(c) They are prohibited from dealing in foodstuffs other than livestock products where the result is to lessen competition;

(d) They are prohibited from apportioning territory or purchases or arranging or agreeing to control prices;

(e) They are prohibited from agreeing or arranging among themselves to prevent any other person from carrying on any business which competes with them;

(f) They are required within two years after the act becomes effective to dispose of their ownership or interest in stockyards unless this time is extended for good cause.

As to the latter provision, I understood those who testified before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry with regard to the bill were not opposing the idea of divorcing the stockyards from the packing industry. The stockyards were only set up for the convenience of the packers. Certainly there ought to be no objection to any item in the bill, especially if the volunteer licensing system is eliminated.

Mr. President, why should Congress refuse to at least take a vote on this legislation which has been pending before Congress for years? I shall not make any statement which will reflect on anyone engaged in the packing industry. I believe there are honest men engaged in the packing industry. There are many of them who are what we call small packers. Certainly there is no reason why the big five packers should make this tremendous fight against the legislation. The American people have been tolerant with those people.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD without reading a statement which shows the profits and the condition of all the big five packers since the beginning of their business, showing their stock, their increased capitalization, their surplus, and their dividends. I do this in order to give information to the Senate and the country. This statement was prepared by the Federal Trade Commission.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Original investment, growth in capitalization, profits, and dividends, five great packers.

	Original investment.		Capital stock outstanding.			Profits and dividends.
	Date.	Amount.	Stock sold for cash or equivalent.	Stock dividends paid or equivalent.	Outstanding November, 1918.	Period.	Reported profits.	Dividends and drawings.

[1] Includes original investment.
[2] Stock dividends were in reality somewhat more than this, in that very high dividends were declared in early years with express purpose of providing cash for purchase of new stock. Exact amount so converted can not be determined.
[3] Does not include cash dividend of $25,000,000 used for purchase of new stock.
[4] Includes original corporation capitalization, which undoubtedly was largely made up of earnings of old partnership.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to make some remarks touching the same subject.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Does the Senator wish to interrupt me?

Mr. LODGE. I only want to say a word, but I will wait until the Senator has finished.

Mr. SHERMAN. I yield to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. LODGE. I do not desire to debate it at all.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not desire to debate it.

Mr. LODGE. I only wish to say that I am very glad that the Senator from North Dakota, the Senator from Wyoming, and the Senator from Iowa have taken the ground they have in regard to the supply bills. I am very anxious, and I think we all ought to be very anxious, to get the great supply bills of the Government through. There is no intention on my part, at least, to try to shut out any bill. If a majority of the Senate desire to consider the packers' bill, I am perfectly willing. I have no objection to make to it at all; but I do think that we ought to dispose of the great supply bills as rapidly as possible. I am very glad indeed that the Senators agree with me about that.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA] has inserted in the RECORD certain alleged facts relating to the Chicago meat packers. They are but a repetition of what has been for long time persistently thrust before the public by the Federal Trade Commission; it is but

When the Senator says that it provides for a voluntary system of registration, I remind him that a glance at the bill will show, as will be demonstrated, before the discussion ends in saying in other words, using snynonymous language, practically the same thing that has been said since their report of a year or two ago, which constituted a concentrated attack upon the industry. The bill pending here is a bill reported by the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, of which the Senator from North Dakota is the chairman. He alleges that the bill is entirely harmless; that it contains nothing that would be at all obstructive or embarrassing to any of the different packing concerns of the country. The Senator from North Dakota may think so, but if he does he is seemingly a bland innocent. I will concede for the purposes of discussion that he sincerely thinks this is a perfectly innocent measure, but he has been led into grievous error if he has arrived at and adheres to that conclusion. After he shall have discovered the reach of this bill, thereafter it will be wholly with malice aforethought if its passage is insisted on.

The Senator has, in a general way, remarked, as did the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] yesterday, on the purposes and contents of this bill. Neither of them seems to grasp what it will do or what its authors, the responsible gentlemen who wrote it, had in their minds it should do; because I can not think it was written altogether in the Committee on Agriculture; I think its inspiration came from some place else.

this Chamber, that the voluntary registration system is an involuntary one unless it is proposed to suffer the penalties that are to be inflicted by the bill.

I do not intend, Mr. President, under the tolerance given me by the Senate, to discuss the merits of the bill, but only such matters as have been referred to this morning.

The bill, however, first confers upon the live-stock commission the same power which is conferred by the act of Congress upon the Federal Trade Commission. Going further, it confers upon them all the power of the Bureau of Markets of the Department of Agriculture. That is provided in a title of the bill preceding Title V, respecting the voluntary registration of packers and stockyards. The portion of the bill referring to voluntary registration provides for a standardized system of packing plants, and provides for collecting information. The Bureau of Markets already collects information on a great variety of subjects relative to the production of food. Under the present law both animal and vegetable foods, as well as market conditions, are covered by the Bureau of Markets. Those functions are now proposed to be taken over by the live-stock commission, so far as relates to meat products. It is then proposed, in section 5, that all who do not register shall be discriminated against; that the live-stock commission may deny to nonregistrants all of the governmental information which is collected in the bureau.

In a preceding section the live-stock commission is given the power generally to legislate on this subject—not Congress but the live-stock commission—to make such rules for the regulation of the business as it sees fit; and the bill provides penalties for the nonobservance of the rules which are made by the live-stock commission. It is a voluntary abdication of the powers of legislation and the enactment of penalties and putting them in the hands of an appointive body.

When the Senator makes an appeal that the public shall be informed upon this question, I desire to say that I shall take care in this Chamber that they are fully informed upon the iniquity which is proposed and the precedent which is sought to be created for every line of industry in the country.

The bill is not sponsored by its original creators in good faith. The Senators who present it are in good faith, but the malevolent outfit back of it and of the agitation for the last five or ten years in this country is made up of a gang of the most arrant demagogues that ever infested any community. I know them of old. They have imposed upon the Senate committee; they have imposed upon Senators; they are mere agitators and destroyers; and for them I have a supreme contempt, while highly respecting the Senators who have unwittingly lent themselves to their sinister designs. They never created anything. No industry has arisen from their efforts. No pay rolls ever follow their footsteps save that imposed on the Public Treasury.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want to prolong this discussion, Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. I will prolong it in due season. We may just as well reach it now and let the inflammation out.

Mr. GRONNA. But I wish to say to the Senator from Illinois that the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, while some of us unfortunately or fortunately are not lawyers——

Mr. SHERMAN. So much the better.

Mr. GRONNA. Have given the matter consideration, and we have used our own judgment as to the provisions of the present bill.

The Senator from Illinois refers to voluntary registration. The provision in reference to that matter is incorporated solely for the purpose of encouraging cooperative marketing. The Senator is well informed not only with reference to legislation in the United States but in foreign countries as to what cooperative marketing means; and I will say to the Senator in good faith that is all that the provision with reference to voluntary registration is intended to accomplish.

Let me say further to the Senator that the meat industry amounts in volume to more than the railroad industry, to more than the business of the railroads. We have an Interstate Commerce Commission looking after the railroads; and I say to the Senator in all seriousness and good faith that I believe it would be beneficial to the packing industry of the country—and I refer now to no particular packers—I believe it would be beneficial to the entire packing industry of the country if legislation of this kind were enacted, because under present conditions, as the Senator knows, throughout the entire country the people are making charges of all sorts against the industry. If the proposed commission were created and good men were appointed, who, as provided in the bill, shall not be allowed to engage in any other business, but shall devote all their time to this particular business, confidence would be created in the business, and it would afford protection to the packing industry instead of doing the industry an injury.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President, the people who have spread the information are Mr. Burke, Mr. Lassiter, and Mr. Kent, if I must give names, who began as live-stock producers on a ranch in Nebraska, say, and various other western points, and have branched out and created a National Live Stock Association and have spread persistently, in season and out of season, the matter referred to by the Senator from North Dakota that has aroused a certain portion of the population.

There are less than $900,000,000 of capital and surplus actually engaged in the packing business, while there are $20,000,000,000 engaged in the railroad business—twenty times as much and more—and the Senator, well informed as he is, knows it as well as I do. The packing business does not rank with the steel industry. There is more money invested in the poultry business than there is in the entire capital stock of the packing industry, which is attacked by this bill. Let us have a poultry commission, in order to inspect and encourage hens in due season and to mitigate the fervor of the opposite sex. [Laughter.] Where will it all end? There are enough roving commissions going around now over the country drawing salaries from the burdened Treasury.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, I know the Senator does not wish to minimize the chicken or poultry industry. It is greater than the wheat industry; it ranks next to the corn crop. I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SHERMAN. The corn crop is the largest one agricultural industry in the United States, taking into account its legitimate uses since the country went dry and taking also into account what used to be wasted for bread. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRONNA. I do not want the Senator to discuss the capitalization of the industry; I want him to discuss the entire industry. I had reference to the industry as a whole.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will discuss the entire industry, if the Senator desires, at some opportune time. The difficulty is that the Senator does not distinguish at present, with the information he has from the constituency referred to, who are spreading misinformation over the country, the difference between invested capital and capital stock. The inventory values are a part of the working capital of every successful concern in the packing business in Chicago. Their inventory values fluctuate from day to day and from month to month.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, the Senator did not understand me. I said to the Senator that we ought to discuss the entire industry and not the capitalization of the industry. I referred only to the amount of business done by the stock industry; the Senator did not hear me.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator has in mind the volume of business?

Mr. GRONNA. The volume of business; yes.

Mr. SHERMAN. When we undertake to measure our activities and the profits by the volume of business, then the Federal Trade Commission says we are in error; that our bookkeepers are dunces and that we are thieves. That is their report. When they try to base their profits earned on the volume of business, showing 1.6 cents on every dollar's worth of turnover for every 12 months, the Federal Trade Commission repudiates the method. Under the regulations of a paternal Government limiting our profits to 2 per cent and our dividends on invested capital to 9 per cent, then we are attacked, and Mr. Hoover, for whom nobody can accuse me of having any predilection, is attacked because he fixed that rate of income or profit during the war. If the Senator from North Dakota refers to the volume of business, I am willing to discuss the question on that basis at a fit time, but the Senator will find himself involved in a lasting controversy with the Federal Trade Commission, and especially with its chairman, who in his last report takes considerable umbrage because the packers insist on estimating their profits on the volume of business and show how much they earn every 12 months on a dollar's worth of business.

The distinguished gentlemen on the Federal Trade Commission have a system of accounting that but few accountants in the civilized world ever heard of or ever practiced, and which no successful business men ever put into operation and long remain solvent. That is the kind of stuff that is scattered out to the dear American public in order to inflame them, and cause the agitation that these gentlemen, with their ears constantly to the ground, mistake for the voice of the people.

I have seen a good many people with their ears to the ground, right up close to it, mistake the rumble. Instead of being the advancing onset of a majority, it has often turned out to be a minority after the ballots got into the box. Probably one of my political crimes is supporting for many years the direct election of Senators. I think it has converted us into a coterie of Congressmen at Large sitting in this body, and robbed the Senate of its original functions as it was designed by the fathers who framed the Constitution. Most of us always have our ears to the ground. A man who can not sometimes, on a principle of right, face an angry multitude is not fit to sit in this body. If you can not take your political life in your hands once in a while and go out on a question of governmental righteousness and instruct men who know nothing about what they are preaching to you, then you are unfit to hold a seat in this body. If I had my way about it, I would limit the legislative functions of this body as it has grown to be now. Why, under the new system of elections there are two Congressmen at Large from every State with not a Senator.

In every large State, look at the results of this agitation in every large stock-raising or food-producing center. Here is a comparative handful made up of two or three hired attorneys lending themselves to this agitation. When it comes to a question of lawyers, I never knew a case or a question, right or wrong, that could not hire two or three distinguished lawyers on either side to keep up the agitation. So they have their attorneys employed, paid for by the Government. They have gone on with their system of spreading misinformation, and some of it, unwittingly, has been inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

In due season, Mr. President, if it is insisted that it be done at this session of Congress, before we separate here, whether it be a recess or an adjournment, I shall take up these matters in detail; and I will say this, with all due respect to the Federal Trade Commission: They have a very erroneous conception of the laws of their country. They have no conception of the Constitution of the country, and less respect for the courts, and less knowledge of actual business. To them the Constitution is a collection of obstacles, a thing to be denounced because it was written a long time ago, and anything that is ancient is to be condemned.

These gentlemen have produced report after report, agitation following upon agitation every year. They are here in Congress. They are not lobbyists—certainly not. They are distinguished statesmen, promoting the public welfare.

If a packer in Chicago were to run for the Senate, become a member of the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, frame a bill, or have somebody else frame it, that would put all the stock-raising industry, the cattlemen, under the control of a commission on the pasturage, the range, the price of cattle, how they should be sold, and how they should be raised and bred, and fix the age at which every calf should be slaughtered, and destroy the production of veal, and provide that every calf when it got to be 2 years old had to be slaughtered, and a packer were to come in here and sit in the Senate in his seat and promote such legislation as that, there would be a mighty caterwaul of rage going up from these Senators that would rend the very heavens. It would even be said that they were unfit to grace a seat in this Chamber; and still there are Senators, whose names I will forbear to mention, who are here, by this identical legislation, promoting their business as cattle raisers. Why can one occupation elect those in it to Congress to promote that pursuit and be crowned with a halo of civic virtue and a packer be denounced as a private citizen for defending himself from ruin?

If a packer sat here and did what cattle raisers do in this Chamber these saints would be smitten dumb with horror.

What is the difference between a cattle raiser and a packer? I knew slightly the elder Armour. He came down from Milwaukee in earlier days. When the firm started business in Chicago in 1867 it had $160,000 in money, and that is all Philip Armour had in the world, except his ability to do business. It has grown, but its capital stock has not multiplied as much as that of my neighbor in the corn belt who entered his land at $1.25 an acre in his lifetime, and to-day it is worth $460. He, too, is drawing interest on watered stock, but as long as it is the calloused-handed producer back of the plow handles everybody shouts "amen," and the Senator from North Dakota, of course, will say with me that it is thrice blessed that it is so.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHERMAN. With great pleasure.

Mr. GRONNA. Does the Senator undertake to say that the lands he refers to in Illinois pay the same rate of dividends upon the amount he names that the packers have received in dividends upon their capital stock?

Mr. SHERMAN. No; I did not say that.

Mr. GRONNA. I think the Senator ought to discuss that subject.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will discuss it in due time.

Mr. GRONNA. Some day when we are not so anxious to adjourn I shall be very glad to discuss it with the Senator from Illinois.

Mr. SHERMAN. If the Senator wants to stay all summer, as long as I have got to stay here, he will have ample time both to hear from me and to respond. I have made up my mind that if I have to stay here through the summer I will stay, but I shall furnish such entertainment as I am able during that time. I am not a candidate for office, thank Heaven. I shall not be on the ticket, for which I again return thanks; and there is nobody so well equipped as I am to stay here through midsummer and until the black haws are ripe in the Wabash country. We will let the G. O. P. save itself. We will remain and discuss the question of answering the demands of a few vociferous cattlemen by proxy. Few of them raise cattle. Some who are in official stations are large producers of cattle. I could incidentally remark here—I will get to the market some time when we are discussing this question, Mr. President—that one of them received the highest price for cattle in the Chicago market that he ever received in his life, in this same market that he is now trying to destroy. I state this measure will destroy the live-stock markets in the principal parts of the country, those of Kansas City, Omaha, Chicago, St. Louis, and such other points in the West and Southwest as can be included in that classification.

I do not wish to cover these questions now. It is only because of the questions asked that I have been led off into this digression. I was speaking of the bill. This voluntary registration provision is framed with the deliberate purpose of making outlaws of all those that do not register and bringing upon them a Government boycott, denying them information from the Bureau of Markets, putting them upon the prohibited list, rendering them subject to the surveillance and suspicion of every sleuth bearing a Government commission that is turned out of this Capital to prey upon the legitimate industries of this country. That is what this section of the voluntary registration bill will do. It makes outlaws of all who do not register; and then, to confound the thing still worse, it undertakes to establish a standardized packing house.

Why, I would just as lief, for my part, undertake to standardize an undershirt. Everybody has his own choice on that, according to his ability and his physial condition. Standardize a packing house! Well, you will standardize the breeding of cattle, the handling of chickens, the cutting of side meat. Standardize accounts! Of course, arithmetic is arithmetic. It has been from the time the Arabs invented it. The laws are the same. They are like the laws of nature. We do not change that; but the methods of applying it in bookkeeping are infinite. They propose to establish a uniform system; and then turn back to the title preceding that. It was quite innocently, and wholly by mischance, of course, that this evidence taken by the live-stock commission should be taken under the powers of the Federal Trade Commission.

What has the Federal Trade Commission done under the exercise of those powers? I know there is a weak denial proceeding from hesitating lips when they are charged with it and brought to book. These investigations are ex parte. No opportunity is given to cross-examine witnesses.

The days of the Inquisition never saw such narrow, unjust, illegal examination of witnesses as that before the Federal Trade Commission. It is a disgrace to the name of Government—an ex parte hearing, the entire ransacking of everybody's desk, his books, papers, and correspondence. Letters running back for 25 years were sought to be taken, without a search warrant describing them, by breaking into the office, by opening the vaults, by prying up the lids of roll-top desks and taking away what they pleased; and it was only halted by an application to the Federal courts that stopped them and delivered an opinion that this provision of the bill was wholly beyond the Constitution. Then Mr. Colver turned around and anathematized the Constitution as an ancient, antique document that is designed as a sheltering place of rogues. It is such a pass that affairs in this country have reached.

Why, the packers were indicted; Mr. Armour was indicted in Chicago about 1905 or 1906. My distinguished friend and very able lawyer from Iowa [Mr. KENYON], who is absent, was a Government attorney in that prosecution. A jury was had—12 good and lawful men, the peers of the defendants. Who were they—bankers, millionaires, stockbrokers, members of bond houses, and so forth? No; they were the same kind of constituents that these gentlemen now say are in an astonishing uproar urging them into this legislation. They were farmers, nearly all of them. One of them I served with in the legislature was an actual farmer. He was a successful farmer, stock raiser, cattleman, hog producer, member of the State board of agriculture, and was at every State agricultural fair and exhibit there was in Illinois. He was, with others like him, on the jury, and they lived within the destructive jaws of the market arrangements that are anathematized by these reports of the Federal Trade Commission. They heard all the evidence and acquitted the packers—a jury of farmers did.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President——

Mr. SHERMAN. Just a moment. Six years ago I asked the promoters of this legislation if they did not agree with me, and they said they had no explanation to make of the vagaries of juries. A sense of justice, the administration of law, the finding of the defendant not guilty by a jury of his peers, is a vagary of a jury. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. GRONNA. The Senator from Illinois is always fair, and I know he wants to be fair in this matter. I hope he will not make it appear that the members of the committee have drawn the bill based upon anything other than what has absolutely been done by some commission. The Senator, of course, knows that Mr. Armour, Mr. Swift, and a great many of those prominent men were before our committee for a number of days, and we had testimony from their own lips in reference to many of these matters. I do not think we disagree as much as the Senator imagines on some of the provisions of the bill.

The Senator referred to the matter of bookkeeping. To show the Senator that we are not trying to discriminate, I will state that we are trying to standardize the bookkeeping of the farmers, and there is a provision in the last Agricultural appropriation bill appropriating a small amount of money, in the office of Farm Management and Farm Economics, to have the farmers keep books, to standardize the bookkeeping of the farmers. I simply mention it to show that we are not only legislating against the packers; we are acting in the interest of the farmers in trying to standardize their business.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Illinois permit me to ask a question of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHERMAN. Certainly.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Surely the Senator did not mean to say that there was a provision in the Agricultural bill to compel farmers to keep books?

Mr. GRONNA. No.

Mr. SHERMAN. It would not be compulsory.

Mr. GRONNA. There is nothing compulsory about it. It is just as compulsory as any provision in this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. The farmer can absorb the information or can reject it with scorn, as he sees fit. That is correct, is it not? This bill forces packers to accept Government bookkeeping. I will just put that alongside of the provision for cottage cheese, and for smoking out rats in a barn when you do not want to burn the barn down to get the rats, and for a host of noxious, predatory, herbaceous, and carnivorous insects of various kinds which have been discovered by salaried job holders to be very hurtful to the farmer. If there has been any scheme presented in this Chamber, if there has been some unholy, hoary relic of prejudice generated by these quick-spawned statesmen on commissions and bureaus going about over the country, if there is some indefensible raid upon the Treasury, some fresh burden to be saddled upon the taxpayer, some fresh way of evading constitutional government, of assaulting legitimate business under the name of reform—if it has not been produced here and been stalked out in this Chamber in the name of something the farmer needed, I have not yet the memory to recall it, and my memory is fairly good.

Everything for the farmer! If this Government and the Capitol would leave the farmer alone, he would get along pretty well.

Mr. GRONNA. Mr. President, but in the face of all that discrimination in favor of the farmer, the Senator knows that a large percentage are leaving the farms. It is not so in the packing business.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator does not see anything but the successful packer. I can call the roll of the packing companies, and it is like the roll of those who succeed in mines out in the Rockies. We hear of the Strattons about Colorado Springs, and we hear of successful men up and down the range all the way from the Mexican border to Canada, but you do not hear of the bankrupt ones. I do, and anybody who has been about the courts for 40 years knows something about it. You never hear of the man who never strikes a good vein, but you hear of the successful ones, and where there is a successful packer the whole beach of modern business for the last 30 years is strewn with stranded packing concerns, reaching all the way from San Francisco, over the range, through Omaha and Lincoln, back to Council Bluffs and Sioux City. I can call the roll, and I can get more of them.

The packers are like other people—they do business upon correct principles or they fail. Men are not leaving farms because of packers. It is the faulty standards of life adopted by a generation who prefer pleasure to profit.

As to these matters which are for the benefit of the farmer, 99 out of 100 of them are a detriment. The farmer's name is used in vain, blasphemously and sacrilegiously, by somebody who has an ax to grind for his own selfish purposes.

I have never been deceived about these self-styled farmers' associations, with offices in Chicago and in the National Capital, threatening you daily with the combined destructive force of all the farmers in the country if you do not answer their demands and legislate more money out of the Treasury to keep them alive. I have heard that for a long time, and I never have been frightened by any of these self-created farmers' associations yet. I know what the real farmer is and what the real association is. I never have taken any orders from these gentlemen with soft hands and still softer heads, sitting around the city telling my farmer constituents what to do; and yet they are all found joining in the hue and cry for this bill.

It was a mere misadventure, of course, that when courts were to be invoked—and it is the only time the Federal Trade Commission ever conceded that there was a court in this country that had any jurisdiction over anything they got after—they dodged the trial courts. There is no jury, there are none of the general powers of the equity side of the court, none of the ordinary jurisdiction, either of common law or chancery, found in the court where they go. They have gone to a court of appeals. Of course, there was a sort of a weak, half-hearted admission yesterday that there would be no objection to that being amended by the individual Senators making the statement, but it is very evident that the court of appeals was sought out because it is not a trial court. I know the Senator from North Dakota has not measured the drift of this bill, and the matter I now call his attention to I shall go into at some length later when it is properly before the Senate, and when I am not here merely talking by the good nature of the Senate.

Here is a provision as to what the commission shall do after it has heard the evidence—as it pleases. It is a law unto itself; it makes no rule it does not want to make; it follows no rule governing the admission or exclusion of testimony. Colver never heard of Greenleaf or Wigmore in his life. He would not know what either of them was. He would not know whether he was a fisherman or a poultryman. But with an entire happy disregard of the laws of evidence they hear a complaint, either on behalf of some individual or on their own motion. They have original jurisdiction to try suits before themselves. They are like the old justice of the peace in the New England township in the early history of my State. He was always a collecting agent, and he started suits himself before his own court, and of course judgment was always rendered for the plaintiff. The mere fact that a defendant was sued was enough to put him at fault, and a finding was had accordingly. Here they can initiate suits themselves before their own body and hear them, and that is all the evidence in the case. All you can do, if you offer evidence and it is not admitted, is to make a tender of what you expect to prove and then go to the circuit court of appeals for the district in which the hearing is had and endeavor to have the scope of the evidence enlarged. That is the only way; and then there comes in a very singular provision, which was written in not by a layman—because a layman would never struggle into such an unhappy state of affairs—but by some lawyer who has spent his time trying to get away from the Constitution. I know lawyers whose entire profession is trying to avoid the Constitution. It is not merely those who are advisers of corporations, either. It is those who are baiting corporations, who are just as bad. I know others who on the platform spend the most of their time denouncing the Constitution.

If there is anything that has ever shown the wisdom of the men who made it in Philadelphia, it is the strain it has been under in the last five or six years, especially since the war broke out and those vast powers were given to the Executive. The fact that it has survived and that there is in the hearts of men yet a respect and a reverence for constitutional government is the best recommendation of the work of the fathers in Philadelphia. It was not made there. It is a thousand years old.

Still these gentlemen on the Trade Commission and their attorneys are trying to avoid some of the most salutary provisions found in American constitutional government.

What does this mean? The court of appeals "may affirm or set aside the order of the commission or may direct the commission to modify its order. No such order of the commission shall be modified or set aside by the circuit court of appeals unless it is shown by the packer or operator that the order is unsupported by evidence;" not unsupported by the evidence in the case, but unsupported by ex parte evidence, just taking it on one side. If you consider the evidence and, as in the case of a grand jury in returning an indictment, if you can find anything to support it, the vote will be to sustain the findings of the live-stock commission. That is why it was drawn in that way. Senators probably do not perceive the drift of it; but the attorneys whose eyes scanned the sections I am referring to knew precisely what they were undertaking to do. They proposed to avoid not only the trial courts but to have an ex parte hearing in the court of appeals, with the order to be sustained unless it is unsupported by evidence. If it is supported by evidence on one side of the contention, it is to be sustained, and that is the purpose of that section.

Mr. President, I do not wish to let go unchallenged some of the matters which were put into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD this morning. I am very loath to mention it without going into it at some length, but I do not wish to impose upon the Senate for that purpose. These statements made by the Federal Trade Commission of colossal dividends, of great stock dividends distributed as paid-up stock to stockholders, have been sent out as evidence of the packers being the cause of the high price of meat to the consumer; that when it reaches your table and mine they are responsible for round steak at 46 cents, for porterhouse at 69 cents, for pork at the various prices at which it has sold.

Mr. President, let me take one specific statement in the Federal Trade Commission's report that Armour & Co. declared a stock dividend of 400 per cent, about 1900 I think it was. I am trusting now entirely to my memory. I will correct it if necessary when I go into it at some further hearing and produce the Federal Trade Commission's report on the subject. As a matter of fact, there was not a dollar to speak of in the treasury when the stock dividend was declared. The Armour Co. up to that time had been entirely a family corporation. Philip Armour meanwhile had died, after some years of successful effort in the business and seeing it grow from the $160,000 with which he started. The branch house in Chicago, a branch house of Plankinton & Armour in Milwaukee, grew to be the principal concern. They did not distribute the profits of the business. It was a partnership of individuals. The dominant spirit in the Chicago packing house, now known as Armour & Co., in the earlier days was Philip Armour.

There were small dividends declared after 1900. It was incorporated in 1900. In the 14 years preceding the war down to 1914, of all the earnings of the business of Armour & Co. nearly 87 per cent were retained of the net earnings and the balance was distributed in dividends. I do not mean 87 per cent on the capital stock. I am speaking now of dividends; I am speaking of total dividends, that for that period of time, from 1900 down to 1914, 87 per cent of all dividends earned were kept in the treasury in the form of buildings, brick and mortar, of machinery, physical equipment, or inventoried perishable merchandise in some form, either canned, pickled, smoked, or preserved meats, or fresh meats in transit to the market. Ordinarily fresh meats can not be kept over seven days, even with modern methods of chilling.

The result was they had accumulated a surplus, and they kept it and reinvested it in the business instead of issuing bonds or borrowing at the bank. From 1868 up to 1900, during the period of all those years, they had pursued the same policy before incorporation. They paid out only a small part in dividends. Up to 1900 it was purely an affair of the Armour family.

Between 1914 and 1917—that is, from the year when the war began up to the time we entered the war in 1917—they kept 88 per cent of their earnings either in buildings, in merchandise, inventory value, or in some kind of property necessary to the packing business, and the other, less than 12 per cent, 11 and a fraction per cent, they distributed in dividends through the three years. From 1917 up to 1919 they kept 91 per cent in their treasury.

When they incorporated in 1900 is the time about which our friends, the Federal Trade Commission, made complaint that there was a stock dividend of 400 per cent. As a matter of fact, I wish the public to know that this stock dividend represented the savings of 50 years in the Armour family. In 1900 it was incorporated. Of course, my dear friends, the Federal Trade Commission, and some of these professional agitators who have a steer some place and a cow some place else, and call themselves cattlemen, could not refrain from taking the last cent of dividend and the last dollar out of any corporate treasury that they had anything to do with or had any stock in. They would be clamoring for dividends. They can not understand how anyone would ever have any thrift, and when they find anybody that wishes to keep the affair solvent they want to penalize it. That is what they are trying to do in this bill, and in their misleading and mischievous reports that have gone out to the public about great stock dividends.

In private conversation I have had some complaint made about Libby, McNeill & Libby, one of the small packers of Chicago, who put up a great deal in the way of food lines and send them out—apple butter, jams, jellies, preserves, dried and evaporated fruits, and so forth—as well as meat products. It is an old concern that has not heretofore been very much in the public eye. A majority of the stock was for a time owned by the Swifts. It was a subsidiary or affiliated company with Swift & Co. It has been segregated. Recently it declared a stock dividend about which considerable vicious criticism occurred in certain magazines and newspapers. The stock dividend of $12,800,000 does not exist. Six million four hundred thousand dollars of it is actual cash stock given to the old stockholders with the option of paying for it in cash one hundred cents on the dollar. They are given $6,400,000, or a little less, in paid-up stock, and that a little cash in the treasury, because there is no cash in the treasury except a mere working balance. The actual property represented by the paid-up stock of the smaller men, by the $6,400,000, is the inventoried value of merchandise on hand, together with additions to the plant of buildings, machinery, equipment, and the like, required in the conduct of their business, with stock offered employees. Therefore these inventory values are a large accumulation of past years and these inventory values depend upon the rise and fall of the market.

They accumulated large stocks during war times and have not yet disposed of them. They are putting them on the market and the market is absorbing them as rapidly as possible, but their warehouses are filled yet with large stocks. They must go on and fill in, for the market as it presents itself, such live stock, and such fruits, before the decree was entered inhibiting them from selling other than meat foods; they must go on and fill in, so they helped to buy, on the Chicago market or elsewhere, their share of live stock as they can get it under their bids.

The inventoried value of this property depends upon the rise and fall of the market whether there is a stock dividend sufficiently backed by values to pay it up.

If Senators have followed the course of live-stock markets and the sale of meats at the jobbers' prices, they will readily appreciate the fact that this inventory value of a company is the most precarious thing in the world. If falling prices come, these values will drop, and instead of having paid-up stock with value behind it, you will have paid up only in part, except for such losses as occur, only the value of your property equal to that shrunken valuation that comes from the market.

These things the public do not know. These things Senators seem not to know. Much less does the Agricultural Committee seem to have given due weight to them in the vast clamor, that came before the meetings of that committee, of those gentlemen who were interested in promoting this legislation from a purely private point of view.

These war stocks depend upon the market. The Federal Trade Commission, among other things, in this matter of bookkeeping which they propose to compel them to do, compels every packer to keep books in a certain way, and upon their methods of taking their inventory values at actual cost and not upon market value. There is not a large corporation in the United States whose operations run up into anything like one-tenth of the volume of the five packers who conduct their bookkeeping on that basis. The entire method of bookkeeping of the successful business world in the United States is diametrically opposite to that proposed by the Federal Trade Commission.

If the cost price is taken, one can see in a moment why the Federal Trade Commission wishes it. The meat animal on the hoof is turned into meat by the packer. It has to be taken at cost. The actual cost of the animal, taking the per cent of the weight which can be turned into edible products, making due allowance for inedible products and by-products, charging them against the finished products of the animal all around, is to be the cost, including everything from hide and horns to the glue and bones and to the small hair cut out of the ear of the steer and used in making paint brushes for artists and for other fine work where line tracing is required.

They insist that that be taken at cost and that all that shall constitute the inventory value. When they have it in their warehouses, on their shelves, in transit, or at their branch houses in the United States there is one way to consider taking an inventory value, say, on the 1st day of January, 1920, and that is at the quotable market prices found in the principal markets of the United States at that time. There is no other way for a successful concern to inventory its merchandise. That is one of the methods sought to be corrected by this bill, and it is the ground of great complaint.

I know why the Federal Trade Commission wish that basis changed. If they take actual cost, then if the earnings happen to be high it will show on that low cost a much larger per cent of earnings to gross, correspondingly, and a much larger complaint by the Federal Trade Commission. If it be taken at actual market values in selling the product on the market, they go up and down; they are high at some periods; and if on the 1st day of January the market price of these products is a given figure, then in estimating the profits, either by volume of business or on the net worth of the capital and surplus, it shows a correspondingly smaller per cent of dividends if it be taken at market price, and that is the milk in the coconut of my dear friends of the Federal Trade Commission. They do not want to take the ordinary way in which all the business concerns of the country are conducting their business and estimate their dividends on whether they are making or losing money.

I wish the public to know this alongside of the misleading reports that have gone out from the Federal Trade Commission. To-day the packers are loaded up with accumulated war stocks; the market is falling. If they had not had the foresight to prepare for the bad years and for the readjustments that would come, the whole live-stock market of the United States would be paralyzed in 30 days. It is only the long habit of foresight and self-restraint and leaving earnings in the treasury and not distributing any dividends, never to be recalled, that has made it possible for the four or five large packers of the country now to approach the period of readjustment with absolutely no fear of disturbing the live-stock market.

There are but four packers in Chicago who buy on that market. Cudahy does not buy in the Chicago market. For many years, for more than 20 years, Michael Cudahy was an employee of the elder Armour, and finally bought a small packing plant in Omaha and developed it and has now become one of the leading packers.

But these gentlemen prepared themselves for this slump in value. Inevitably it is so.

"Well," some one says, "it costs me just as much in my kitchen for meat products as it did before there was a selling price." I have heard that a number of times. Last August the Senate Committee on the District of Columbia conducted an investigation. I know the price at which refrigerated meats in their cars were delivered last week and this morning in the District of Columbia to the local meat-market men. Let me say for the benefit of that distinguished gentry that they are making from 60 to 140 per cent on every pound of meat that they get out of a refrigerator car from the big packers, and no one says a word.

A Senator told me a few days ago that some Member of Congress—I do not know of which body—went into a shoe shop here to buy a pair of shoes. They asked him $20 for the pair he wanted. That is here in Washington. It is a shop directly east of Woodward & Lothrop's department store. I will identify it that much so that it can be located without a search warrant. He did not buy them, but he wrote to the manufacturer of the shoes and wanted to know what they were jobbed for to this dealer. They were jobbed to this distinguished retail merchant, this great light of the commercial world in Washington, at $8.

The packers made 1.6 per cent on their entire volume of business, which my friend from North Dakota says he will accept as the basis of calculation. I know he is a very sensible and a very fair man and will conduct the discussion in that way. In a year when by the Food Administration, under the war powers of the President, the profits were limited to 9 per cent in the edible products of the animal, they made 5 and a little less than six-tenths per cent on their net worth, including capital and surplus. They handle green hides, which eventually go into shoes, and they are handling them on a very narrow margin. I will at some time go into the leather business and show how the packers became interested in tanyards; but the leather that made the pair of shoes to which I have referred returned to the packer an exceedingly small per cent of profit on the investment. The retail dealer in Washington, however, wants 250 per cent on the retail price to the man who wears the shoes.

There is nobody apparently who wants the retail dealer put under the Federal Trade Commission or under a boot and shoe commission; nobody wants to hang him to a lamp-post because of the price at which he is retailing footgear. The truth is that some of the most annoying, the most heartless, profiteering in this country is by the retail dealers.

Everybody knows why prices are cut now and why a general reduction has swept from Washington clear to the Pacific coast. It shows me I was right some years ago when I voted against the Federal reserve bank act. The Federal reserve banks have ordered all the member banks to curtail credits. In plain English, that means to the borrower from the bank, "come in and pay up; we can not carry you any longer; we will forfeit your collateral or we will sue you or do something else"; and the profiteering merchant, who has been loaded up with merchandise and has had his shelves groaning with these 250 per cent profit goods, is shoving them out on the market and trying now to attract the wary consumer to purchase, but the wary consumer is going back to his old shoes which he has had cobbled over; he is not buying any tailor-made or ready-made suits, but is hauling out of the closet his old ones, taking a club and beating the moths out of them, having them cleaned, and putting them on. It added to my tie of friendship for the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] when he said a day or two ago that he was wearing patched clothes. I expect to do the same thing, for the next suit I get out, I think, will need it. The power to control credits now lies in the hands of the Federal reserve bank.

All of these causes combined have stopped purchasing. Then, on top of that, the banks are curtailing credits. The merchant has to sell to get money to pay up his loans, and, of course, is now offering his wares at a 25 per cent reduction and in some places at a reduction of 40 per cent. It is a deathbed repentance, but it is better than none, and I presume that some souls have gone to immortal glory on that kind of a bill of health. Let them go. I should, however, like to see some of these distinguished gentlemen like Mr. Burke, Mr. Lassitter, Mr. Kent, and others who are groaning over the fate of the ultimate consumer and his woes—I should like to see them get after some of the real offenders; not the men who are making 5.6 per cent on the net worth of the capital invested in the business and 1.6 per cent on their volume of business, but those who are taking all the way from 40 to 140 or 250 per cent in the footgear business and see what they do with them.

Once in a while an isolated cry goes up here to the effect that the situation I have described ought to be attended to, and we all with one accord say, "Yes; yes"; and we breathe privately our maledictions upon the profiteer in the retail business, and then we go directly off and forget all about it. But the agitation against the packers, like the poor, we always have with us, and I suppose from now until corn-shucking time out West every day that the Senate is in session some distinguished statesman who hungers for a headline in the press will rise and make a speech about the packers. That is to be expected. I do not know whether it hurts the packers or not, because, probably, they have got to survive at last under the constitutional rights of person and property; but it creates some trouble, and when they get through, and all of this elaborate machinery is imposed upon the business, in all human probability the cost of meat will go up like everything else.

We have now under Government control, administered by means of rather elaborate machinery, street cars in the city of Washington; and the fare has been increased from six tickets for a quarter very recently up to four tickets for 30 cents now. About the same proportion will hold good as to meat products when the proposed live-stock commission is authorized to regulate the packers' business.

I shall conclude in a moment, and do not intend at this time to make any extended comment upon this matter; but later I expect to take it up and to trace the history of the development of the packing industry and their methods of doing business, and expose some of what I believe to be manifest errors of the Trade Commission in what they have reported at divers times about the packing business.

About a year ago next July I made some remarks about the chairman of the board, Mr. Colver. He vociferously traveled about over the United States a good deal, inviting various people to debate with him. He invited the packers to debate; but they are business men, and not verbal disturbers, and, as if I were in that class, he invited me to debate with him. Well, when I have nothing to do but go out and debate with Brother Colver, I trust that I shall be taken to an asylum for the feeble-minded. He receives attention only when he is found spreading official inaccuracies. I shall pay my respects to him later. He has been thirsting for information which I have, and I will give it to him in due season—when the packing bill comes up here and requires discussion.

But before I conclude I wish to say a few words further. The Senator from North Dakota said that there were very extended hearings before the committee. There were packers large and small. I think there are about 200 of them collected now in the American Institute of Meat Packers. Of course, that is a very iniquitous organization, but they are there and seem to be getting along very happily, the big ones and the little ones. A great many of them appeared before the committee and gave evidence; and I challenge the committee or the trade commission to produce to exceed two small packers—and I do not know whether there were any—who appeared before the committee and complained of the competition and the method of doing business they met at the hands of the big packers. They stated uniformly that they were making money, that they were getting along, and that they had no complaint to make, about the packers. In the very report of the Federal Trade Commission, I wish to remind the Senator from North Dakota, so that it may go along with what he has put in the RECORD, of the fact that the 60 small packers are admitted to be making as large dividends, or larger, than the five big packers. Now, what complaint is there about it? The only complaint is because they have grown large as the result of successful business management.

I have given expression, Mr. President, to these few cursory remarks only following what was offered by the Senator from North Dakota, and as a partial explanation of what he incorporated in the RECORD. I had not expected to take the question up to-day, but if this bill is to come up each morning until we merge into the December session I will have time, I trust, to go somewhat into the bill and analyze it, together with the gentlemen who originally proposed it—not in the committee, but elsewhere—who, I think, are well worthy of some analysis and attention. When that time shall arrive, I intend to take up the packing business and this bill at some length. This morning I forbear. I thank the Senate for their kindness in granting me the time I have consumed.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from New York that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Army appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13587) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I understand it is the intention of another Senator to suggest the absence of a quorum in a moment, but before that is done I desire to make a request for unanimous consent for the printing in the RECORD of a letter which I have addressed to Mr. Samuel Gompers in reply to a letter which I received from him two days ago, and which was placed in the RECORD yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator read the letter? It is not very long, and I should like to have him read it or to have the Secretary read it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well; I will ask that the Secretary read the letter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. MCKELLAR. The Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of absent Senators.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. TOWNSEND answered to his name when called.

Mr. KNOX, Mr. POMERENE, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. FALL, Mr. WATSON, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. HARRIS, Mr. HARDING, Mr. GRONNA, Mr. KING, Mr. LODGE, Mr. THOMAS, Mr. WILLIAMS, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. CULBERSON, and Mr. ROBINSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Sixty-four Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The Secretary will continue the reading of the letter presented by the Senator from New York.

The Assistant Secretary resumed and concluded the reading of the letter, which is as follows:

MAY 22, 1920.

SAMUEL GOMPERS, Esq.,
President American Federation of Labor,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am in receipt of your letter of May 19 regarding that feature of pending Army reorganization legislation which provides for the immediate application of the selective draft in the event of a national emergency, declared by the Congress and proclaimed by the President. I have read your criticisms of these provisions with great care and am convinced that they are based upon a misconception of the meaning and purpose of the language employed.

The first criticism has to do with the phrase "national emergency," and you contend that the use of that phrase would permit the drafting of citizens into the service of the Federal Government in peace as well as in war, and that it would result in the "conscription of workers in industry" and in subjecting them to "involuntary servitude." Needless to say, nothing of the sort is intended. The term "emergency" was employed by the Senate committee as descriptive of a state of war of the first magnitude, constituting a national emergency. The same term was used in several of the war-time enactments as descriptive of the war in which we were then engaged. The Senate committee had no other thought in mind than that the term "national emergency" would be taken to mean a state of war involving grave danger. And it should not be forgotten that whatever the crisis confronting the country it must first be declared a national emergency by the Congress, composed of Representatives of the people, and proclaimed by the President.

At the time of the passage of the bill in the Senate it did not occur to anyone that the expression "national emergency" would be subject to doubt as to its meaning. Three or four weeks ago some doubt was expressed upon this point, and, as a result, the managers on the part of the Senate, who are now sitting in conference with the managers of the House, suggested that the expression "national emergency" be replaced by the words "state of war constituting a national emergency." It is the intention of the Senate managers to continue to urge such an amendment, in order that there may be no doubt of the intention of the Congress; and, likewise, an amendment providing that the Congress may place a limitation upon the numbers to be drafted.

Your next criticism has to do with the provision of the legislation which, in section 70, places in a deferred class those "who are needed in occupations of importance in the maintenance of the national interest during the emergency, so long as they regularly and in good faith continue in such occupations." You construe this provision to mean that the persons referred to may be drafted into industry under penalties of military law. The wording of the whole section shows very clearly that instead of drafting these persons into industry under military law, they are to be placed in a deferred class and to that extent made exempt from being drafted into the military service. This provision is in effect merely a repetition of the corresponding provision of the selective-draft law and its accompanying regulations as they stood during the war with Germany. There is no new principle involved.

In your next criticism of the bill you seek to connect the provision which I have explained above with the provisions of article 28 of chapter 2 of the bill, which revises the Articles of War. You quote the following language of that chapter:

> Any person subject to military law who quits his organization or place of duty with the intent to avoid hazardous duty or shirk important service shall be deemed a deserter.

And you contend that this provision could be used to punish as a deserter, under military law, a worker who saw fit to leave the occupation in which he was engaged and for engaging in which he had received deferred classification. It is apparent that you have not read article 2 of chapter 2 of this bill. In that article you will find a definition of the term "persons subject to military law." This definition is exceedingly clear in that it includes only officers and soldiers of the Regular Army, volunteers, persons called, drafted, or ordered into the military service, cadets, officers, and soldiers of the Marine Corps under certain conditions, and camp retainers and other persons accompanying or serving with the armies of the United States. In other words, only members of the military service and persons accompanying the Army can fall under the penalties prescribed in article 28 of chapter 2, to which you refer. It is utterly impossible for this penalty to apply to the workers in industry as you suggest.

I think I ought to tell you the purpose which the Senate committee had in mind when it framed and reported this legislation to the Senate. We thought it was very generally conceded that the selective-draft law had operated with marked success during the war; that, as its provisions were put into effect, they were received with an ever-increasing degree of approval by the people; that under its provisions the burden of the great effort was distributed fairly and scientifically; that without such an equal and democratic distribution of the burden it would have been impossible for the United States to have achieved such a glorious result in such a short space of time. The committee felt that were the Nation ever compelled to meet a similar crisis in the future, the public would demand and the Congress would enact a selective-draft law as the first weapon of defense. It is true that the Congress might enact such a law after the declaration of war, as was done six weeks after the declaration of a state of war with Germany, but the delay involved might very well be exceedingly dangerous. Furthermore, the placing of such a law upon the statute books in time of peace, ready for operation when Congress gives its consent, makes it possible for the Government to prepare plans in advance to meet any crisis—plans involving not only the mobilization of our armies but also the coordination of all those activities which experience shows are so necessary in the successful conduct of a great war. With such plans ready at hand, the Government could act with great speed the instant the Congress authorized the setting in motion of the machinery.

Then, too, the Committee believed that the enactment of such a provision would serve as a strong deterrent to any nation or group of nations contemplating an attack upon the United States. If the world understands that it is the declared policy of the United States to employ its full strength in men and resources the instant it is attacked, the prospect of such an attack is exceedingly remote.

I have written you at considerable length because this is a subject which should be considered by every citizen upon its merits, without misconception or misunderstanding of the motives behind it.

Very sincerely, yours, J. W. WADSWORTH, Jr.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with and that we proceed to the reading of the bill for action on the committee amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the bill will be read for action on the committee amendments.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I have been away. Is this the bill to which the letter just read refers?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thought we had already acted on that bill and that it was in conference.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is true, Mr. President. I will say to the Senator from Georgia that the letter which has just been read is a reply to a letter written by Mr. Samuel Gompers to me, which letter was placed in the RECORD yesterday by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA].

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And it has really no reference to the matter we have before the Senate?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Nothing at all.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. That bill is still in conference?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. And there is no conference report before us?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not as yet.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I thank you.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, under the head of "Secretary of War," subhead "Contingencies of the Army," on page 2, line 16, after the word "posts," to strike out "$150,000" and insert "$400,000"; in line 17, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$350,000"; and, in line 21, after the word "claims," to insert "Provided further, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell to any State or foreign Government with which the United States is at peace, upon such terms as he may deem expedient, any matériel, supplies, or equipment pertaining to the Military Establishment as or may hereafter be found to be surplus, which is not needed for military purposes and for which there is no adequate domestic market," so as to make the clause read:

For all contingent expenses of the Army not otherwise provided for and embracing all branches of the military service, including the office of the Chief of Staff; for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses, including the employment of translators and exclusive of all other personal services in the War Department or any of its subordinate bureaus or offices at Washington, D. C., or in the Army at large, but impossible to be anticipated or classified; to be expended on the approval and authority of the Secretary of War, and for such purposes as he may deem proper, including the payment of a per diem allowance not to exceed $4, in lieu of subsistence, to employees of the War Department traveling on official business outside of the District of Columbia and away from their designated posts, $400,000: Provided, That not to exceed $350,000 of the money herein appropriated shall be expended for the payment of salaries of civilian employees connected with the sale of war supplies and the adjustment of war contracts and claims: Provided further, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, to sell to any State or foreign Government with which the United States is at peace, upon such terms as he may deem expedient, any matériel, supplies, or equipment pertaining to the Military Establishment as or may hereafter be found to be surplus, which is not needed for military purposes and for which there is no adequate domestic market: Provided further, That none of the funds appropriated or made available under this act shall be used for the payment of any salary in excess of $12,000 per annum to any civilian employee in the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, line 8, to strike out the headline "Office of the Chief of Staff."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head "Contingencies, Military Intelligence Division," subhead "Office of Chief of Staff," on page 4, line 12, after the word "War," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$400,000," so as to make the clause read:

For contingent expenses of the Military Intelligence Division, General Staff Corps, including the purchase of law books, professional books of reference; subscription to newspapers and periodicals; drafting and messenger service; and of the military attachés at the United States embassies and legations abroad; the cost of special instruction at home and abroad, and in maintenance of students and attachés; and for such other purposes as the Secretary of War may deem proper; to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, $400,000: Provided, That section 3648, Revised Statutes, shall not apply to subscription for foreign and professional newspapers and periodicals to be paid for from this appropriation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under subhead "Expenses, military observers abroad," on page 4, line 19, after the word "States," to strike out "at war," so as to make the clause read:

For the actual and necessary expenses of officers of the Army on duty abroad for the purpose of observing operations of armies of foreign States, to be paid upon certificates of the Secretary of War that the expenditures were necessary for obtaining military information, $25,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under subhead "United States service schools," on page 5, line 20, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$100,000," so as to make the clause read:

To provide means for the theoretical and practical instruction at the Army service schools (including the General Staff School, the School of the Line, and the Signal Corps School at Fort Leavenworth, Kans., the Army Field Service School and Correspondence School for Medical Officers, at Washington, D. C., the Cavalry School at Fort Riley, Kans., the Field Artillery Schools at Fort Sill, Okla., and at Camp Zachary Taylor or Camp Knox, Ky., and for the Infantry School at Camp Benning, Ga.) by the purchase of textbooks, books of reference, scientific and professional papers, the purchase of modern instruments and material for the theoretical and practical instruction, employment of temporary, technical, or special services, and for all absolutely necessary expenses, to be allotted in such proportion as may, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, be for the best interests of the military service. Not exceeding $400 per month may be used for the payment of $100 per month each to a translator at the Army Service Schools, Fort Leavenworth, Kans., Field Artillery School, Fort Sill, Okla., the Infantry School, Camp Benning, Ga., and the Cavalry School, Fort Riley, Kans., to be appointed by the commandants of the schools named, with the approval of the Secretary of War, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "The Adjutant General's Department," subhead "Completion and preservation of the selective-service records and the preparation of statements of service for adjutants general of States," on page 7, line 14, after the word "records," to insert "and for the employment of clerical help required to furnish to the adjutants general of the several States statements of service of all persons from those States who entered the military service during the war with Germany, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1921, for all expenses, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, necessary for the completion and preservation of the selective-service records and the completion of the work of furnishing statements of service to adjutants general of States: Provided, That this appropriation shall be disbursed by such officer as may be designated by the Secretary of War for the purpose," so as to make the clause read:

The unexpended balance of the $3,500,000, reappropriated in the Army appropriation act for the fiscal year 1920, approved July 11, 1919, for the completion, preservation, and transportation of the records pertaining to the draft under the act entitled "An act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," approved May 18, 1917, including the employment of the necessary clerical and other help for duty in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army in connection with the arrangement, operation, and maintenance of the files of those records, and for the employment of clerical help required to furnish to the adjutants general of the several States statements of service of all persons from those States who entered the military service during the war with Germany, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1921, for all expenses, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, necessary for the completion and preservation of the selective-service records and the completion of the work of furnishing statements of service to adjutants general of States: Provided, That this appropriation shall be disbursed by such officer as may be designated by the Secretary of War for the purpose.

Mr. SMOOT. I would like to ask the Senator having the bill in charge if he knows the amount of money that is available for the fiscal year 1921?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Out of what fund?

Mr. SMOOT. This amendment provides that "for the employment of clerical help required to furnish to the adjutants general of the several States statements of service of all persons in those States who entered the military service during the war with Germany, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1921, for all expenses, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army."

Mr. President, this same question arose in the Committee on Appropriations and there was a certain amount of money appropriated in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill for The Adjutant General's office. The statement was made, as I remember it, that a part of the additional amount was for this very purpose and other purposes, but particularly this purpose was mentioned. The Committee on Appropriations of the Senate increased the appropriation for the War Department about $500,000, and the Secretary of War allotted to The Adjutant General's Department even more than the House gave it, and, as I understand it, gave them that increase to accomplish this very work. I would like to know something about the reason why now this same subject is brought into this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, $3,500,000, as the Senator knows, was appropriated for this current fiscal year, and it was the intention of The Adjutant General to finish the work within the year. There seemed, however, to have been some failure to secure an appropriation sufficient to hire a sufficient number of clerks to do the listing and collating of these records.

According to the testimony of The Adjutant General, there has been expended or obligated up to March 15 of this year $1,750,071.83, leaving a balance as of that date of $1,749,928.17.

Then he goes on to say:

I anticipate we will expend, between now and June 30, $950,000, so that the probable unexpended balance on June 30 will be $799,928.17.

In other words, in round figures, $800,000 will be left unexpended, which will be reappropriated by the language of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not know the exact amount, but I knew it was the purpose of the amendment to give whatever amount was unexpended on June 30 of this year to The Adjutant General's office to be expended the coming fiscal year. If I am not mistaken, Mr. President, this very question was taken care of in the legislative appropriation bill; and if so, this is simply a duplication of an appropriation amounting to $800,000 which should not be granted.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I feel quite certain that the Senator is mistaken. This Senate committee amendment, as printed on page 7, is the exact language which was reported from the House Committee on Military Affairs and stricken out upon the floor of the House on a point of order.

Mr. SMOOT. That may be.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not on the ground that it was not estimated for. It was not criticized, as I recollect it, because it was taken care of in another appropriation, but because the person making the point of order had the idea that it was new legislation; and it was stricken out in such a way that if the Senator will read the complete section he will find that it leaves the section meaning nothing at all. When we were informed of this error, an obvious error, the Senate committee restored the language.

I have in my hand a copy of the hearings on the Army appropriation bill. On page 242 there is printed a letter from the Secretary of War, addressed to me as chairman of the committee, in which letter there is contained a portion of a letter which the Secretary of War addressed to Mr. GOOD, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations of the House. It is written under date of January 26, 1920, and a portion of it reads as follows:

Gen. Harris, The Adjutant General, has advised me that, at his hearing before your committee on the 2d instant, you expressed the opinion that it would be inadvisable to increase his clerical force by bringing into this city additional clerks to complete before June 30 the statements of service for the various State adjutants general of the men from their respective States who served in the World War, and suggested that it would be more economical and better in every way for Congress to make the unexpended balance of the appropriation for that purpose available during the next fiscal year. I heartily agree with you in this, and have directed Gen. Harris to confine his efforts in the future to increasing his force by the employment of only such clerks as may be released from other bureaus or departments in this city.

Had it not been for my compliance with the suggestion of Mr. GOOD, a sufficient clerical force would have been employed by The Adjutant General to finish this work before June 30.

The Adjutant General appeared before the Senate committee and told us that if this amendment was not made the whole work would have to stop because there was no other appropriation anywhere to take care of these people, and apparently Mr. GOOD must have had that understanding as a result of the letter written to him by the Secretary of War.

Mr. SMOOT. What was the date of that letter?

Mr. WADSWORTH. January 6, 1920.

Mr. SMOOT. The legislative appropriation bill was passed after that date.

I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the legislative appropriation bill there was an appropriation made for temporary employees, and the House provided $2,500,000. The Adjutant General, as well as the Secretary of War, appeared before the Appropriations Committee of the Senate and asked that that amount be increased to $4,000,000, and of the $4,000,000 they asked that The Adjutant General's office be given $2,000,000. Out of the appropriation of $2,500,000 the House gave The Adjutant General's office $1,850,000 and the Senate increased the amount to $2,000,000.

Mr. President, as I remember the testimony—I have not a copy of it here—the very reason assigned at that time for the increased appropriation is covered in this amendment, together with other items which I do not recall. When the bill went to conference the conferees compromised and appropriated $3,000,000, and out of that $3,000,000 The Adjutant General's office was given $1,850,000.

Of course, I do not like to say that this is going to be spent without any returns whatever, but I think that wherever there is an appropriation made which falls within one appropriation bill it ought to be made within that particular appropriation bill and not be divided between two appropriation bills. The temporary employees of the War Department fall in the legislative appropriation bill, and the members of the Appropriation Committee thought they had taken care of the situation. The conferees compromised on $500,000 more than the House was willing to give, and it was for the purpose of taking care of temporary employees, among other things, to do the work which is provided for in this amendment. I know the Senator from New York would not want to make two appropriations, and I ask the Senator from New York if this amendment was put in as a result of the letter of January 6?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; it was put in this bill by the Senate committee on the direct testimony of The Adjutant General, who said that if he did not have it the work of completing these draft records would stop. He appeared in person, pointed out what had happened on the floor of the House, and how the House committee had put in this same language. They apparently had been persuaded that there was no duplication and that it was absolutely necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. The legislative appropriation bill was not put upon the calendar of the Senate until May 14 of this year, and I am fearful that this is a duplication of an appropriation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, I will not contradict the Senator, though I am convinced he is mistaken. To me it is inconceivable that The Adjutant General of the Army would come before the Committee on Military Affairs, knowing this matter was being taken up by the Committee on Appropriations, and ask the Committee on Military Affairs to give him more money. I can not believe that he would do it.

Mr. SMOOT. It has been done right along. If they can not get it on one appropriation bill, they will try to get it on another.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I wonder if the Senator quite understands the meaning of his statement.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; I do understand it. I do not say that The Adjutant General has done it in this case, but if the Senator wishes I can call attention to similar cases time and time again.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have merely this to say about it: I do not believe Gen. Harris would do a thing like that in order to deceive the Military Affairs Committee. I can not believe it.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not now say that Gen. Harris has done so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He was the only witness.

Mr. SMOOT. But I do say that Gen. Harris appeared before the Committee on Appropriations and asked for an appropriation for the employment of temporary employees, and I do say that the Senate Committee on Appropriations, on his testimony and that of the Secretary of War, increased the appropriation $1,500,000; and it is true that in conference we had to agree to $3,000,000 instead of $4,000,000, as the Senator knows.

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that the amendment go over until the secretary of the committee can telephone and find out about it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have already sent a message to The Adjutant General to find out if such a thing is possible. If it is, I shall be exceedingly disappointed.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator knows this, does he not, that these employees are provided for in the legislative appropriation bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No. There were a great many employees who were not provided for in the legislative appropriation bill, which I shall point out later on.

Mr. SMOOT. Temporary employees?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Temporary employees, large numbers of them.

Mr. SMOOT. Then they are added to this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; they are not added to this bill. The Senator is mistaken. The Committee on Appropriations, when it drafted that provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill, forgot completely that there was an Air Service in the Army and that it was not authorized by statute, and it failed utterly to take care of the employees in the office of the Director of the Air Service. If it goes into law without amendment, every employee in the city of Washington working in the Air Service or in the construction division must be discharged.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say that there was no one representing the Air Service or the War Department who ever called attention of the Appropriations Committee to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. They had no notice whatsoever that any such provision was contemplated.

Mr. SMOOT. Does the Senator think that the War Department does not know what is in the legislative appropriation bill when it passes the House? It was before the committee, and we had before the committee men representing every division of the War Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Whether they had notice or not, I have described accurately the effect. They will all have to be discharged, every civilian employee in the Air Service, every one in the construction division, every one in any bureau or branch of the War Department who has not heretofore been authorized to exist by statute. Furthermore, no salary can be paid to any of them over $1,800. Every draftsman will have to be discharged, and every designer of aircraft. They are temporary civilian employees.

Mr. SMOOT. They would have been provided for if any estimate had come to the Committee on Appropriations. It would have been put in the proper appropriation bill. I am not objecting where a failure has been made on the part of officials of the War Department to call it to the attention of the Appropriations Committee, but I do think the time will come when we will have to know where the appropriations are to be made and in what appropriation bill they are to be included, and that when the bill is presented to Congress they must be made in the proper bill and not have one appropriation bill carry one amount and the same department of the Government have the same purpose provided for in two or three bills.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in entire sympathy with the Senator from Utah in the suggestion which he has just made. We ought to get these things straightened out, but the Senator must remember that the Army is in a state of flux; that the war-time organization, which is a temporary organization under the provisions of the Overman Act, is still in existence. Many branches and services of the Army are temporary from the legal standpoint. It became absolutely incumbent upon the Committee on Military Affairs, when it was informed of the action of the Committee on Appropriations, to try to do something to save the civilian employees in the temporary branches of the Army. That has been attempted in this bill. Much as we regret it, we had to make a proposal which would violate the very healthy principle which the Appropriations Committee inserted in their bill; but, unfortunately, this is a perfect instance illustrating the necessity of some decently contrived budget system.

Here is the great Committee on Appropriations, charged with the duty of viséing the appropriations to pay the civilian employees of the War Department and all the other departments here in Washington. The Committee on Military Affairs is charged with viséing the appropriations for the support of the Army as such, exclusive of the civilian employees employed in the War Department by the Army. The Overman Act comes along as a war measure and makes it absolutely impossible to do anything except to employ these temporary civilian employees under the appropriations of the Military Affairs Committee. The Committee on Appropriations never hears of them; the Committee on Military Affairs never hears of what the Appropriations Committee has done; and the result is utter confusion; and here the Senator from Utah and the Senator from New York myself have stood and tried to straighten it out. I wish we had a system where we would never get into such a mess.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say that if we ever have a reorganization of the different departments of the Government, among other things just such things as this will be straightened out. All I am interested in is that there shall not be two appropriations for the same purpose. If Congress has placed that amount in the appropriation bill for The Adjutant General's office, through the legislative appropriation bill, The Adjutant General ought to know it and does know it. Then to have him come to the Committee on Military Affairs and ask for what the Appropriations Committee had turned down seems to me to be out of place.

This may not be such a case, but it does look to me that it is. I will say, by the way, the first time I noticed it was when it was read from the desk. If it turns out to be such a case, I am quite sure the Senator from New York will let it go out.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly. Let the amendment be passed over, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEW in the chair). The amendment will be passed over.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Chief of Coast Artillery," subhead "Coast Artillery School, Fort Monroe, Va.," on page 8, line 17, after the word "specialists," to strike out "$10,540" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of engines, generators, motors, machines, measuring instruments, special apparatus, and materials for the division of enlisted specialists, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Office of the Chief Signal Officer," subhead "Signal Service of the Army," on page 9, line 21, after the word "officer," to insert "and the Signal Corps School, Camp Alfred Vail, N. J.," so as to read:

Telegraph and telephone systems: Purchase, equipment, operation, and repair of military, telegraph, telephone, radio, cable, and signaling systems; signal equipments and stores, field glasses, telescopes, heliographs, signal lanters, flags, and other necessary instruments; wind vanes, barometers, anemometers, thermometers, and other meteorological instruments; photographic and cinematographic work performed for the Army by the Signal Corps; motor cycles, motor-driven and other vehicles for technical and official purposes in connection with the construction, operation, and maintenance of communication or signaling systems, and supplies for their operation and maintenance; professional and scientific books of reference, pamphlets, periodicals, newspapers, and maps for use in the office of the Chief Signal Officer and the Signal Corps School, Camp Alfred Vail, N. J.; telephone apparatus, including rental and payment for commercial, exchange, message, trunk-line, long-distance, and leased-line telephone service at or connecting any post, camp, cantonment, depot, arsenal, headquarters, hospital, aviation station, or other office or station of the Army, excepting local telephone service for the various bureaus of the War Department in the District of Columbia, and toll messages pertaining to the office of the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Air Service," on page 11, line 20, before the word "officers," to strike out "aviation"; on page 12, line 19, after the word "employees" to strike out "outside" and insert "within"; line 20, after the word "Columbia," to insert "and elsewhere," so that the sentence will read:

Salaries and wages of civilian employees within the District of Columbia and elsewhere as may be necessary, etc.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I see that the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] is present. Here is the case to which I referred a moment ago. I want to be fair with the members of the Committee on Appropriations and indicate to them just what this supposedly small amendment does.

On page 12, line 19, the Senator will note the language is to be made to read "salaries and wages of civilian employees within the District of Columbia and elsewhere." This is under the head of Air Service, and it is to make it possible for the money in this appropriation to be used to pay the temporary civilian employees in the Air Service who otherwise could not be paid owing to a provision in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to ask the Senator if the committee took into consideration the provision made in the legislative appropriation bill for that purpose?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is no provision in the legislative appropriation bill for these employees.

Mr. CURTIS. Then, so far as the committee is concerned, of course we could not have any objection to it here; but if it is to be continued every year, it ought to go in the legislative appropriation bill instead of this bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The point is that when we get the Army reorganized, though I do not know when it will be, we will have established under the law an air service in the Army. We have not got it now.

Mr. CURTIS. I was not on the subcommittee having charge of the legislative appropriation bill, and therefore have no knowledge as to whether the question was considered. I wish to ask the Senator if he knows whether the item for this work was submitted to the Appropriations Committee by the department, or did they rely wholly upon placing it in the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. WADSWORTH. They relied entirely upon the Army appropriation bill, because that is the only way they have been paid in the past. The Air Service is a war-time temporary organization.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. KING. My attention has been called during the past few days—and I am asking now for information—to a proposition which it was alleged existed to deny the Navy the right to control its Air Service, and to consolidate under the control of the Army the Air Service of the Army and the Air Service of the Navy. Does this bill effectuate that purpose?

Mr. WADSWORTH. There is a provision which has something to do with the subject to which the Senator alludes, but let me say to him that the danger of the death of naval aviation is greatly exaggerated. That item will be reached in just a short time. It is not nearly as bad as the first reports indicated.

Mr. CURTIS. While on that point, I wish to ask in behalf of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the item on page 14 may go over until he returns to the Chamber. I think that is the item the Senator refers to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have already made an agreement with the Senator from Massachusetts that when that is reached it will be passed over until he returns.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator why the amount for the Air Service was raised from $27,250,000 to $40,000,000?

Mr WADSWORTH. I may say at this point that the bill as reported from the Senate committee carries a total of $418,000,000, as contrasted with the estimates of the department amounting to $982,000,000. It is less than half the amount asked for by the War Department. The House passed the bill carrying an appropriation total of $376,765,824. We have added $42,153,317, making a total carried in the bill, as presented to the Senate, of $418,919,141. The principal elements in the increase in the bill over the House figures are this aviation item and the appropriations for the pay of the Army.

Briefly, this is the situation with respect to the aviation item. The Senator from Utah will probably remember the extended debate we had on the Army appropriation bill for the current fiscal year, and that, as a result of the conference between the two Houses on that bill, the Army aviation got a $25,000,000 appropriation, and the same amount was given to the Navy, although the Army aviation is four times as large, or it should be. With that $25,000,000 given to the aviation branch of the Army this year that service has been able to maintain itself as to the fields and the training schools, the research and engineering work largely done at Dayton, experimental work on machines, the pay of civilian employees, draftsmen, engineers, experts, and other ordinary maintenance items and has also been able to secure the manufacture of the impressive number of five airplanes, on an experimental model, one each.

With the exception of those five—and they are experimental—all the airplanes now in the possession of the Army of the United States are two years old. Most of them are De Haviland 4's which were manufactured during the war, which proved to be of bad design, and several of which have been remodeled as to the placing of the seats in the fusilage, in order that the American flier, if he comes to grief in the machine, may have some show for his life. Those machines, as I have said, are all two years old; they are out of date as compared with the machines of other countries.

We also have a few German Fokkers, which constitute our share of the division of the airplanes which the German Government surrendered under the armistice. We also purchased at the end of the war a few British SE–5's. All those machines are two years old; comparatively they are out of date. The best testimony that the Military Affairs Committee can get is that by the end of another year they will all be worn out and will not be safe for flying, and by that time the Army of the Republic will have no airplanes at all worthy of being called serviceable and up to date.

The Aviation Service have asked for an appropriation of $60,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair ventures to remind the Senator from New York that they asked for an appropriation of $83,000,000 last year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], the present occupant of the chair, reminds me that their request for the current year was for $83,000,000; but for next year they have asked for $60,000,000. The House of Representatives gave them $27,000,000. They came before the Military Committee and showed us, as we think conclusively, that if they are confined to an appropriation of $27,000,000 they will not be able to produce a single airplane type during the next fiscal year, and that, as a result, at the end of the next fiscal year the fliers of the United States Army will have to walk on the ground. They said that, with an appropriation of $60,000,000, they expected to build and would build 600 airplanes of four or five different types—the five types to which I referred a moment ago—of the most modern up-to-date machines, all of which have now been approved. Those types of machines were tested out at Dayton not long ago with eminent success; indeed, I have heard flying officers say that those machine types are as good as anything in the world, and they performed some rather remarkable feats in the test.

The committee of the Senate believed that we owed it to the country to see to it that the American Air Service had machines in which to fly. We did not give them the $60,000,000 they desired, but we propose to give them $40,000,000. We figured roughly that instead of 600 machines, which they said they wanted to build with the $60,000,000, they could build two or three hundred machines with the $40,000,000, and we propose to the Senate to appropriate a sufficient sum of money to let the Air Service of the Army of the United States have two or three hundred airplanes at the end of the next fiscal year.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I hesitate to criticize provisions of this bill which have received the attention of the Senator from New York. It is not unduly complimentary to say of him that he has given earnest and devoted service to the work of the Military Affairs Committee, and, with a desire to secure the best for the country, he has submitted measures only after the fullest examination of the provisions and items therein. However, I do want to submit this observation: There was appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, more than $36,000,000 for the aviation branch of the Army. Notwithstanding this large appropriation, there seem to be no results or any sort of a record of achievement. Millions were expended and not a machine constructed. When the war ended there were, I am advised, supplies, machinery, and so forth, on hand and under the control of the aviation branch of the War Department worth hundreds of millions of dollars. Millions were expended during the war for the construction of machines and to acquire machinery, factories, and other construction instrumentalities. Notwithstanding the stupendous appropriations made during the war and the large appropriations made to the War Department for aviation purposes after the war, we are advised that the aviation section is practically broken down, and that there are but few machines suitable or available for the service. It seems incredible that this great organization created during the war should be disintegrated and that the millions which it expended should have brought no results. It would seem that there has been great waste and extravagance in the administration of the funds and in expending the appropriations made. I am afraid that there have been too many officers in the service, too many employees, too many alleged experts, too many persons who absorbed the funds appropriated but produced no results. If ten or fifteen millions of dollars had been placed with some competent business organization, I believe it would have produced a number of machines suitable for the Air Service. And yet, with an appropriation many times that amount since the war, there are still no machines.

I remember reading some months ago figures showing the personnel of the Air Service, and I felt at the time there was too much machinery, too much administration, and too much bureaucratic inefficiency. What has become of the millions appropriated? Certainly some machines should have been built, and yet we are told there are no machines, that no machines have been constructed, and that the Air Service is in a chaotic condition.

I believe, Mr. President, that an examination of the records of the War Department will furnish convincing proof that the overhead expenses, if I may be permitted to use such a phrase, of the department are too great and the returns much too small for the huge sums invested. Thirty-six to forty millions of dollars seems small as those figures are measured by the more than one billion appropriated for the Air Service during the war, but in these days of peace that amount should bring results. The trouble with too many officials of the Government is that they talk in hundreds of millions of dollars instead of hundreds of thousands of dollars. They feel that unless they have millions nothing can be done. I am afraid that there is an indifference upon the part of public officials to the value of money. There is not that conservation and economy that should exist. If thirty-six millions produced no machines, it is a question in arithmetic to determine how much money will be required to produce one machine. It was expected that the large sum of money appropriated for the current fiscal year would have brought some results. It is regrettable that it seems to have brought only ruin. The record submitted is not a very creditable one, and unless there is prompt and radical change it would seem the part of wisdom to take away from the War Department any duty whatever of providing aircraft. If the millions appropriated are to be expended in overhead charges and otherwise, it would be far better to select some other agency to provide aircraft needed by the Government. No adequate explanation has been offered for the apparent maladministration in the Aircraft Service. It was inefficient in war. It seems to be inefficient in peace.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There being no objection, the amendment offered by the committee is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 13, line 19, after the words "Air Service," to insert "for printing and binding, including supplies, equipment, and repairs for such Air Service printing plants at stations outside of the District of Columbia as may be authorized in accordance with law; for publications, station libraries, special furniture, supplies, and equipment for offices, shops, and laboratories; for special services, including the salvaging of wrecked planes."

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what is the necessity of appropriating for the establishment of printing plants? Does the Aircraft Service conduct a printing business?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President. If the Senator will take a copy of the bill in his hand and look at it he will observe that the language which appears in the Senate committee amendment on the bottom of page 13 is the language which is stricken out from the middle of page 14. It is merely a transposition of the same provision from page 14 to page 13, in order to make sense in the context of the whole section. As passed by the House, through some error, the sentence did not connect up at all. We have simply made a transposition of the provision. The printing to which the Senator refers is blue printing of designs and sketches of airplanes and engines.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment reported by the committee is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 1, after the word "planes," to strike out "$27,255,000" and insert "$40,000,000"; and in line 11, after "$150,000," to strike out "for printing and binding, including supplies, equipment, and repairs for such Air Service printing plants at stations outside of the District of Columbia as may be authorized in accordance with law; for publications, station libraries, special furniture, supplies, and equipment for offices, shops, and laboratories; for special services, including the salvaging of wrecked planes."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 23, after the word "fleet," to insert "including fleet shore bases," so as to read:

And provided further, That hereafter the Army Air Service shall control all aerial operations from land bases, and that Naval Aviation shall have control of all aerial operations attached to a fleet, including fleet shore bases.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, the last proviso on page 14, which has just been read, is a very important one, and there are several Senators who desire to discuss it. The Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] has just told me that he hopes it may be allowed to go over until Monday, and I should be very glad to have that course taken, for, I repeat, several Senators wish to discuss it, and I know there is great opposition to it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to its going over until Monday, but before it goes over I merely wish to say that the amendment as printed in the bill is not the committee amendment, which I am authorized to offer, and that at the proper time——

Mr. LODGE. Perhaps the Senator has had the proposed new amendment printed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. No; it has not been printed.

Mr. LODGE. The Senator probably can have it printed, so that we may see it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I will read it, so that it will go into the RECORD in that way, and, if it is necessary to have it printed, I ask that that may be done. At the end of line 23, after the word "fleet," it is proposed to add "including shore station whose maintenance is necessary for operations with the fleet, for construction and experimentation and for the training of personnel."

That language, I am absolutely sure, will not interfere with anything the Navy wants to do. I have that assurance from the head of the Naval Aviation Service.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I ask the chairman of the committee to have this amendment passed over for the time being, and allow it to come up on Monday in order that we may confer in regard to the proposed change.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to that.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The entire subject matter was introduced in the bill, really without consultation with the Navy Department, and without any hearing before the Naval Committee. It affects very vitally the Naval Aviation Service. I am very much obliged to the chairman of the committee for allowing it to go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over until Monday.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 15, after line 3, to insert:

That piece of land reclaimed and to be reclaimed now the property of the United States Government known as Bolling Field, sections A and B, in the District of Columbia, on the east side of the Anacostia River extending from the Giesboro Point upstream to the outfall sewer at Poplar Point lying between the Anacostia River sea wall and the original high-water shore line on the east, is hereby set aside for use as a military reservation to be used for aviation purposes: Provided, That funds heretofore appropriated for the reclamation of this area shall remain available for this purpose.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I ask the Senator in charge of the bill where the land referred to in the amendment is located with reference to the present Bolling Field?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is Bolling Field.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It is what is now known as Bolling Field, and includes the land upon which the hangars are built, and so on.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; it is all Government land. I think at present it is under the jurisdiction of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and the object of the amendment is to transfer it to the War Department.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I know there is some additional land being reclaimed further on, and I thought probably the amendment included that land. I wanted to know why it was necessary to include additional land, but, as I understand from the Senator, it includes the land that is now known as Bolling Field.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The land known as Bolling Field; and may I say that this provision was submitted to the District Commissioners, and apparently met with their approval in its descriptive language.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought it was including additional land in Bolling Field. I supposed that the Army already controlled Bolling Field. I have no objection to this transfer of jurisdiction.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Navy is there also. Why there should be two overheads on one field I never have been able to understand.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am glad the Senator is putting it under one. I think that is far better.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I suggest that the Senator study the amendment which has gone over until Monday on that very ground—of stopping duplication.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 15, after line 13, to insert:

That the military reservation known as Chapman Field, now under the control and jurisdiction of the War Department, lying on the western side of the Biscayne Bay, near Miami, Fla., is hereby transferred to and placed under the control and jurisdiction of the Navy Department for the use of the Naval Service.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 19, to strike out:

For the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of 640 acres of land, more or less, and the appurtenances thereunto belonging, situate in Macomb County, State of Michigan, now occupied by the Air Service of the Army as an aviation station, and known as Selfridge Field, not to exceed $190,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] is interested in this item, and I think I assured him that I would ask that it be passed over if he should be absent from the Chamber when it came up. I do not see him here. I ask, therefore, that it may be passed over for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 16, line 1, to strike out the headline "Quartermaster Corps."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Pay, and so forth, of the Army," subhead "Pay of officers," on page 16, line 4, after the word "line," to strike out "$18,265,230" and insert "$25,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of officers of the line, $25,000,000.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I think it is due to the Senate for me to make a statement in connection with this matter of pay.

The House, in passing this bill, estimated for an Army of an average strength of 175,000 enlisted men during the next fiscal year. It is true, of course, that the authorized strength of the Army would be a good deal more than 175,000 men, but it is apparent from the recruiting figures and the statistics indicating the number of discharges which are daily or weekly taking place in the Army that we will not have in the Regular Army during the next fiscal year much more than 175,000 enlisted men on an average, so the House appropriations were supposed to be sufficient to pay for an Army of 175,000 men. As a matter of fact, the House appropriations would not pay for an Army of 175,000 men by some millions. The House simply cut the amount underneath that, even; but since the House passed this bill the Congress has passed and the President has signed the new Army and Navy increased-pay bill, so it became incumbent upon the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate to meet the new obligation arising from the new pay law. It has been necessary, therefore, for the Senate committee to increase the appropriations of the House in order to pay, or come within shooting distance of paying, 175,000 men and the appropriate complement of officers for the next fiscal year at the new rates of pay; and may I say to the Senate that the figures submitted by the Senate committee are themselves insufficient to pay 175,000 men at the new rates for the next year, although they are very close to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was, on page 16, line 6, after the word "department," to strike out "$12,294,915" and insert "$18,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of the officers of staff corps and departments, $18,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay of enlisted men," on page 16, line 17, after the word "line," to strike out "$54,889,391" and insert "$62,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of enlisted men of the line, $62,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 20, after the word "departments," to strike out "$16,512,405" and insert "$19,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

For pay of enlisted men of the staff corps and departments, $19,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Pay of Army field clerks and civil-service messengers at headquarters of the several territorial departments, Army and corps headquarters, territorial district, tactical divisions and brigades, service schools, camps, and ports of embarkation and debarkation," on page 19, line 20, after the word "light," to strike out "$310,705" and insert "$400,000," so as to make the clause read:

For commutation of quarters and of heat and light, $400,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 19, line 23, after the words "Quartermaster Corps," to strike out "$79,668" and insert "$100,000," so as to read:

For commutation of quarters and of heat and light for field clerks, Quartermaster Corps, $100,000: Provided, That said clerks, messengers, and laborers shall be employed and assigned by the Secretary of War to the offices and positions in which they are to serve: Provided further, That no clerk, messenger, or laborer at headquarters of tactical divisions, military departments, brigades, service schools, and office of the Chief of Staff shall be assigned to duty in any bureau of the War Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "General appropriations, Quartermaster Corps," subhead "Subsistence of the Army," on page 22, line 20, after the word "including," to insert "warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service"; and on page 23, line 25, after the word "including," to insert "warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service," so as to read:

Purchase of subsistence supplies: For issue as rations to troops, including warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service, enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps at camps, civil employees when entitled thereto, hospital matrons, nurses, applicants for enlistment while held under observation, general prisoners of war (including Indians held by the Army as prisoners, but for whose subsistence appropriation is not otherwise made), Indians employed with the Army as guides and scouts, and general prisoners at posts; for the subsistence of the masters, officers, crews, and employees of the vessels of the Army Transport Service; hot coffee for troops traveling when supplied with cooked or travel rations; meals for recruiting parties and applicants for enlistment while under observation; for sales to officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps while on active duty, and enlisted men of the Army: Provided, That the sum of $12,000 is authorized to be expended for supplying meals or furnishing commutation of rations to enlisted men of the Regular Army and the National Guard who may be competitors in the national rifle match: Provided, further, That no competitor shall be entitled to commutation of rations in excess of $1.50 per day, and when meals are furnished no greater expense than that sum per man per day for the period the contest is in progress shall be incurred. For payments: Of commutation of rations to the cadets of the United States Military Academy in lieu of the regular established ration, at the rate of $1.08 per ration; of the regulation allowances of commutation in lieu of rations to enlisted men on furlough, enlisted men and male and female nurses when stationed at places where rations in kind can not be economically issued, including warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service, enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, and when traveling on detached duty where it is impracticable to carry rations of any kind, enlisted men selected to contest for places or prizes in department and Army rifle competitions while traveling to and from places of contest, male and female nurses on leave of absence, applicants for enlistment, and general prisoners while traveling under orders.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Regular supplies," on page 27, line 10, after the word "reports," to strike out "$28,000,000" and insert "$32,000,000," and in line 11, after "$32,000,000," to strike out "Provided, That not to exceed $52,230 may be used in the erection and completion of an ice and cold-storage plant at Schofield Barracks," so as to make the clause read:

Regular supplies of the Quartermaster Corps, including their care and protection; construction and repair of military reservation fences; stoves and heating apparatus required for the use of the Army for heating offices, hospitals, barracks and quarters, and recruiting stations, and United States disciplinary barracks; also ranges, stoves, coffee roasters, and appliances for cooking and serving food at posts, in the field, and when traveling, and repair and maintenance of such heating and cooking appliances; and the necessary power for the operation of moving-picture machines; authorized issues of candles and matches; for furnishing heat and light for the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, and enlisted men, warrant officers, and field clerks, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty; contract surgeons when stationed at and occupying public quarters at military posts; for officers of the National Guard attending service and garrison schools, and for recruits, guards, hospitals, storehouses, offices, the buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902, and buildings for a similar purpose on military reservations authorized by War Department regulations; for sale to officers, and including also fuel and engine supplies required in the operation of modern batteries at established posts; for post bakeries, including bake ovens and apparatus pertaining thereto and the repair thereof; for ice machines and their maintenance where required for the health and comfort of the troops and for cold storage; ice for issue to organizations of enlisted men and officers at such places as the Secretary of War may determine, and for preservation of stores; for the construction, operation, and maintenance of laundries at military posts in the United States and its island possessions; for the authorized issues of laundry materials for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances, and for applicants for enlistment while held under observation; authorized issues of soap, toilet paper, and towels; for the necessary furniture, textbooks, paper, and equipment for the post schools and libraries, and for schools for noncommissioned officers; for the purchase and issue of instruments, office furniture, stationery, and other authorized articles for the use of officers' schools at the several military posts; for purchase of relief maps for issue to organizations, commercial newspapers, market reports, etc.; for the tableware and mess furniture for kitchens and mess halls, each and all for the enlisted men, including recruits; for forage, salt, and vinegar for the horses, mules, oxen, and other draft and riding animals of the Quartermaster Corps at the several posts and stations and with the armies in the field, and for the horses of the several regiments of Cavalry and batteries of Artillery, and such companies of Infantry and Scouts as may be mounted; for remounts and for the authorized number of officers' horses, including bedding for the animals; for seeds and implements required for the raising of forage at remount depots and on military reservations in the Hawaiian and Philippine Islands, and for labor and expenses incident thereto, including, when specifically authorized by the Secretary of War, the cost of irrigation; for straw for soldiers' bedding, stationery, typewriters and exchange for same, including blank books and blank forms for the Army, certificates for discharged soldiers, and for printing department orders and reports, $32,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "incidental expenses," on page 28, line 13, after the words "Quartermaster Corps," to insert "and finance service," so as to read:

Postage; cost of telegrams on official business received and sent by officers of the Army, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, when ordered to active duty; extra pay to soldiers employed on extra duty, under the direction of the Quartermaster Corps, in the erection of barracks, quarters, and storehouses, in the construction of roads, and other constant labor for periods of not less than 10 days; as additional school-teachers during the school term at post schools, and as clerks for post quartermasters at military posts, and for overseers of general prisoners at posts designated by the War Department for the confinement of general prisoners, and for the United States disciplinary barracks guard; of extra-duty pay at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of War for mess stewards and cooks at recruit depots who are graduates of the schools for bakers and cooks, and instructor cooks at the schools for bakers and cooks; for expenses of expresses to and from frontier posts and armies in the field; of escorts to officers or agents of the Quartermaster Corps to trains where military escorts can not be furnished; hire of laborers in the Quartermaster Corps, including the care of officers' mounts when the same are furnished by the Government, and the hire of interpreters, spies, or guides for the Army; compensation of clerks and other employees of the Quartermaster Corps and finance service, and clerks, foremen, watchmen, and organist for the United States disciplinary barracks, and incidental expenses of recruiting.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead of "Transportation of the Army and its supplies," on page 29, line 6, after the word "including," to insert "the warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service"; on page 30, line 18, after the word "paid," to insert "for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans"; on page 31, line 7, after the word "Oceans," to strike out "$38,000,000" and insert "$45,000,000"; on page 32, line 15, after the word "acts," to strike out "for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes, provided," and insert "Provided further, That"; in line 24, after the word "expended," to strike out "for the purchase of any motor-propelled vehicles nor"; on page 33, line 3, after the word "use," to insert "except such use as is prescribed by order for the transportation of Army personnel in connection with the recreational activities of the Army"; and in line 5, after the word "Army," to strike out "or for any purpose except for military and official business; for drayage and cartage at the several depots; for the purchase and repair of ships, boats, and other vessels required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; for expenses of sailing public transports and other vessels on the various rivers, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans," so as to read:

For transportation of the Army and its supplies, including transportation of the troops when moving either by land or water, and of their baggage, including the warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service, members of the Officers' Reserve Corps, enlisted men of the Enlisted Reserve Corps, and retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty, including the cost of packing and crating; for transportation of funds of the Army; for the payment of Army transportation lawfully due such land-grant railroads as have not received aid in Government bonds (to be adjusted in accordance with the decisions of the Supreme Court in cases decided under such land-grant acts), but in no case shall more than 50 per cent of full amount of service be paid; for the purchase and hire of draft and pack animals in such numbers as are actually required for the service, including reasonable provision for replacing unserviceable animals; for the purchase, hire, operation, maintenance, and repair of such harness, wagons, carts, drays, other vehicles, and motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles as are required for the transportation of troops and supplies and for official, military, and garrison purposes; and the amount so fixed to be paid shall be accepted as in full for all demands for such service: Provided further, That nothing in the preceding provisos shall be construed to prevent the accounting officers of the Government from making full payment to land-grant railroads for transportation of property or persons where the courts of the United States have held that such property or persons do not come within the scope of the deductions provided for in the land-grant acts: Provided further, That no money herein appropriated shall be expended for the hire, operation, maintenance, or repair of any motor-propelled vehicle, which shall be employed wholly or in part for personal, social, or similar use, except such use as is prescribed by order for the transportation of Army personnel in connection with the recreational activities of the Army.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 33, after the words just stricken out, to insert:

Provided further, That hereafter when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, accommodations are available, transportation on Army transports may be provided for the members and employees of the Porto Rican Government and their families without expense to the United States: Provided further, That in the discretion of the Secretary of War, and when space is available, civilian passengers and shipments of commercial cargo may be transported on Army transports at rates not less than those charged by commercial steamship companies, between the same ports, for the same class of accommodations, the receipts from which shall be covered in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of miscellaneous receipts.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I regret to interfere with the orderly procedure in disposing of this important measure; but, very frankly, I feel that it is a mistake in any event to include what I think must be admitted to be general legislation on an appropriation bill, and in this particular case a type of general legislation that directly affects a policy which the Senate only yesterday practically agreed to in the passage of the merchant marine bill; in other words, to endeavor to encourage the establishment of a merchant marine and its development, and gradually to get it into the hands of private initiative and private energy. Now, we come along and add to an Army appropriation bill a proviso that transports in the Army service shall engage in regular commercial business, carrying passengers and shipments of cargo from islands in the Caribbean to American ports. In other words, we are practically running a merchant marine in two departments of the Government, not to speak at all of the question which it seems to me should be given careful consideration by Congress, that of governmental competition with private interests already engaged in conducting steamship routes in that same territory.

I have here a letter from a well-known American company from which I will read just a few lines for the information of the Senate. This letter is from the A. H. Bull Steamship Co., having a fleet of, I think, some 12 or 15 ships, conducting a regular weekly service between New York and Porto Rico, the island that is involved in this amendment:

> Previous to the war we gained a place in the transportation between this island and the United States by the hardest kind of work and the keenest kind of competition. The Government then requisitioned all our ships, and we had to take, as all lines did, such vessels as were allocated to us to maintain more or less of a service. The service was not adequate, but it was a war emergency, and could not be avoided. However, many shippers in the island of Porto Rico did not appreciate this. Others at the different ports have clamored for Shipping Board vessels, and lines have been started to the island from Baltimore, Jacksonville, and the Gulf. In no way are they creating new business, but are simply taking from the lines that operated there previous to the war, and we do not believe they are operating on a paying basis. The Army now comes along and wishes to make further competition. We do not believe it is right that they should be permitted to do a commercial business, and we look with apprehension on this continued attempt to interfere with private transportation companies. We can not conceive how we can go to a banker and negotiate loans to operate passenger steamers if we have to admit that the United States Army Transport Service is to be a competitor.

I think the merit of the case will itself appeal to the Senate; but outside of that, or attempting to create a division as to the question of governmental competition, the strong point, I think, is the one that I have already alluded to—that we are attempting through the merchant-marine bill to establish and develop generally a merchant marine, and all of our energy from a governmental standpoint should be confined to that particular branch of the service. But I shall not bring up the question to have it decided from either standpoint, because I think a simple point of order is quite sufficient to remove it from the bill. I again express regret to interfere in any way with the passage of this bill, but I am sure the chairman will admit and agree with me that that particular provision has no relation to the necessary appropriations for the Army and is general legislation of a character that at its best is doubtful.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I ask the Senator from New Jersey to withhold the point of order for a moment.

Mr. EDGE. I will be very glad to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I appreciate that it probably will be regarded as well taken, but I would like to say something about this matter.

Mr. EDGE. I shall be very glad to withhold it.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me to make a suggestion? I would like to have him answer it, and it is cognate to the point the Senator from New Jersey has been discussing. If I may be permitted to ask it, he may answer them both while he has the floor. Complaints have been made to me that the War Department, in the utilization of its transport system, has sent boats to various parts of the United States and to its insular possessions loaded very slightly, at tremendous cost. If a few soldiers or a few officers were to be transported or a few tons of freight were to be carried, the Government, at great expense, would employ a transport. It could have at one-tenth of the expense employed private boats which were plying between the points in question and have gotten the same results. I have no knowledge whatever of the complaints. There may be absolutely no foundation to those complaints, but they have been made to me repeatedly, and if the Senator knows anything in regard to the matter I should be very glad to hear his explanation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, these two amendments, printed in italics on page 33, are a genuine effort to save some money for the Government of the United States, and I think it is high time that we took a little thought on that question.

The Senator from Utah has just referred to what I believe to be a fact, that certain Army transports sail only partly loaded with cargo and partly used for passengers. That, under the present situation, is inevitable; it can not be prevented, because it is absolutely necessary for the War Department to run a regular transport service. The ships must sail on a certain day, and they must reach the end of their voyage upon a certain day or thereabouts, in order that certain types of supplies may go forward and reach their destination.

For example, we have 17,000 officers and men on the Rhine. Antwerp is the terminal at which our transports unload the supplies destined for our troops on the Rhine, and from Antwerp they are taken up the river by barge, as I understand it. Of course, it will be seen right away that it is absolutely necessary for the War Department to run a regular service back and forth across the Atlantic, keeping in touch with that force, and it is perfectly true that at times the cargoes do not fill the holds of the vessels; and yet what is put in the vessel has to be taken, and it is perfectly true that many of the cabins are empty because there is not personnel being sent across sufficient to fill the cabins.

This legislation is meant to authorize the Secretary of War to make use of that vacant cargo space and that vacant passenger space in transporting civilian commercial cargo and civilian passengers at the same rates charged by commercial steamship companies, and to try to get some return for the taxpayers, who have paid for the transports and who pay for their operation.

It is not meant to compete with commercial lines, because it is especially provided that they must charge as much as commercial lines charge. The operation of these transports, it is hoped, will not continue long. It is not conceivable that we will maintain an army upon the Rhine indefinitely. They may return within the year; they may be there for two years or three years; no one can tell. As soon as our troops on the Rhine return our operation of transports across the Atlantic ceases; but while they are being operated, I say, for heaven's sake let us get some return from them.

The chief of transportation, Gen. Hines, is firmly convinced that a most substantial revenue can be brought into the Treasury of the United States if this provision remains in the bill. I shall regret exceedingly if the Senator from New Jersey shall press the point of order. He says that it has nothing to do with the appropriation of funds for the support of the Army. Technically that is true; but it has something to do with the saving of the very funds that the bill deals with.

The first of these two amendments relates only to transports touching at Porto Rico, and let me say just a word about that. It will be noted that the first amendment reads that—

> Hereafter when, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, accommodations are available, transportation on Army transports may be provided for the members and employees of the Porto Rican Government and their families without expense to the United States.

What is the situation? There are a considerable number of school-teachers in Porto Rico who make it a custom to visit the United States every summer. They go to summer schools here, they spend their vacations here as a relief from their work in that tropical climate. Word comes from them, through the Governor of Porto Rico, that the commercial steamers touching at Porto Rico bound for the United States are so packed with passengers, and the space in them reserved so far ahead, that these poor people have very little chance of reaching the United States at all this year. It is a provision intended to permit those school-teachers to get to the United States this summer. And they pay their own way. It is to be without expense to the United States.

Of course, the Senator from New Jersey can raise the point of order against both these amendments, but I submit, Mr. President, if he does so, he does more harm than good.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I have not the slightest objection to the first provision in the amendment—the provision which the Senator has just discussed—on the contrary, I approve of it. It provides that members and employees of the Porto Rican Government and their families may be transported without expense to the United States in Army transports. That is a very small matter. It is too small a matter to make a question about, and I intended to differentiate between the two provisions of the amendment.

But the other portion of the amendment I must most respectfully insist is unfortunate and is unwise, and puts the Government in direct competition with established business of the country, which we encourage. We ask in every way that American capital and American initiative engage in this enterprise, and especially in view of the fact that we are now——

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. EDGE. I will yield just as soon as I am through with this statement. I say we are now attempting to centralize our whole commercial merchant marine activity in one department, which we have authorized by a bill which passed only yesterday, an extensive department. If the transports are to be used, and it is deemed wise that they should be used, in some sections of the world for cargoes or passengers, then I feel it should come through the Shipping Board, and that two departments of the Government should not attempt in a way——

Mr. WADSWORTH. How can the Shipping Board run an Army transport?

Mr. EDGE. I do not think they can. For that reason I am making the point of order. But I do not think two departments of the Government should be engaged in this same general activity, when one department is trying to organize and establish it on a firm basis.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator does not mean to say that it would be a general activity on the part of the Army transports?

Mr. EDGE. I do not know. I am not sure.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I described the situation. I am sorry I have not succeeded in persuading the Senator. I venture to say that the gentleman who wrote him takes a mighty selfish view of the situation. It is not in the slightest degree the purpose of the Federal Government, as that letter apparently seeks to convey, to compete with commercial lines. These Government boats must sail full or empty; it makes no difference; they must go; and this provides that when they go half filled with Government cargo the Government can take in some commercial cargo to fill the remaining space and charge the prevailing commercial rates, and those only.

May I say to the Senator from New Jersey that a bill has already passed the Senate, a separate measure, providing essentially for this very same thing?

If the Senator will permit me, I am going to put into the RECORD the names of these transports, their tonnage, their capacity, and whatever information is available, because I want this matter understood.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield to me for a brief statement?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Will the Senator from New Jersey yield for a question?

Mr. EDGE. I will yield for a question or a brief statement. I do not want to yield the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON. If the Senator will withhold his point of order, I want to make a brief statement.

Mr. EDGE. I am going to finish my remarks in just a few minutes, principally in answer to the last suggestion of the Senator from New York.

I am fundamentally opposed to the Government being in business, to start with. Whether this individual case is one of merit or not I personally do not know, but the general policy of the Government engaging in private business in competition with the business interests of the country I am opposed to, whether it happens to be a small matter or a large matter. In my judgment the sooner the Government disengages itself from private business and uses the great functions of Government, the great power of Government, to cooperate with business, the better the country will be as a result. So, for that reason, I felt it very unwise, without consideration, to make such a departure and to incorporate that type of general legislation in an appropriation bill. I am fundamentally opposed to the principle and shall be until I am strongly convinced to the contrary.

Mr. POMERENE. I want to ask the Senator one question.

Mr. EDGE. I shall be very glad to answer it.

Mr. POMERENE. Does not the Senator from New Jersey think it would be very bad policy for the Government, owning and operating as it does these transports, to continue to operate them at a greater expense, when, if they were permitted to use them temporarily for the purposes indicated by the committee amendment, they could be operated at a less expense?

Mr. WADSWORTH. And it is only for a few months, or a year, at the most.

Mr. EDGE. As the Senator from Ohio propounds the question, considering it directly from the particular interest involved as explained by the Senator from New York, I answer yes. But I am speaking of the general principle, and if we are going to amend that general principle and still engage in business activity on the part of the Government, I want to do it through the consideration of a separate measure, which will give us the opportunity to properly qualify it by amendment, or at least to give it some consideration. I am opposed to this type of important legislation going through Congress on an appropriation bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has already passed the Senate in a separate bill.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, there is another feature of the subject which I think requires attention. The Senator from New York has stated the case as it relates to passengers from Porto Rico. That condition exists at many Central American and South American ports, and it is noticeably true of the Panaman ports. There are perhaps 500 to 1,000 persons on the Isthmus of Panama who have been seeking passage to the United States for some weeks, and many of them for some months. How can the Senator from New Jersey justify striking this provision from the bill when the ships which are now plying to those ports are inadequate to accommodate the passengers who have applied for transportation?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, since I am asked the question——

Mr. ROBINSON. The Senator declined to yield to me, but I shall be glad to yield to him——

Mr. EDGE. Let the Senator finish his statement.

Mr. ROBINSON. The condition I have referred to as prevailing in Panama exists in Haiti. Haiti has never had adequate passenger transportation. So, considering the fact that this provision merely warrants the use to their fullest capacity of facilities which must be used by the United States, facilities which will be operated probably at an expense any way, it does seem to me that the Senator ought to be induced not to make the point of order.

The people who are seeking passage would be glad to procure it from private companies or on ships privately operated, but, as I have already stated, those facilities are inadequate and there is no prospect in the immediate future that the accommodations will be sufficient to meet the requirements of the traveling public. Then why in the name of reason should these passengers not be permitted to travel on these transports, since they must be operated, as the Senator from New York has already pointed out?

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, I do not propose to prolong the discussion, but I wish just briefly to answer the Senator from Arkansas. We have some 2,000 ships to-day, I understand, owned by the Federal Government and under the control of the Shipping Board. Within that tonnage there is almost every type and description of ship.

I have understood, through attending various hearings of the Committee on Commerce, that we are particularly oversupplied with what are known as ships built originally for or suitable at least for coastwise transportation; in other words, they have so many of them that I think it is common knowledge that the Shipping Board has already accepted offers from aliens to sell some of the ships, because they could not find any way to use them on this side.

The Shipping Board under a bill recently passed is going to endeavor to establish lines, encourage new lines, allocate ships to existing lines, and do everything possible to meet any business situation where the possibilities of business would be sufficient to warrant such a service. I feel that they should have an opportunity to carry that out.

The Government has invested over $3,000,000,000 in these ships, and I do not feel that it is good business suddenly to give almost unlimited powers, resting simply on a decision of the Secretary of War, to use our transport service in any way that he may wish, in passenger or cargo traffic. It goes even further than the Senator from Arkansas states.

Therefore until a bill comes before us in a way that we can at least qualify it, discuss it, amend it, or give it that consideration which the importance of the measure would warrant, I must insist upon the point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Before the Senator insists upon the point of order, I wish to call attention to the fact that the bill which the Senate passed September 8, 1919, with reference to this matter lays down in considerable detail, over two pages of the bill, the conditions upon which the Secretary of War may allow the use of the transports. That bill has been favorably acted upon by the House committee, with some amendments that were suggested, and is now on the House Calendar.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It has been passed by the Senate.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It occurs to me that it would be well to allow this matter to take the regular course and be acted upon in the regular bill instead of trying to put it into the Army appropriations bill, without the limitations and directions and restrictions that the Senate put in the bill when it passed it and to which the House has agreed.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Would the Senator from New Jersey be willing to accept the bill passed by the Senate instead of the amendment printed in the Army appropriation bill?

Mr. EDGE. Speaking personally, I have not the bill before me——

Mr. WADSWORTH. Here is a copy of it.

Mr. EDGE. And I have not had an opportunity to study it. It is a bill that requires considerable consideration. I want to be courteous to the Senator from New York, the chairman of the committee, because I recognize his interest in the whole subject. The very best I can do for him under the circumstances, I think, is to allow the point of order to go over and the amendment to be passed over until we have some opportunity to study the bill that has already passed the Senate on the same subject.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is presumed the Senator studied the bill at that time.

Mr. EDGE. If the Senator will allow me to withhold the point of order temporarily, with the understanding that we shall come back to it when we finish the other portions of the bill, I shall be very glad to do that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well.

Mr. President, I desire to place in the RECORD some testimony on this subject, so that it will appear in the proceedings in a consecutive manner. I read from the testimony of Gen. Hines, Chief of Transportation, before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs:

The matter is simply this: To-day the transport frequently has to sail with passenger space and cargo space not completely filled. There are hardly sufficient commercial vessels in operation, at least at this time, and perhaps within the next year, to take care of all the commercial needs, and it seems the part of wisdom, at least good business, for the Government to utilize completely all the space on these vessels as long as we are compelled to operate them.

He continues:

Gen. HINES. We have no desire to compete with commercial companies; we have no desire to go out and advertise for business, but when cargo is waiting and passengers are unable to get commercial accommodations and are willing to take the class of accommodations that we have, it seems to me that we should be authorized to utilize that space.

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. Have you made any estimate of what that revenue would be?

Gen. HINES. Yes, I have. I estimate, if we are permitted to do this, that we will at least derive a revenue of $3,000,000 on the Atlantic.

That is, this next summer. The point of order suggested by the Senator from New Jersey is to deprive the people of this country of $3,000,000 of revenue. I interject that as a part of the testimony of Gen. Hines.

Mr. ROBINSON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON. In addition to that, ships privately owned and operated are carrying their fullest capacity. The effect of the point of order will be to deprive those desirous of securing passage of the opportunity to do so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Commercial ships, passenger and commercial, are crammed to the gunwales to-day. There are people of my personal acquaintance who have been trying to get passage to Europe for weeks and they can not get a reservation.

What have we on the Atlantic in the way of Army transports? I will continue reading from the testimony of Gen. Hinds:

Senator CHAMBERLAIN. You are only using the residue, always providing for the Government needs?

Senator THOMAS. Surplus accommodations?

Gen. HINES. Yes; surplus accommodations. Of course, at this time on the Atlantic that would probably be going to Europe, because we are utilizing most of the space coming back for our own needs, in returning the 10,000 Polish-Americans that are to come out of Danzig.

The Senator will remember, doubtless, that I introduced and secured the passage of a bill in the Senate, which later passed the House, authorizing the War Department to use its Army transports in bringing home the Polish-Americans who went abroad as members of the famous Polish Legion and fought with the allied armies, who later were sent to Poland and who assisted in the defense of Poland against her many enemies, and who finally, with their service expired, had no way of getting back to America. Our Army transports are now bringing them back. Sixteen hundred of them have been brought back, and there are now about 8,000 more of them to bring.

Then the chairman of the committee asked Gen. Hinds:

The CHAIRMAN. How many ships are you operating regularly on the Atlantic, trans-Atlantic?

Gen. HINES. I think I will put this in the record, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Is it in the House record?

Gen. HINES. I will put it in the record here. We have seven in the straight trans-Atlantic service and two in the canal service; that is, one running from New York to the Panama Canal, and one from New Orleans to the Panama Canal. The one from New York is a cargo and passenger ship and the one from New Orleans is utilized principally in transferring cargo from the Army base to the Canal, to give them the reserve that they need down there. The fleet on the Atlantic is made up of the smaller of the ex-German vessels, of the Antigone and the Pocahontas class.

Then follows a table showing the names of the vessels, their tonnage, and their cargo capacity. In the Atlantic there are 71 vessels that run from 4,500 dead-weight tons up to 15,000, the smallest being the old Kilpatrick and Buford, and the largest being the Nansemond. Their capacity in cargo runs from 1,500 tons to 8,400 tons. Each of those vessels in the next year may make five or six or seven trips. It is the purpose of the provision to permit them to earn a little money and save the taxpayers of the country what they are able to earn.

I ask unanimous consent that the table printed at the bottom of page 350 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Military Affairs be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table is as follows:

Mr. WADSWORTH. I understand there is no point of order raised against the amendment authorizing the transportation of the Porto Rican school-teachers? There are two separate amendments.

Mr. EDGE. There is absolutely no point of order against the first half of the suggested amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are two separate amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that there is no point of order raised on the first proviso and that the point of order raised against the second proviso is temporarily withheld by the Senator from New Jersey. The RECORD will so show.

EX-PRESIDENT TAFT'S VIEW ON BONUS BILL.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Philadelphia Ledger of to-day published an article upon the bonus from the pen of ex-President Taft, and I desire to impose upon the patience of the Senate long enough to read it into the RECORD. The heading is:

BONUS BILL SHOULDN BE ALLOWED TO DIE—IT IS CONTEMPTIBLE POLITICS TO PRESS IT WHEN A PRESIDENTIAL VETO IS PRACTICALLY ASSURED.

(By William Howard Taft. Copyright, 1920, by Public Ledger Co.)

"It is to be hoped that the Republicans of prominence who met to consider the platform in Washington exercised a useful influence upon the Congressmen and Senators, and made them to know how unwise is the plan to vote a cash bonus to 4,000,000 ex-service men. There is substantially no demand for the bonus except from those who are to receive it; it is doubtful whether a majority of them favor it. The pinch of the high cost of living makes everyone else except the beneficiary of the bonus impatient at the thought of this very heavy additional burden to be put upon the people.

"The slumping Government bonds, the tenseness of the situation produced by the obstruction to interstate commerce, the tightness of money, the continued high cost of living, and all the uncertainties due to threatened strikes should give our legislators at Washington pause.

"Hundreds of thousands of men and women were induced through patriotic appeals to subscribe to Government bonds at an interest rate much too low and have been compelled to sell them at a heavy sacrifice. They will certainly have a right to complain if conditions now are to be made worse for them in the cost of living and greater taxation by the bonus project. The times are critical, and the voluntary assumption of this additional and unnecessary load is foolishness in the extreme. It is politics gone mad.

"The Republican Party has been most emphatic in denouncing wasteful extravagances on the part of the Democratic administration and has urged the necessity for a change in government in order to secure economy and retrenchment. With what sincerity can the party make this appeal if it becomes responsible for the unnecessary expenditure of $1,500,000,000 or $2,000,000,000?

"All but the ex-service men and a great many of those will hope, if the bill passes the two Houses, that the President will veto it, as he ought. If we may judge from the evidence of the Secretary of the Treasury he will advise the President to do so.

"Can it be that those who are pressing this bill are themselves hoping that by pushing it through they can secure the favor of the beneficiaries and then by the veto can avoid its burden, putting the political responsibility for its defeat on the administration? Such politics would be contemptible; such a theory is incredible; but the Republicans who favor the bonus will expose themselves to such a charge in the face of the present financial and business crisis. The majority party in each House should do the right and the just thing and let the bonus bill die."

It is to be hoped, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives will take to heart this warning from one of the most eminent Republican statesmen of the age and follow the advice thus given.

TEACHERS—THEIR IMPORTANCE—THEIR COMPENSATION—THEIR FUTURE.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I call the attention of the Senate to a situation in this country in regard to teachers that ought to be generally known, for when it is once known the unfortunate condition which now prevails throughout the entire United States in regard to the education of our children will be speedily remedied. If there is one thing upon which the American people are united, it is their determination to provide increasingly adequate educational facilities through every grade.

There are now 647,172 teachers in the United States. Of this number, 562,184 are teachers in the elementary grades and 84,988 are teachers in the high schools. In a very real sense this body of patriotic Americans are the guardians of the Nation's future. They have to do with the American sovereignty of to-morrow.

To-day they are the mighty instruments in the formation of the character and ideals and efficiency of the coming men and women who to-morrow will govern for weal or for woe these United States.

Every instinct of national self-preservation as well as every reason of justice to teachers themselves, and of expediency and wisdom for the welfare of the Nation, demands two things:

First, that there be provided sufficient teachers who are competent, well trained, and well paid to instruct American boys and girls. The very future of our country is at stake. The responsibility placed upon these teachers is too great to permit of any but the best, the most skilled, the most efficient, in training potential American citizens.

Second, that there be provided for these teachers adequate training and adequate facilities in buildings and equipment whereby to perform their high duty, and that there be no failure to recognize the necessity of providing satisfactory living conditions for teachers and for their recreation and recuperation.

In a peculiar sense teachers in their work give themselves; it is a part of their own personality that is expended each day in the classroom. They must not be allowed to grow stale. They must be so situated that, not only in physical vitality but in mental and nerve force, they may build up what their day's work is constantly tearing down.

The teacher in a sense is an illustration of the very principle which was so manifest upon the battle line of the Great War: Those who were in the very pressure of the fight, though uninjured, were always found to need, after a comparatively few days of such intense activity, the recuperating effect of a longer time far back of the fighting line.

A recent report concerning the faculty of Yale University, situated in a great city where music and drama and pictures are available, both for education and recreation, found that the average faculty family of four people were financially able to spend but 65 cents a week for recreation. This is not only a personal deprivation, it is a blow to the efficiency of education. Books and magazines and music and art are as necessary food to sustain the teacher's strength as wrestling and boxing and running are for the athlete.

This need for well-trained, well-paid teachers and adequate facilities for their work and recreation are not merely desirable things; they are absolutely essential in this Republic.

Every American boy and girl, whether on the farm or in the more sparsely settled parts of the country, or in the city, is entitled to receive, and alike for their own sakes and for the welfare of the Nation must receive, that education which will fit them for citizenship.

If there is one place where well-trained, well-paid teachers are more necessary than another place it is with the younger children in the formative years of their lives.

At this time of life the boy and girl must come in contact with a master mind who can not only instruct in the curriculum of the school but which can by example and personal influence as well as by precept stamp upon the imagination of the growing child those great lessons of patriotism and right living and right thinking, both in relation to God and to man, that, once learned by the child, can never be entirely forgotten.

To the consuls of the Empire of Rome there was sent out the mandate that was not only an order but was well known to carry with it dire punishment in case of failure, and it always read, "You are responsible; look to it that the Republic comes to no harm." The same message is the mandate of this country to the great teaching force of the Nation, and that mandate must be accompanied by the compensation and the facilities and the encouragement which make its realization possible.

The tyrannical requirement of the children of Israel that the full quota of bricks should be made without straw must not be repeated in the relation of the United States to their teaching force.

The compensation of teachers is pitifully insufficient. The average salary for elementary teachers in 1918 was $606 a year; the average salary for high-school teachers was $1,031. The reports from 47 States in 1919–20 indicate that the average salary of all teachers in rural schools, including both elementary and high-school teachers, was $633.96.

White men teachers received on an average $711.68; white women teachers received on an average $629.96; negro men teachers received on an average $372.64; negro women teachers received on an average $358.84. In one State the average of the teaching force received but $351 a year, and in one State the average salary for teachers in negro schools was $179 per annum, and the highest average in any State for the rural teachers was $1,026.

This information is substantially up to date and includes all the increases which have come in the various States up to and including this year. The following table of 1,203 men teachers and 6,758 women teachers, taken from every part of the country, is most suggestive.

I ask that the table referred to be incorporated in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

Average rural salaries for all States.

White.	Men.	Women.	Total.
Less than $500	292	1,608	1,900
Over $500—less than $1,000	707	4,925	5,632
Over $1,000—less than $1,500	170	213	383
Over $1,500	34	12	46
Total	1,203	6,758	7,961

Mr. SPENCER. A study of camparative compensation of teachers and their occupation in California as of 1915 is illuminating, but the inequality is more manifest to-day, for the increase in compensation in every trade and occupation has been proportionately advanced far more than in regard to teachers.

If there is no objection, Mr. President, I submit that table in connection with what I am speaking and ask that it be printed without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

In many places the janitor of the school building receives more compensation than the teacher in the lower grades of instruction. Anywhere it costs more than $100 a month to employ a man fitted to train a horse, and yet in many places the teacher competent to train the child is not paid $50 a month.

The Chicago Tribune not long ago reported that hod carriers had been awarded $8 a day in Chicago. This is five times the average salaries paid to elementary school-teachers, and is more than twice the average salary paid to high-school teachers.

There have been indications of betterment throughout the country, but the need is not so much for a readjustment of salaries as it is for an immediate doubling or trebling of existing compensation, with corresponding requirements as to the qualifications on the part of the teacher.

The result of this indifference to the compensation and welfare of the teachers is precisely what might be expected. In New York City during the month of March, 1920, 115,000 children were sent home because there were no teachers available for their instruction. Last year 143,000 teachers in the United States were forced by insufficient compensation to quit teaching and take up better-paid work. A general condition like this makes the very foundation of the Government tremble.

The supply of scholars is constantly increasing. The supply of teachers is constantly decreasing. On February 13 of this year the Commissioner of Education stated that 18,279 schools were closed because there were no teachers available, and that in addition 41,900 schools were taught by teachers whom he characterized as being "below standard, but taken on temporarily in the emergency."

The State normal schools report a diminished enrollment amounting to between 25 to 50 per cent.

It is estimated that the total graduates of all schools, universities, and normal schools which train for elementary teachers will not exceed 30,000 during this next year, and there are 120,000 positions in the elementary schools which must be filled.

Thirty thousand teachers will be needed for the high schools, and, so far as can be estimated, the total number of graduates from schools and universities who are preparing to teach will not exceed 10,000.

The question is not only a local or State question; it is a national question, because the lack of education in any part of the country affects the entire Nation, and some parts of the country are not able to provide for adequate education except by placing upon themselves an unfair financial burden.

The following table will illustrate this point. I ask also to have the table printed in the RECORD in connection with my remarks without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The table referred to is as follows:

	Taxable wealth.	Average attendance.	Taxable wealth divided by average attendance.
Maine	$1,030,266,547	114,865	9,057
Massachusetts	5,735,230,115	506,910	11,116
New York	21,912,629,507	1,288,047	17,012
Michigan	5,169,022,582	532,362	9,709
Iowa	7,437,094,834	391,132	19,014
Maryland	12,002,216,720	167,931	11,923
North Carolina	1,745,233,696	410,140	4,256
Alabama	2,050,014,767	292,864	7,000
Kentucky	2,152,097,565	308,277	6,981
California	8,023,435,581	393,088	20,411

Mr. SPENCER. The above table shows, for example, that in order to have North Carolina, with a taxable wealth of $4,256 for each school attendant, have as good schools as California it would be necessary to impose a tax in North Carolina five times as great as in California, because California has a taxable wealth of $20,411 for each school attendant.

The inability of any State to provide absolutely necessary educational advantages for its children is no reason why those educational advantages should be denied, because every child in this Nation is not alone a citizen of an individual State, but is an essential part of the Nation itself, and the education of every child in the most remote part of the country has its direct influence upon the national welfare.

All that is necessary in connection with the entire subject of efficient education is that the people of these United States shall understand the condition as it is and realize that our very civilization is in the balance.

An intelligent, well-informed, patriotic American citizenship is the only solution of every problem—racial, industrial, or individual—that confronts this Nation, and such a citizenship is only possible as the result of adequate and efficient educational facilities.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have listened with interest to the eloquent appeal just made by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] in behalf of the teachers of the public schools in the various States. No one can differ with the statements which he has made that the school-teachers of the United States have been inadequately compensated. No words of eulogy are superfluous which describe the importance of the teachers' work and the great obligations of the people to the teachers for their splendid services.

The founders of this Republic were greatly interested in education. When the Colonies were formed provision was made for education, notwithstanding the vicissitudes and hardships incident to the founding of Commonwealths in the New World. The paramount importance of education was always in the minds of the American people. Indeed, the fathers of this Republic conceived that liberty could not endure except among an enlightened and progressive people. Wherever the pioneer has gone in the building of the New World the schoolhouse and the church immediately followed. No doubt the record shows that in many instances communities made provision for the education of their children before they had suitably cared for their pressing necessities.

The record of the States along educational lines is one of which every American should be proud. Even the States whose population is insignificant and whose wealth is unimportant have ungrudgingly submitted to heavy taxation for the maintenance of a high standard of education. No State, however great its wealth, can claim marked superiority over other States in the splendid rivalry existing for educational and intellectual advancement. The people have felt that the safety of the Nation rested upon the intelligence of their inhabitants and have sought to spread the knowledge that the intellectual leaders of the world possessed.

Every great movement is not uniform in all sections. One Commonwealth will be interested in some important social problem and make greater progress in its solution within a given period than other Commonwealths; and they, in turn, will within a like period give greater emphasis to some moral movement or some educational reform. But it may be said without successful contradiction that the general movement along educational lines and intellectual progress and development throughout the United States has been persistent and its results have been of the highest and most gratifying character. The States have a pride in their schools and in all movements leading to a higher standard of civilization. They can be trusted to do their duty and to carry forward the cause of education. They are not beggars and are not dependent upon the Federal Government for appropriations to support their schools and colleges.

The war brought profound disturbances to our social and economic structure. Dislocations in business, in trades, and in all avenues of human activity and endeavor resulted, and situations which call for relief and conditions demanding amelioration have been and are being brought to the attention of communities and States. We have not always approached the consideration of these questions and problems with that calm and temperate attitude that should characterize the peoples of the mighty Commonwealths within this Republic. There have been evidences of hysteria and unwarranted and dangerous emotionalism. There have been many fadists and extremists who have had impractical and chimerical schemes to meet evils existent and fanciful evils for which no basis is to be found. One of the most characteristic manifestations of the distemper of the people was found, and it still persists, in the contention that the Government, and by that I mean the Federal Government, can cure all political, social, and economic infirmities and ailments.

There have been too many charlatans and quacks who have sought to administer governmental nostrums as a palliative, if not a permanent remedy, for the inequalities and evils and mistakes found to exist in various parts of the land. It is somewhat remarkable that in a Republic such as ours, with the history and traditions of the past and with the unmistakable lessons which the past has taught, there should be so large a number who accept the dangerous and destructive view of the autocrats and bureaucrats of the past, whose remedy for all the ills of the world was the assertion of greater power by rulers and the creation of more governmental agencies with augmented power and authority.

Accordingly a multitude of good Americans, particularly since the war, have turned to the Federal Government and insisted that it usurp the rights of the people and the powers and functions of the States. The movement seems to be to destroy the States and build up a consolidated and centralized Federal Government. This movement also disregards the Constitution and the limitations and restrictions therein contained. It seeks the destruction of local self-government and aims at the consummation of an absorptive policy which merges States into a consolidated National Government, unhampered, unrestrained, unlimited in its power and authority. It is alleged that the Great War was waged among other things to secure the right of communities to govern themselves, and to prevent the triumph of these consolidating forces which merge commonwealths into one hugh autocratic and centralized government, and force people of different races and nationalities into one devouring social and political organism. We profess devotion to the theory of the right of self-determination, and proclaim that the happiness of the people would best be promoted by permitting the organization of small States, particularly where ethnic and geographic lines were favorable to such end.

But we are now met with a reverse movement in our own land. Communities are to be swallowed up in more powerful political organizations, and States are to be overwhelmed in the great tidal movement which carries all the interests of the people and of the States into one voracious and destructive Frankenstein. There was a time when the States gloried in their independence. They were "sovereign" States and exercised the powers of sovereigns. They had granted by the Constitution some of their sovereignty to the Federal Government and constituted it their agent and servant with respect to certain national and international concerns. But in their domestic and internal and local affairs and problems they were nations; they were republics; they were clothed with the power and dignity and honors of sovereign and indestructible States. They assumed with pride the responsibility that devolved upon independent and sovereign States. The police powers were jealously guarded. They regarded with suspicion any encroachment by the Federal Government upon their sovereignty. Each State had its own history, its own characteristics, interests, and eccentricities, and felt that while it was a part of the Federal Union it nevertheless was not to be merged into a collodial mass, losing its identity and its freedom and independence and its high station. The manifold differences among the States made for strength and progress. Uniformity does not necessarily mean advancement. The law of progress is correlated with the law of variation.

These observations are germane to the subject discussed by the Senator from Missouri. There is a propaganda, nation wide, to further weaken the States by transferring to the Federal Government the duty and responsibility resting upon the States of educating all within their borders. It is unquestionably the attribute of a sovereign State to provide the educational system for its inhabitants. It is an invasion of the rights of the States to have some other Government superimpose its educational system upon the people therein or control in any manner the action of such States in relation to the subject.

Certain officials of the Government are engaged in an effort to establish a department of education and to bring under the control of this department the entire educational system of all of the States. Appeals are made to the teachers throughout the land, that if the Federal Government take control of education their salaries will be increased and the educational system will be greatly improved. Of course, I deny the right of the Federal Government to take over the educational systems of the States. It is not its function, and such a plan would be a dangerous assault upon the States and in the end would be an impairment of the freedom of the people.

It is an enticing picture to place before the people and before the teachers, wherein the States are promised large sums of money from the Federal Treasury for educational purposes. It is appealing to many, and they willingly extend their hands for the gratuity. They do not stop to think that before the Federal Government can make appropriations to the States for educational or any other purpose it must reach out its powerful hand and by exercising its taxing power take money from the pockets of the people within the States. They do not pause to reflect that thousands and tens of thousands of Federal employees would be required to gather the taxes and then to expend them within the States. They close their eyes to the evils of departmental government and the dangers flowing from a bureaucracy which is already a menace to the Republic. Bureaus have so multiplied and Federal officials have so increased that even now it can be asserted that this is a bureaucratic Government.

Those who approve this plan do not stop to consider what the effect of such a precedent may be, and refuse to perceive that if the Federal Government may control the education within the States and take over these domestic and local powers it may and doubtless will extend its power to still greater lengths, so that in the end there will be no "indestructible States of an indestructible Union," but an autocratic, tyrannous, paternalistic Government functioning at Washington, with a thousand arms extending to the confines of every precinct and community, and asserting its authority and power over individuals and political subdivisions and States throughout the land.

Of course, we all agree that the work of the teacher is of supreme importance; that his mission is of the highest character, and his influence and service essential to the progress of the people. I have felt for many years that the teachers were not sufficiently appreciated and the importance of their calling not fully understood. It has been my pleasure to advocate upon many occasions important increases in compensation for teachers.

I have no doubt but that the people of the United States will address themselves with increased interest to the question of education and to the compensation of teachers.

While it is true that teachers have not been sufficiently paid, so it may be said of some other professions. A few years ago I remember reading that the annual earnings of the lawyers of the United States averaged less than $700 per capita, and it is a notorious fact that the preachers of the United States have been paid even less than lawyers and teachers. Persons engaged in clerical work and in many other important vocations have received but meager salaries.

I have sometimes thought that we are laying too much emphasis upon the question of wages, as if high wages would prove a sure cure for all the evils that now exist. Statements are constantly made that people are leaving their positions in every profession and calling and industry, and entering into some other line of employment, because of the small compensation received. I have no doubt that in many business enterprises, where the profits demand that higher salaries be paid, great injustices are perpetrated upon the employees. In many industries profits are enormous and large salaries are paid, and there is a marked shifting by employees from one industry to another. This condition always follows a great war, and is sure to become more acute where there has been a conflict of such tremendous consequences as the World War through which we have just passed. There is no doubt but what wages have been unequal and that there have been inequalities in compensation which can not be justified. Teachers must be paid more. And there is no doubt but what their just demands will be recognized by the people within the various States.

But because there are inequalities in compensation and because some trades and industries pay large salaries, while others pay too little, that does not justify Federal control or Federal intervention. Because one State may be richer than another is no reason why the sovereignty of that State should be attacked, or the power of the Federal Government be increased by an encroachment upon the States or the reserved powers residing within the people. The Senator has referred to the fact that the hod carrier receives $7 or $8 per day. I have no doubt that wages of persons engaged in the building trades have been much greater than the salaries of most teachers, and certainly they have greatly exceeded the compensation paid the clerical help and those engaged in other useful and indispensable pursuits. I want to add, however, that the day is at hand when the man who labors with his hands must be accorded greater recognition in the economic, social, and political life of the communities and States than he has heretofore received. It may be that some who belong to the professional class or the so-called capitalistic class have attempted to arrogate to themselves a superiority over the "man with the hoe" and the toiler, whose bent form is a protest against injustices. But in this Republic there is political equality, and there must be no social gulfs created based upon professions or callings or trades or character of labor. The man with the trowel or the plane, the man who builds and toils and labors for the production of the commodities which sustain life, must be accorded a high place in our industrial, political, and social organism. There must be more democracy, more equality, more fraternity, more of the genuine spirit of Christian brotherhood.

Mr. President, I join with the Senator in his eloquent tribute to the work of the teacher, and so far as I have any influence I shall exert it among the people within the States in behalf of the teachers and their further advancement and welfare. But I sound a note of warning against the consolidating tendencies of the hour, against the nation-wide propaganda to atrophy the States and to cause to be surrendered to an omniverous and centralizing power the functions and responsibilities and obligations which under our dual form of Government rest, and properly rest, upon the States and upon the people within the States.

JOINT POSTAL COMMISSION.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, to-day the Joint Postal Commission completed its labors, and work has now begun in the preparation of a report and a bill.

So many inquiries have come to me in the last few days about this report, and so many demands for immediate action, that I feel that I ought to say that the commission this morning agreed to recommend that whenever the bill shall pass, whether before July 1, 1920, or after, the new schedule of salaries shall go into effect as of date July 1, 1920. Of course, Mr. President, I agreed to that resolution of the committee, and at the same time I insisted that the recommendations of the commission should be reported out immediately and that they should be considered before any recess or adjournment. I understand that the Republican steering committee has not put this legislation on its program to be acted on before a recess shall be taken. In this I think the steering committee has made an error and one that I hope it will correct. We Democrats are not only willing but desirous of having action before any recess is taken, and I shall insist that action be not delayed. A very great injustice is being done these employees of the Government, an injustice that should be corrected without further delay.

I want to say if action is not had it will not be the fault of the commission, but the fault of the Republican managers. The members of the commission have worked early and late on this matter. They have postponed other important duties, they have made personal sacrifices, to expedite this work. It has proved a tremendous task, and it is hoped and believed that the work will be satisfactory to the employees and to the Government. I hope the Republican steering committee will reconsider its action and include this legislation in its prerecess program.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Tennessee when the bill to which he refers was introduced?

Mr. McKELLAR. The bill has not been introduced.

Mr. SMOOT. Yet the Senator is complaining that the Republican steering committee has not acted upon it.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think the Republican steering committee ought to have included the proposed legislation in its program, because it has been known for quite a while that the Joint Postal Commission had about completed its work, and there is no reason in the world why it should not be acted upon.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me this is the smallest, cheapest example of petty politics that I have ever seen brought before the Senate, that a bill should be included for consideration that has not even been introduced in the Senate in connection with a subject that was before a commission and about which nobody knows whether the commission will report on it by June 5 or before the Senate shall adjourn or take a recess.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let me ask the Senator how long the commission has had the matter under consideration?

Mr. SMOOT. I do not know just the number of months.

Mr. McKELLAR. The commission had the matter under consideration for several months. The task was a large one; the questions involved have been gone into carefully, accurately, and vigorously, and the commission is ready to report its conclusions to the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. Is it a unanimous recommendation?

Mr. McKELLAR. The report is unanimous. Mr. President, it has been stated on the floor time and time again that the legislation proposed by the Joint Postal Commission should be acted upon, and yet there has been no arrangement for it, and I think the steering committee ought to have included it in its program.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. McNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Tennessee yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield the floor. I have said all I desire to say about the matter.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask the Senator from Tennessee whether he is a member of that commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. I am a member of that commission.

Mr. SPENCER. And do I understand from the Senator from Tennessee that the commission of which he is a member has not yet reported?

Mr. McKELLAR. It has not yet reported, but its report is ready.

Mr. SPENCER. Do I understand that the Senator from Tennessee is criticizing because no action is taken in regard to a report that it has not yet made to the Senate?

Mr. McKELLAR. I do. I say that the steering committee ought to have included this particular legislation, which everybody concedes should be passed, in its program for action before a recess.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, if this report is ready, as the Senator says, why does he not put it in?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator will have to ask his colleagues on the commission. One of his colleagues is chairman of the commission.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee was so anxious to make the announcement that the commission had concluded its labors that he could not wait for the chairman of the commission to report. I think I have written 500 letters to all parts of this United States, in which I have assured the writers of the letters I was answering that the commission was doing everything in its power to bring the hearings to a conclusion, and that I knew from the expression of every one on the commission to whom I had spoken that the commission would make a report just as soon as possible, and I had not any doubt but that legislation would be passed in conformity with the recommendations of the commission.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why not put it on the program, then?

Mr. SMOOT. So far as a program is concerned, there is no program, and if there was it would be foolish to include something not before the Senate.

Mr. McKELLAR. I go by the papers, which say that there is a program, and I have heard every Senator say that there is. I remember a complaint of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] that his bill was not on the program. He said so here. I take his word for it.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I ask the distinguished Senator from Tennessee who is the chairman of that commission?

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING].

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I do not think we need be very much disturbed about this situation. The most eloquent portion of the speech of the Senator from Tennessee is the phrase "we Democrats."

Mr. McKELLAR. I did not hear what the Senator said.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is not worth repeating.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think not.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bill and joint resolutions:

H. R. 12626. An act for the relief of certain persons to whom, or their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands along the Snake River in the State of Idaho under an erroneous survey made in 1883;

S. J. Res. 189. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases; and

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution repealing the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and Germany, and the joint resolution of December 7, 1917, declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and the Austro-Hungarian Government.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. GRONNA. I ask the Senator from New York if he will kindly allow the appropriation bill to be laid aside temporarily so that I may submit a conference report. If any debate should develop, I agree not to press it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection under those conditions, Mr. President.

Mr. GRONNA. I am directed by the conferees on the part of the Senate to submit a conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill.

The conference report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 249, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert: "Provided, That the amendments relating to cotton provided for in section 6 of the act known as the wheat guaranty act approved March 4, 1919, are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On the amendment of the Senate numbered 93 the committee of conference have been unable to agree.

A. J. GRONNA,
G. W. NORRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
GORDON LEE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. GRONNA. I will state that the House conferees receded from amendment numbered 116, the grazing amendment. The Senate conferees receded from amendment numbered 249, the Comer cotton amendment, with an amendment making the present law a permanent law. On the free-seed amendment numbered 93 we were unable to agree. I ask that the Senate agree to the conference report, and I will then move that the Senate further insist upon amendment numbered 93 and that the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. GRONNA. I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendment numbered 93, on which the committee of conference have been unable to agree, request a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Presiding Officer appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. GORE conferees at the further conference on the part of the Senate.

COMMISSION ON THE RACIAL QUESTION.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I have introduced for the consideration of the Senate a bill known as S. 4267, which is now before the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be incorporated in what I am about to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it will be so ordered.

The bill (S. 4267) introduced by Mr. SPENCER April 21, 1920, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That a commission of nine persons, citizens of the United States, be, and is hereby, created to be known and designated as the Commission on the Racial Question in the United States of America.

The commission shall be composed of three white men from the South, three white men from the North, and three colored men.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall be divided into three groups of three men in each group, two white and one colored; that the term of the first group shall be for one year, the second group for two years, and the third group for three years.

SEC. 3. That the commission shall have authority to inquire into and thoroughly investigate the conditions surrounding the colored people in the United States, ascertain, if possible, the cause of the unrest among them, and, if there be racial friction, the cause of the same, and to suggest such remedies as they may deem best calculated to relieve the situation and to bring about harmonious relations between white and colored Americans.

They shall have power to send for persons and papers, administer oaths and affirmations, employ experts, and, when necessary, travel from place to place in order to ascertain the true conditions affecting the interests of the colored people in different sections of the United States.

SEC. 4. That the expense of the commission shall not exceed the sum of $50,000 for any one fiscal year; to include compensation of the commissioners when engaged in actual service of the commission not exceeding $15 per day; rental of quarters if not otherwise provided for; traveling expenses; clerk hire, and all other necessary expenses connected with the work of the commission.

The expenses of each commissioner, when in active service of the commission, shall not exceed the sum of $7 per diem.

SEC. 5. That the commission shall report to Congress, at the beginning of each session in December, the findings of the commission for the year in which the report is made, and shall also give an itemized account of the expense of the commission during that year.

SEC. 6. That the commission shall have the power to fix the compensation of a secretary, not exceeding $3,600 per year, and to make rules governing the procedure and workings of the commission.

SEC. 7. That the commission shall be under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, who shall approve all drafts upon the Treasury, made by the authority of the commission, before they are allowed.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, this bill relates to one of the emergency problems with which our country has to do, one that involves alike our national welfare and that fundamental justice which has so signally characterized our history.

There are approximately 12,000,000 of the negro race in the United States. In mere numbers, as in efficiency and patriotism, they are an essential part of American life. In some parts of the Union they outnumber the white race. The absolute necessity of mutual confidence and understanding and cooperation between the white race and the colored race needs only to be stated in order to be at once recognized by both alike.

The fundamental basis upon which the race question must be considered and determined is that the colored man of the United States is a citizen precisely as the white man of the United States is a citizen. Each is an American; each has proved his loyalty to the principles for which our flag stands; each has fought its battles and shared in its victories; and each is entitled to the equal protection of the law in his life, in his property, and in his liberty. Any attempt to deny this equal right before the law is more of a disgrace to those who attempt it than it is to those who suffer by it.

On December 18, 1865, there was finally adopted the thirteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provided that—

> Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.
> Congress shall have power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

The first State to ratify this amendment was the Republican State of Illinois, which ratified it on the same day on which it was submitted to the States by Congress—February 1, 1865—and there followed in rapid succession a number of Republican States. The last State to ratify it was Georgia, on December 9, 1865, though six States ratified it after it had become a part of the Constitution.

THE NEGRO AS THE OWNER OF PROPERTY.

Since that time the negroes of the United States have acquired property worth more than $1,000,000,000.

They have acquired lands exceeding 21,000,000 acres, an area greater than the entire State of South Carolina, and cultivate an equal amount in addition, owning or renting approximately two-thirds of the cultivated land of the South. The 50 years of progress of the negro race in the United States has surpassed any progress under any like circumstances in the history of the world.

When the Russian serfs were emancipated in 1861, they had in 50 years accumulated approximately $36 for each individual, amounting in the aggregate to perhaps a half a billion dollars. The negroes, in the first 50 years of their freedom, acquired nearly double that amount—$70 for each individual, with an aggregate of $700,000,000.

The real estate which the negro has acquired is a permanent investment.

The negro is a home-acquiring race. The census of 1910 shows that 506,590 homes were owned by negroes, of which 221,535 were farm houses and 285,055 were homes in the city.

The census of 1920, following the same ratio as in previous years, will undoubtedly show more than 600,000 homes owned by negroes.

The negro has established more than 50,000 successful business enterprises. One hundred insurance companies are owned by negroes. Banks doing an annual business of $20,000,000 and with a capitalization of nearly $2,000,000 mark their activity in finance.

THE NEGRO IN WAR.

In the war, of men selected by the draft, 74.60 per cent of the negroes were accepted, and 69.71 per cent of the whites were accepted. The first soldiers of the American Army decorated for bravery were two negroes, Henry Johnson and Needham Roberts, of the Three hundred and sixty-ninth Infantry, which was formerly the Fifteenth New York National Guard.

Four whole negro regiments, the Three hundred and sixty-ninth, Three hundred and seventieth, Three hundred and seventy-first, and the Three hundred and seventy-second, and the First Battalion of another negro regiment, the Three hundred and sixty-seventh, were awarded the croix de guerre for heroism in action. In addition, there were some 400 individual medals of honor granted to negroes for bravery in action. This statement, made by Robert R. Moton, principal of Tuskegee Institute, at the American Sociological Congress, in May, 1920, gives striking evidence of the patriotism and loyalty which has so nobly characterized this part of our citizenship.

The negroes provided $225,000,000 for Liberty loan and war-work activities. There was a contribution of $100,000 by a wealthy negro farmer, David R. Raines, of Louisiana. There was one contribution of 15 cents, which was the entire worldly wealth of Gilbert Denham, an 87-year-old negro of Greenville, Ala.

Three hundred thousand negroes, with cheerfulness and efficiency and with songs and laughter, worked long hours and oftentimes in mud up to their knees as stevedores, unloading and transmitting supplies and ammunition without which the American Army could not have existed.

THE NEGRO IN EDUCATIONAL AND PROFESSIONAL LIFE.

In education, 300 counties are employing colored supervising industrial teachers with an annual pay roll of $292,752 fitting teachers to take care of the small country school.

In 1910 there were 29,727 negro teachers, 34,962 negro ministers, 3,409 physicians and surgeons, 478 dentists, and 7,056 in other occupations, making a total of over 70,000 in professional life. To-day more than 40,000 teachers are presiding over schools, in which 2,000,000 negro children are enrolled.

In the ministry their eloquence in the preaching of their gospel and their fidelity to the exacting duties of this high office is perhaps best illustrated by the confidence and reverence of the constantly increasing number to whom they minister. More than $68,000,000 have been, with much sacrifice, invested in permanent church property.

In law every large community recognizes and appreciates the existence and the exceeding helpfulness in the administration of the law of the negro lawyer who with the years acquires greater confidence and cooperation in the profession.

In medicine, not alone in the general practice among their race in the alleviation of the suffering and the remedying of disease and injury, but as well in the fields of research and medical literature the negro has taken a place of prominence almost incredible in its importance when it is remembered the comparatively short time in which this as well as other avenues of professional life have been freely and fully opened to him.

More than 1,000 patents have issued to him and speak with no uncertainty of his part in that inventive genius which has so conspicuously been manifested in the history of our country.

Five hundred newspapers and periodicals are edited and published by negroes in an ever-enlarging determination to keep their race informed of current events and of governmental and general principles with which every citizen ought to be familiar.

The race problem is no more the negro problem than it is the white man's problem. It affects both alike, and upon its right solution depends the welfare of each race, as well as in no small degree the stability of our Nation. It is not the problem of the South any more than it is the problem of the North. The mere fact that a large majority of the colored population of the country live in the South does not in any sense make it a southern problem.

If disease and lawlessness and ignorance are allowed to exist in one part of the country, its contagion will rapidly spread to all parts of the country. No section of the United States can permit a recognized wrong to exist without affecting the whole Nation as well as itself.

Every time a negro is treated unjustly, precisely as is true when a white man is treated unjustly, it affects the whole body politic, and if that injustice spreads and becomes a habit, it presents a serious national problem.

The inequality in the provision for the education of the two races in some sections of the country is appalling. In 1911 and 1912 the figures which I have been able to obtain indicate that the average amount spent in the South for education of children between the ages of 6 and 14 was $10.32 for white children and $2.89 for black children. The greatest discrepancy was in Louisiana, where $13.73 was spent for every white child and only $1.31 for each black child.

The report of the United States Commissioner of Education for 1916 shows that 87.2 per cent of the amount spent for agricultural and vocational training in the South was used for white men, and but 12.8 per cent to increase the working efficiency of the negro.

The result in illiteracy is to be expected; 48.4 per cent of the colored population is illiterate, against 14.4 per cent of illiteracy among the white population, and yet in the half century just past the general per cent of illiteracy among the negro race in the United States has been reduced from 95 per cent to about 30 per cent.

Education, fair labor conditions, and full opportunity for personal development, together with condemnation and prevention of lynching, protection of the home, and of the ballot are the fair demands of the negro.

The same method of reformation and opportunity should be opened to the younger colored boy and girl, who offends for the first time against the law, as is open to the white boy or girl under similar circumstances.

Equality of opportunity, equality before the law, equality in the sight of God, and not equality in social relationship, is the demand and the right of the colored man.

The intelligent colored man is as much determined to preserve the integrity of his race as is the intelligent white man.

Undoubtedly there are radical, hate-engendered utterances made by colored men in the excitement of race discrimination, but they are no more indicative of the sentiment of the great body of the negro people than are the same kind of utterances of which we read with indignation and anxiety when uttered by white men. There must be a recognition of the rights of the colored man as a condition to the fair and permanent solution of the race question.

The church, the school, the development of industrial and agricultural life, the playgrounds for colored children, and the legitimate recreations for colored adults are factors neither to be overlooked nor hampered.

As Bishop Calloway once stated:

> The race question is not a question for small politicians, but for broad-minded patriotic statesmen. It is not for theorists, but for clear-visioned humanitarians. All our dealings with the negro should be in the spirit of the Man of Galilee.

The race question is not a political question; it is an American question.

The railroads have no more right to furnish to negro patrons at precisely the same cost per mile of travel accommodations of an inferior quality than that which they furnish to a white man than the grocer or druggist has to furnish to the colored man at precisely the same price an inferior article to that which he sells to the white man. Equal accommodation, not joint use of cars, is the demand.

The colored boy has precisely the same right to an education that the white boy has.

His treatment in the courts, both by trial and by punishment, ought to be influenced alone by the same considerations as are used in connection with the trial and punishment of white men.

There is a need and a place for the colored man on the farm, in the shop, in the school. There is a need of the colored doctor, the colored lawyer, the colored minister, the colored teacher, the colored professional man in every vocation of life precisely as there is a need of white men in similar occupations.

You can not make the white man happy by making the negro unhappy, nor can you safeguard the virtue of one race by destroying the virtue of another. You can not deal unjustly with the black man without an equally deteriorating effect upon the white man.

The negro is essentially religious and patriotic and in these two approaches is the path to the solution of the race question. There is equality in the sight of God and there is equality before the law, and neither of these opens the door in the slightest way to an impairment of the integrity of either the white or the colored race.

The colored man has a pride in his race, in its history, and in its achievement, and a hope and confidence for its future which is, and by right ought to be, the equal of the pride of the white man in his race and in the hope of its future.

Brute force or superiority in numbers furnishes no basis for a violation of the rights of the weak or of the minority. We must consider the negro as an American, with constitutional guaranties of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, precisely equal to those same guaranties in the case of the white man.

Punishment for wrongdoing ought to be as prompt and severe with the colored wrongdoer as with the white wrongdoer, but there is no justification either in history or in result for lawless punishment of either white or black any more than there is any justification for either a direct or a camouflaged violation of the constitutional right which the colored man has to vote and to have his vote counted.

If the colored man is deemed worthy to carry a rifle in the defense of his country and to risk his life for the honor of his nation, who shall say that he is unworthy to cast a ballot in the government of that nation whose life he has helped to preserve?

These principles lie at the foundation of the consideration and determination of the racial question in the Nation. It is a question that must be settled, and it must be settled right.

More than 1 out of every 10 in the United States is a colored individual, and every reason of national welfare demands a fair, sane consideration of the question. It is useless to close our eyes to the fact that there is a widespread feeling of discontent and of hatred in the hearts of the colored citizens of the United States. Much of this is occasioned by misunderstanding; some of it is entirely well founded.

The question can never be adequately solved without representation of the white man of the South in its solution. The white man of the South has been longest identified with the colored man, is more familiar with his characteristics, and when he approaches the solution of the question, apart from prejudice, he is apt to propose the wisest and sanest plan.

In any body that deals with the question there must, of course, be the representatives of the colored race itself. By every right of representation, by every recognition of educational advancement, by every reason of common fairness they should and they must have a part in the consideration and determination of the question which has to do with their own race.

The white man of the North, while lacking in experience in the question, has the advantage of a certain impartiality, and the combination of the white man of the South and the white man of the North and the colored man produces the commission which ought to consider this question. It is precisely such a commission that is provided for in the Senate bill.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13587) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. EDGE. Mr. President, in connection with the point of order that I have raised covering a portion of the amendment on page 33, I have conferred with the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and desire to suggest adding to the amendment certain words which I believe will meet in great part the objection that I have had. The suggestion that I have made, I believe, meets with the chairman's approval.

On page 33, line 18, after the word "the," I move to amend by inserting the word "joint," so that it will read "That in the joint discretion." On the same line, after the word "War," I move to insert the words "and chairman of the Shipping Board," which will make the clause read:

Provided further, That in the joint discretion of the Secretary of War and chairman of the Shipping Board, and when space is available—

And so forth. My object in that is very obvious. I believe that we should encourage cooperation between departments, especially when they are apparently, as provided in this section, engaged in similar and cognate responsibilities.

I believe that the objection I made will be obviated if the Secretary of War confers with the chairman of the Shipping Board, because if the Shipping Board are conducting a service there that is adequate he will make it known. If not I have no objection whatever to having the Transport Service of the United States furnish any service that may be lacking. I wish to repeat, however, that I am fundamentally opposed to the Government entering into business that can be taken care of by the private business interests of our country.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 33, line 18, in the committee amendment, before the word "discretion," it is proposed to insert the word "joint," and after the word "war" it is proposed to insert the words "and chairman of the Shipping Board."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDGE. Now, Mr. President, I withdraw the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is withdrawn. The question is on the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, I send to the desk, in order that it may be printed, an amendment which I propose to offer to the bill now under consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be printed and lie on the table. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was of the Committee on Military Affairs, under the subhead of "Clothing and camp and garrison equipage," on page 35, line 8, after the words "due to," to insert "warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service and to," and in line 21, after the word "exceeding," to strike out "$25" and insert "$40," so as to make the clause read:

For cloth, woolens, materials, and for the purchase and manufacture of clothing for the Army, including retired enlisted men when ordered to active duty; for members of the Reserve Officers' Training Corps; for issue and for sale at cost price according to the Army regulations; for payment for clothing not drawn due to warrant officers of the Mine Planter Service and to enlisted men on discharge; for altering and fitting clothing and washing and cleaning when necessary; for equipment and repair of equipment of laundries, dry-cleaning plants, salvage and sorting storehouses, hat repairing shops, shoe repair shops, clothing repair shops, and garbage reduction works; for equipage, including authorised issues of toilet articles, barbers' and tailors' materials, for use of general prisoners confined at military posts without pay or allowances and applicants for enlistment while held under observation; issue of toilet kits to recruits upon their first enlistment, and issue of housewives to the Army; for expenses of packing and handling and similar necessaries; for a suit of citizen's outer clothing, to cost not exceeding $40, to be issued to each soldier discharged otherwise than honorably; to each enlisted man convicted by civil court for an offense resulting in confinement in a penitentiary or other civil prison; and to each enlisted man ordered interned by reason of the fact that he is an alien enemy, or, for the same reason, discharged without internment; for indemnity to officers and men of the Army for clothing and bedding, etc., destroyed since April 22, 1898, by order of medical officers of the Army for sanitary reasons, $19,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, after line 6, to insert:

That all the money hereinbefore designated under the titles "Subsistence of the Army," "Regular supplies, Quartermaster Corps," "Incidental expenses, Quartermaster Corps," "Transportation of the Army and its supplies," "Water and sewers at military posts," "Clothing and camp and garrison equipage" shall be disbursed and accounted for as "General appropriations, Quartermaster Corps," and for that purpose shall constitute one fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Horses for Cavalry, Artillery, Engineers," etc., on page 37, line 9, before the words "a maximum," to strike out "at" and insert "within," so as to read:

For the purchase of horses of ages, sex, and size as may be prescribed by the Secretary of War for remounts for officers entitled to public mounts for the Cavalry, Artillery, Signal Corps, and Engineers, the United States Military Academy, service schools, and staff colleges, and for the Indian Scouts, and for such Infantry and members of the Medical Department in field campaigns as may be required to be mounted, and the expenses incident thereto, $1,500,000; Provided, That the number of horses purchased under this appropriation, added to the number now on hand, shall be limited to the actual needs of the mounted service, including reasonable provisions for remounts, and unless otherwise ordered by the Secretary of War, no part of this appropriation shall be paid out for horses not purchased by contract after competition duly invited by the Quartermaster Corps and an inspection under the direction and authority of the Secretary of War. When practicable, horses shall be purchased in open market at all military posts or stations, when needed, within a maximum price to be fixed by the Secretary of War.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Barracks and quarters," on page 39, line 17, after the words "United States," to strike out "$10,000,000" and insert "$7,500,000," so as to read:

For barracks, quarters, stables, storehouses, magazines, administration and office buildings, sheds, shops, and other buildings necessary for the shelter of troops, public animals, and stores, and for administration purposes, except those pertaining to the Coast Artillery; for construction or reclamation plants; for constructing and repairing public buildings at military posts; for hire of employees; for rental of the authorized allowance of quarters for officers, including members of the Officers' Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty, on duty with the troops at posts and stations where no public quarters are available; of barracks or authorized allowance of quarters for noncommissioned officers and enlisted men, men on duty where public quarters are not available, including enlisted men of the Regular Army Reserve, retired enlisted men, and members of the enlisted Reserve Corps when ordered to active duty; for grounds for cantonments, camp sites, and other military purposes, and for buildings or portions of buildings for occupation by troops, for use as stables, storehouses, and offices, and for other military purposes; for the hire of recruiting stations and lodgings for recruits; for such furniture for the public rooms of officers' messes and for officers' quarters at military posts as may be approved by the Secretary of War; for wall lockers in permanent barracks and refrigerators in barracks and quarters; for screen doors, window screens, storm doors and sash, and window shades for barracks, offices and quarters, and for flooring and framing for tents, and for the National Guard when called or drafted into the service of the United States, $7,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 39, line 17, after the figures "$7,500,000," to strike out the following provisio: "Provided, That not to exceed the following sums may be used in the erection and completion of buildings enumerated at the places named—$404,256 for motor-training school buildings at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.; $600,000 for construction of officers' and noncommissioned officers' quarters, and the repair and remodeling of such existing buildings as may be available for such quarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kans."

Mr. CURTIS. I ask that the amendment striking out the proviso on page 39 may be passed over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Military post exchanges," on page 41, line 3, after the words "Secretary of War," to strike out "$400,000" and insert "$600,000," and in the same line, after "$600,000," to strike out "Provided, That of the unexpended balance remaining June 3, 1920, allotted to 'Military post exchanges' for continuing the construction, equipment, and manitenance of suitable buildings at military posts and stations for the conduct of the post exchange, school, library, reading, lunch, amusement rooms, and gymnasium under an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1919, approved July 9, 1918, there is hereby reappropriated and made available until June 30, 1921, for the completion of a Liberty theater at Camp Knox, Ky., the sum of $78,000," so as to make the clause read:

For continuing the construction, equipment, and maintenance of suitable buildings at military posts and stations for the conduct of the post exchange, school, library, reading, lunch, amusement rooms, and gymnasium, including repairs to buildings erected at private cost, in the operation of the act approved May 31, 1902, for the rental of films, purchase of slides, supplies for and making repairs to moving-picture outfits and for similar and other recreational purposes at training and mobilization camps now established, or which may be hereafter established, and for such purposes not enumerated above as the Secretary of War may deem advisable, to be expended in the discretion and under the direction of the Secretary of War, $600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Barracks and quarters, Philippine Islands," on page 41, line 23, after the word "China," to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$300,000," so as to make the clause read:

Mr. REED. Mr. President, by the courtesy of the chairman of the committee I am permitted to interrupt and offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is proposed by the Senator from Missouri to insert at the end of the bill the following:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay to Blanche Winters, widow of Charles F. Winters, of Kansas City, State of Missouri, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000 as compensation and relief for the loss, by death, on January 11, 1918, at Camp Funston, in the State of Kansas, of her husband, Charles F. Winters, who, while engaged in the discharge of his duty, in conducting the camp bank at Camp Funston, in the State of Kansas, and in protecting the money and funds of the Government of the United States of America and of the soldiers of the United States Army, was killed by Louis R. Whistler, a commissioned officer and captain of Company E, Three hundred and fifty-fourth Infantry Regiment, Eighty-ninth Division, of the Army of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I ask the Senator from Missouri whether it is intended that the amendment shall carry a $25,000 appropriation?

Mr. REED. It ought to do so; but if the chairman of the committee thinks that is too large I am so anxious to get something for this widow that if he suggests a reduction I will accept it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The matter might be adjusted in conference. I would suggest $15,000 instead of $25,000.

Mr. REED. If the Senator suggests $15,000, it may go at that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be so modified.

The next amendment was, on page 75, after line 8, to insert:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Col. William C. Brown, United States Army (retired), to the position and rank of brigadier general on the retired list.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I should like to ask the Senator to state briefly why that amendment with reference to Col. Brown is put in the bill. He is on the retired list now, and the amendment authorizes the President to appoint him a brigadier general on the retired list. Is there any especial reason why that should be done?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I prefer that the Senator from Washington should take that question up with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who is familiar with it. I may say, and I think I ought to say, that a majority of the members of the Senate Military Committee indicated their wish that this amendment be attached to the bill, and the majority rules. I was in the minority, I may say.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I thought there might be some especial reason for the proposed action.

Mr. WADSWORTH. An inference might be drawn from the remarks which I just made which might be unfair to Col. Brown. My remark was not meant to be taken to intimate that Col. Brown's case is not a worthy one. I imagine, so far as special items of private legislation promoting retired Regular officers from one grade to a higher grade are concerned, this is probably one of the most meritorious.

Mr. JONES of Washington. We do not usually attach them to appropriation bills, however, do we?

Mr. WADSWORTH. We do not usually do so; but it has been done. I have never been enthusiastically in favor of such a practice.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, while I know little in regard to the insertion of the amendment, I may say that Col. Brown was in command of the regiment of Cavalry which pursued Villa in connection with the punitive expedition into Mexico. Although I did not propose the amendment, I know from letters which I have received that Gen. Scott, the former Chief of Staff, and others are backing Col. Brown strongly. Of course, he did make that ride of sixty-odd miles with the first regiment on the first day of the expedition; and undoubtedly he was an excellent officer and performed good service as such on the active list.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I warn the Senator from Washington that there are going to be quite a number of such items offered to this bill, and if all go in the bill it will cease to be a military appropriation bill; it will not be even an omnibus bill, but will be a moving van.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what I thought. If we start putting such provisions in this bill, there will be a flood of them not only at this session but hereafter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from New York if it would not be well to let this item go over, allow the Senate to adjourn, and take up the amendments passed over the first thing on Monday morning?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Certainly; I think that would be an excellent proceeding.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. McKELLAR. I was about to make the request that the amendment go over. The Senator from Colorado is not here, and I think it should go over on his account, as he is a member of the committee. I myself am opposed to promoting officers on the retired list, and expect so to vote; but I think it is only fair to the Senator from Colorado that he should be given an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 22, after line 16, it is proposed to insert:

That warrant officers of the Army Mine Planter Service shall receive the same pay and increases as now are or hereafter may be prescribed for warrant officers in the Navy.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, in the bill increasing Army and Navy pay the warrant officers referred to in the amendments were inadvertently omitted, and the amendment merely puts them upon the same basis as other warrant officers.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of the amendment, and so far as it is in my power I accept it on behalf of the committee. Then when it goes to conference any little kink there may be about their pay adjustment can be straightened out.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I inquire if the amendment on page 61 was agreed to with reference to arsenals?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. Would the Senator like to have them go over?

Mr. LENROOT. I would just as lief talk about them now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Wisconsin that they were agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to discuss the amendments to some extent.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Does the Senator desire to discuss them now or on Monday?

Mr. SMOOT. I suggest that they be taken up on Monday. The Senator can ask unanimous consent to reconsider the votes by which they were agreed to.

Mr. LENROOT. I ask unanimous consent that the votes whereby the amendments on page 61 down to line 6, on page 62, were agreed to may be reconsidered and that the amendments go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the votes whereby the amendments were agreed to are reconsidered, and the amendments will be passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have several amendments which I should like to offer, to one of which I should like to call the attention of Senators, because it is of some importance. The others are not so important. On page 6, line 13, after the word "department," I move to insert the word "armies."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. At the end of the same line, after the word "tactical," I move to insert the word "corps."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. On line 22, after the word "districts," I move to insert the word "armies."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Now, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask the Secretary to read. I call the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 34, line 1, after the word "receipts," it is proposed to insert:

Provided further, That authority is hereby granted the Secretary of War to sell or otherwise dispose of in accordance with law and regulations the United States Army transports Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Logan, Buford, Kilpatrick, Crook, and Warren: And provided further, That $2,400,000 of the sum derived from such sale may be used for the purpose of reimbursing the United States Shipping Board for necessary improvements and alterations to the 12 transports now being constructed by the United States Shipping Board for the use of the War Department as permanent transports to replace the aforementioned United States Army transports of which the sale is authorized herein.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, just a word of explanation. I think there will be no objection to the amendment, as the transports named in the amendment are all 20 years old or more. The Government acquired them during the Spanish-American War. I know something about their age and their type, as I have traveled on three of them. They have performed a remarkable service, I may say, but they are worn out, and it costs an extraordinary sum of money to keep them in repair. Every time they finish a long trip there is a big repair bill. They are also out of date.

During the war with Germany the Shipping Board made arrangements with the War Department to include in its shipbuilding program the construction of some modern transports for the Army's use. Those ships—12, I think, in number—are nearly finished. It is proposed in this amendment to sell these old Army transports. They will fetch a reasonably good sum, I think, although they are old, because the demand—at least for ships of their tonnage—is very heavy; and from the proceeds of the sale it is proposed that the War Department shall reimburse the Shipping Board in the amount necessary to complete the new model transports which the Shipping Board is now building for the War Department. I think it is a good business proposition to get rid of those old ships just as soon as possible.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Are they foreign-built ships?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think all, or nearly all, of them are foreign built. I know the Sherman, the Sheridan, and one other are, for they are sister ships, and were built at Belfast, as I happen to remember.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The reason I asked the question is this: In the shipping bill as we passed it there is a provision authorizing the sale of any foreign-built ships owned by the Navy Department; and if after such sale they are owned wholly by citizens of this country they can be used in the coastwise trade. There was no suggestion that the Army had any vessels which they desired to sell; and it occurred to me that it would be wise to put a similar provision in the amendment with reference to the Army transports which it is proposed to sell.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The amendment provides that the transports shall be sold "in accordance with law and regulations."

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, under the law now, if a ship is foreign built, it can not be used in the coastwise trade; and the transports referred to would bring a better price, very likely, if they could be sold with that privilege. Their number is small and they are of comparatively low tonnage; and I think it would be well to put a provision in the bill with reference to them similar to the provision that we adopted with reference to the naval vessels authorizing such ships, when sold and wholly owned by American citizens, to be used in the coastwise trade. I suggest that the amendment go over until Monday.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator believes that without such a provision in the proposed amendment the transports, when sold, could not be used in the coastwise trade?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think not.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know at least three of them were foreign built.

Mr. WARREN. I think that was because America had no shipping in those days.

Mr. WADSWORTH. We certainly had not. They were purchased from the Atlantic Transport Line, and were built at Belfast, Ireland.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the amendment may go over until Monday so that provision may be made as I have indicated, in which event, I think, the ships will bring more money.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Very well, I will not press the amendment. I ask to have it printed and lie on the table, and I shall call it up again.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator in charge of the bill what action was taken on the amendment on page 44, lines 13 to 19?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It was adopted, there having been no objection to it. Does the Senator want to have it go over?

Mr. SHEPPARD. In view of the fact that a similar amendment as to land in Michigan has gone over, I ask that the vote whereby the amendment on page 44 was agreed to be reconsidered, and that the amendment go over.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered, and the amendment will be passed over.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 32 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, May 24, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, May 22, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Edward Lawrence Hunt, pastor of the Roosevelt Church, memorial to America's legions of the World War, offered the following prayer:

Our Father God, fountain of life and truth, from whom are derived all our powers and faculties, bless, we beseech Thee, the labors of Thy servants in this place. Endow them richly with wisdom and courage, with a love of righteousness and truth.

In this exceeding high mountain, with outlook upon all the nations of the earth, when the tempter who came to the Son of Man comes to them with the old mammon temptation, "All these things will I give thee if Thou wilt fall down," may Thy grace be sufficient for them that they may stand with the Son of God as sons of God.

And in the war still raging more alarmingly now than on the battle fields of France—against the spiritual hosts of wickedness in high places—may grace conquer greed; may Calvary conquer Kultur. Lead our Congressmen to victory in this strategic center of the world, as Thou didst lead our boys over there.

In the riches of Thy grace help any who may have fallen down into bondage to mammon to rise and reign with God upon the earth. So may they inspire every citizen in this Kingdom of God to hold fast that which he has (or may have) that no one take his crown of life.

"Great God our King," we thank Thee for giving us a part in making this Government of God a model for the world.

Help these servants of America to but keep God's model safe that other nations may rise from chaos or despotism to take the mold. Help them on earth's highest hill to be faithful to hold high the banner all of whose ample folds are blazing with the holy light of ordered liberty under Thy law—every star shining as the Star of Bethlehem, mankind's morning star of hope, herald of the dawn.

Guide our people to walk and work in its light. So may nations come to our light that Thy way may be known upon earth, Thy saving health among all nations—as Thou dost bless us and cause Thy face to shine upon us in the face of Jesus Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a report of the United States attorney at Portland, Oreg., in the matter of the investigation of the case of Max H. Houser, the district head of the United States Grain Corporation at Portland, Oreg.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is the gentleman prepared to give any other evidence in favor of Mr. Houser than that of the district attorney?

Mr. McARTHUR. Mr. Speaker, I am prepared to give the evidence submitted by the United States attorney to the Department of Justice. It is a very conclusive and complete vindication of Mr. Houser from the unfounded and unwarranted attacks made upon him through the baseless accusations of the Federal grand jury at Spokane. Mr. Houser is one of the leading citizens of my community.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman also put in a few remarks about the great victory for clean government that has just been had in Oregon through the reelection of the distinguished gentleman from Oregon [Mr. McARTHUR] in spite of the vicious and unwarranted fight made there against him?

Mr. McARTHUR. Oh, that is beside the issue.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, how long a document is this?

Mr. McARTHUR. It will occupy about a page and a half in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for not to exceed five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, upon what subject?

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, it is a matter that amounts almost to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. WALSH. I withdraw my reservation of the right to object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, a few weeks ago the Grand Army of the Republic, the Spanish-American War Veterans, and the American Legion extended to me an invitation to make a Memorial Day address on May 31 at Ashtabula, Ohio. I accepted this invitation to be present upon that occasion. The Ashtabula Star-Beacon, which is the paper of that community, published a notice that I would make the memorial address, which was to be held in the cemetery among the graves of the dead heroes. I have here the official organ of the Plumb Plan League, a newspaper called Labor, published here at Washington. In the edition of that paper dated May 22, 1920, I find the following article:

SPEAK GENTLY, BROTHER, THE FUNERAL IS PASSING.

"Not long ago," writes H. E. Hammond, of Ashtabula, Ohio, "Congressman JOHN C. COOPER, of this district, sang his swan song by attacking labor and ignoring his protestations of loyalty. Now, please note that his death as a Representative is to be fittingly observed by an address he is to make in this city this month, in a cemetery among the other dead ones. Mr. COOPER was to make a speech in this city about 30 days ago, but he sounded out this railroad town and it was canceled. It seems that he is not afraid of the cemetery engagement."

Mr. Speaker, if there is one day above all others which has a significance separate and apart from other days, it is Memorial Day, which we have set aside in sacred honor and memory of our soldier dead. [Applause.] And on that day as we gather together and place the wreath and flower upon the graves hallowed by the heroes of a common cause, dedicated and consecrated as a common shrine of American patriotism, no selfish or personal thoughts should disturb us. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention at this time to answer the writer of this letter relative to my work in Congress, but a little later on at a more appropriate time I will answer the statements which he makes.

But, Mr. Speaker, I can not let go by unchallenged the contemptible insult and slur cast upon our brave soldiers who gave their all in order that we might live and enjoy the freedom and privileges we have to-day. [Applause.] I am very sorry, indeed, that a citizen of my district, with almost ghoulish glee, attempts through narrow political prejudice to refer to our honored soldier dead as something of the past, forgotten by all. Surely, Mr. Speaker, no true, patriotic American would get so low down in the mire as to insult and slur our brave boys who gave their all for us.

No, in a sense these brave boys are not dead. Their earthly remains may crumble in the dust, and the flowers upon their graves may bloom and die, but the memory and the spirit of these heroes will ever remain in the hearts of the American people to inspire us to fight on and on for those great cardinal principles for which they sacrificed to the utmost. [Applause.]

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the soldiers' bonus bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks in the RECORD on Memorial Day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

Mr. CARSS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD testimony as to the character of my late friend and colleague, Carl C. Van Dyke.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

There was no objection.

PAY OF ARMY, NAVY, AND MARINE CORPS PERSONNEL.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have stricken from the calendar two bills—H. R. 11731, being 181 on the Union Calendar, together with the report thereon, and S. 3383, 204 on the same calendar, together with the report thereon—and that the bills be laid on the Speaker's table, legislative action having already been taken upon this matter.

Mr. GARD. Let them be reported. I do not know what they are.

Mr. CRAGO. These two bills refer to increased pay for the Army, Navy, and Marine Corps, and the conference report having been adopted and the bill gone to the President and signed by him, I thought it was useless to carry these two bills on the calendar.

Mr. GARD. These bills have been included in legislation which has passed the House—the substance of them?

Mr. CRAGO. The purport of these two bills has been included in that legislation, and it is not likely that either of them will ever be considered again. It is just to clean up the calendar.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request of the gentleman will be granted.

There was no objection.

FEDERAL FARM-LOAN ACT.

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Banking and Currency I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 3897) to amend section 16 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, and that it be put upon its passage, an identical House bill having been reported by the Banking and Currency Committee of the House.

Mr. WALSH. Let it be reported.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moves to take from the Speaker's table S. 3897, a House bill of like tenor having been previously reported from the Commtitee on Banking and Currency. The Clerk will report the bill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 16 of the act of Congress approved July 17, 1916, known as the Federal farm-loan act, be amended by adding thereto the following:

"Any joint-stock land bank organized and doing business under the provisions of this act may go into voluntary liquidation by making provision, to be approved by the Federal Farm Loan Board, for the payment of its liabilities: Provided, That such method of liquidation shall have been duly authorized by a vote of at least two-thirds of the shareholders of such joint-stock land bank at a regular meeting, or at a special meeting called for that purpose, of which at least 10 days' notice in writing shall have been given to stockholder.

"For the purpose of assisting in any such liquidation duly authorized as in the preceding paragraph provided, any Federal land bank may, with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, acquire the assets and assume the liabilities of any joint-stock land bank, and in such transaction may waive the provisions of this act requiring such land bank to acquire its loans only through national farm-loan associations, or agents, and those relating to status of borrower, purposes of loan, and also the limitation as to the amount of individual loans.

"No Federal land bank shall assume the obligations of any joint-stock land bank in such manner as to make its outstanding obligations more than twenty times its capital stock, except by the creation of a special reserve equal to one-twentieth of the amount of such additional obligations assumed."

Mr. PLATT. Mr. Speaker, I do not think any extended debate on this bill is necessary. It was unanimously reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency. It does not require any of these associations to liquidate, but merely gives them an opportunity to do so if they wish to. It supplies a deficiency in the original Federal farm-loan act. The act now contains no provision for voluntary liquidation of the joint-stock land banks.

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. In a hasty reading of the bill I am not able to get correct information about it. I understand the bill has passed the Senate?

Mr. PLATT. It is a Senate bill which has passed the Senate, and an identical bill has been reported by the House committee.

Mr. CANNON. Can a joint-stock bank make any arrangement with the farm-loan bank by which it can rid itself of its liability for the bonds it issues and put that liability upon the Federal farm-loan bank?

Mr. PLATT. This bill gives the Federal land banks authority to take over the assets of a joint-stock land bank.

Mr. CANNON. But when those assets are taken over who would pay the obligations of the joint-stock land bank?

Mr. PLATT. I think it would be considered a corporation in liquidation. The Federal land bank would pay them, but they would be paid out of the assets of the joint-stock bank.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is sure about that?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. This has been submitted to the lawyers of the Federal Farm Loan Board, and they all agree to it, and I think there is no doubt about it. I am satisfied of it.

Mr. CANNON. The assets of the joint-stock bank would be liable for the obligations of that joint-stock bank?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is sure of that?

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I am sure of that.

Mr. CANNON. Without assuming any liability for the Federal land-bank obligations?

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman means without increasing the obligations of the Federal land banks?

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. PLATT. Yes; I think that is a safe statement to make, though if a Federal land bank takes over the assets of a joint-stock bank of course it takes over also the liabilities. There would be an increase in that sense of obligations, but at the same time a greater increase of assets—a profit for the land banks.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield, to allow me to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. Yes.

Mr. WINGO. I do not think the liquidation would relieve the stockholders from the primary obligation, which would be resorted to only in the event that the assets taken over were insufficient to meet the outstanding bonds. Even if they did liquidate the corporation, the stockholders would still be liable, unless the holders of the bonds were to release them.

Mr. CANNON. They would not do that unless they should convert, and take the other bonds.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. CANNON. The reason I make the inquiry is that I am under the impression that there are many joint-stock banks that have been very careful indeed in guarding the security for the bonds that they have issued. Now, one for all and all for one. You get rid of that obligation when the joint-stock bank liquidates. You can not hold them for any shortage there might be, can you?

Mr. WINGO. I think you can. I think it would be like any other corporation going into liquidation. Nobody would be bound by that liquidation except parties to the liquidation. The creditors would not be bound by it unless it was in the form of a court proceeding and they came in and presented their claims.

Mr. CANNON. The owner of a joint-stock bond is now sure of its payment, provided the funds of the joint-stock bank do not go into the general funds of the Federal loan bank proper. I am assuming that he is sure of it.

Mr. WINGO. Here is the situation, I will suggest to the gentleman: The holders of the joint-stock land bank bonds have certain securities; first of all, the farmers' land, upon which a mortgage is given and against which the bonds are issued. Of course, that liability can be enforced against the land if it were not paid off. If they are paid off under the loan itself, to a mathematical certainty, these payments will retire the bonds. If any default should be made, then the farm is liable and there would be a primary liability upon the stockholders of those banks only in the event that the farms should sell for less than the debt, then, of course, the creditors of the corporation could go upon the stockholders to the extent of their capital stock. But unless the holders of the bonds agree or unless the liquidation goes to the court and notice given and they are brought in and submit their claims and the assets are subject to the demands of the claims, then, of course, they are not bound. I think there is no danger. We anticipated the very question which the gentleman asks and went into it, and I do not think there is any danger. It is proposed to put in what was not in the original law, a plan by which the corporation may liquidate upon a two-thirds vote of its stockholders, upon a plan to be approved upon the Federal Loan Board, and any Federal land bank, if it desires, on the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board. might take over the assets of any one of these banks on terms agreed upon. Now, of course, those assets are of the same character as the assets of the farm-loan banks; the bonds are issued under the same limitations, against the same class of securities, which were rigidly inspected, and that is the reason why some of the joint-stock banks would liquidate, because they are held to a pretty strict regulation, and they have come to the conclusion they can not make as much profit out of it as they first thought they could, and for that reason they are willing to get out.

Mr. CANNON. Then I understand the stockholders of the joint land banks will not be relieved by virtue of any legislation until the bonds are paid?

Mr. WINGO. That is my opinion, as a lawyer. Congress can not abrogate that contract.

Mr. CANNON. And they would be personally liable in the event the bonds were not fully——

Mr. WINGO. That is provided in the original act to the extent of the capital stock of the bank just like the holder of national-bank stock is liable for debts of his corporation to the extent of his stock.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, I would like to know about the bill in this particular. As I understand this bill any Federal land bank on the order of the Farm Loan Board would be required to aid in liquidation of a joint-stock bank. Is that true?

Mr. PLATT. No; that is not strictly true.

Mr. MORGAN. Would it be optional with the Federal land bank?

Mr. PLATT. Any Federal land bank may, with the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board, take over the assets, but they are not required to do so.

Mr. MORGAN. It is optional with the Federal land bank, and even if the bank wanted to do it, it would have to have the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board?

Mr. PLATT. Yes. I will say to the gentleman it is expected, inasmuch as these are usually loans of a larger amount than Federal land banks loan, it is expected this will be a rather profitable business to the Federal land banks during the period when they are unable to do any other business, because of the hold-up of the Supreme Court in reference to the rehearing of the case as to its constitutionality.

Mr. MORGAN. The Federal land bank would assume all liabilities of the joint-stock land banks. Is that true?

Mr. PLATT. With the approval of the Federal Farm Loan Board; yes.

Mr. MORGAN. And the Federal land banks, which are stronger institutions probably than the joint-stock banks, would then assume the liability, would they not?

Mr. PLATT. It would take over the assets and liabilities if they wanted to, but they are not compelled to do so. Of course, the gentleman knows not many of the joint-stock land banks are likely to take advantage of this, but after a joint-stock land bank has loaned, perhaps, eight or ten times its capital it becomes a very profitable institution.

Up to that time it is not profitable. It has assets and mortgages taken, but it has cost a good deal of money to investigate and appraise that land, and its bonds have not yet gotten thoroughly to selling, but they have gotten to a point where it becomes profitable. Only a few of the more recently started—about 10, I think—would probably liquidate.

Mr. MORGAN. As I understand, the joint-stock land banks issue a bond as a rule which bears one-half of 1 per cent interest more than the bonds issued by the Federal land banks. Is that true generally?

Mr. PLATT. The joint-stock land-bank bonds bear 5 per cent, whereas the Federal land-bank bonds are issued at 4½ per cent, except one issue, which was at 5 per cent also.

Mr. MORGAN. This will not authorize the Federal land banks to issue any new bonds?

Mr. PLATT. Oh, no.

Mr. MORGAN. They simply assume these liabilities and go through the administrative features of collecting these interest payments and payments on the principal and close out the business?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly. Of course, the gentleman understands that the Federal land banks can keep on issuing bonds if they can sell them. There is nothing in the act we have passed to prevent that.

Mr. MORGAN. Does the gentleman mean to say the Federal land banks could take charge of the corporation of one of the joint-stock land banks and go on and operate it and contract and make loans and issue new bonds?

Mr. PLATT. Well, since the uncertainty created by the fact that the Supreme Court has directed a reargument the system is not able to sell its bonds bearing the same rate of interest as before. Whether they can sell its bonds at a higher rate of interest, I do not know.

Mr. MORGAN. They would sell their own bonds. They would not sell joint-stock bonds?

Mr. PLATT. Certainly not. In liquidation they could not do that.

Mr. MORGAN. This bill is not compulsory on any joint-stock bank?

Mr. PLATT. No. They have to go on the votes of two-thirds of the stockholders. The whole thing is optional all the way through. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

USE OF ARMY TRANSPORTS TO OLYMPIC GAMES.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I call up the unfinished business, Senate joint resolution 179.

The SPEAKER. When the House adjourned last night it was considering a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (S. J. Res. 179) authorizing use of Army transports by teams, individuals, and their equipment, representing the United States in Olympic games and international competitions.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that unanimous consent is necessary to take this up, and it has not been given.

The SPEAKER. Unanimous consent was given last night. It is under consideration. The gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] is recognized.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, I do not know that it will be necessary to go into this matter any further. I think the House last night was pretty well convinced that this ought to be done. I do want to make clear, however, that it will not cost the Government one penny. The proposal is to allow the American Olympic team, which is to compete in Europe in July, to use an Army transport for the purpose of going over there.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. I make the point of order that where unanimous consent is given for the present consideration of a matter on one legislative day and that legislative day closes without the previous question having been ordered, it is not in order, except by unanimous consent or by rule, to take that legislation up on a succeeding legislative day. I make the point of order that this legislation is not in order unless it is taken up by unanimous consent or by rule.

Mr. SANFORD. This bill was being considered in the general legislative time of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, the Military Committee gave careful and long consideration to this matter and would not have brought this bill in except in the present emergency. The situation is that the boys who were going over there to compete with others in these Olympic games can not go unless they go on Army transports. We have gone to the length of examining each steamship company, and we find that every steamship company has a long waiting list, and the 200 or more boys who would go absolutely can not go on these steamships. The result would be that America would not compete in the first Olympic after the war.

Now, Gen. Bullard of the Army and Commander Mayo of the Navy and the Secretary of War himself all earnestly hope that the American team will be allowed to compete. It will not cost the Government anything, and under the regulation of the Secretary of War these boys would pay for their food. I want to emphasize the fact that the committee would not bring this in and make a precedent except in this emergency.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, the gentleman does not anticipate that special transports will be sent out to carry these men. The transports will sail anyhow, whether these men are on them or not.

Mr. SANFORD. Of course, that is the fact. These transports are going over, and it is proposed to have these men use them.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman state where these games are to be held?

Mr. SANFORD. In Antwerp.

Mr. EDMONDS. Is it supposed that you are to fill the transport with these men and run it to Antwerp, or are they to be taken there by piecemeal?

Mr. SANFORD. These men are to go under direction of the Secretary of War, on a steamer that would land, in any event.

Mr. KAHN. All transports land at Antwerp.

Mr. SANFORD. All our transports do land at the very port where these boys want to go.

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield.

Mr. JUUL. What American could possibly be against our being represented in Europe in these games?

Mr. SANFORD. I think all will be for it when they understand it.

Mr. JUUL. I think we ought to take pride in being represented over there.

Mr. SANFORD. I think so. And I think this work is clearly allied to the work of the Army and Navy. I did say last night that the Army and Navy together will send a shooting team of about 100 men; and if we let the Army and Navy go alone these teams can not in any event win the Olympic, because they can not win points enough to do so. They will only have a chance to win in the shooting.

Mr. CRAMTON. Can the gentleman state whether it is contemplated and whether it will be possible for anyone to be included under this resolution who does not actually compete, or go over for the purpose of competing, in the Olympic events?

Mr. SANFORD. It will only include those who are going for the purpose of managing and competing in the Olympic games. I think some men will go as trainers who will not actually compete.

Mr. CRAMTON. And is it definitely understood that the number of managers shall be limited to two or three?

Mr. SANFORD. I wish to say that this is under the leadership of high-minded men——

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman can see, though, that it opens the door to "managers," and abuses may creep in; and I think the House is entitled to an assurance, if the resolution does permit it, that it will not be abused and that not over two or three or half a dozen managers will be permitted.

Mr. SANFORD. I think the House can have that assurance, and can leave the matter safely to the regulation of the Secretary of War.

Mr. CRAMTON. The gentleman, of course, understands that the permission will be abused if a large number of managers are permitted to go.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. This is a Senate resolution, I understand?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. And the Military Affairs Committee have amended it by inserting a preamble?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. That is a most unusual thing. Has the gentleman any objection to that preamble being eliminated? We do not amend bills by inserting preambles; we almost invariably eliminate them. If we have got to put preambles on the legislation coming before the Committee on Military Affairs in order to explain it, perhaps the committee would be placed in an embarrassing position.

Mr. SANFORD. The committee appreciated the rule and inserted the preamble in the hope that it would appear by that more clearly that the committee did not desire by this to establish any precedent, but in very brief language to notify the House of the exact emergency that made it necessary, and we would be glad to have the preamble voted down.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, I am glad to say that the gentleman's explanation has made the matter much clearer than the reading of the preamble did, because there were only a few Members who had copies of the resolution.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Certainly.

Mr. KAHN. Of course, there is a law forbidding the use of any Government transports for the purpose of carrying any individual who is not connected with the Army or the Navy or with the departments of our Government. The law was passed because of the abuses that existed. People took advantage of the fact that we owned the transports and, through influential friends, got permits to take joy rides across the Pacific Ocean. It was not the desire of the Committee on Military Affairs to open that subject again. We think the law is an excellent one. But, due entirely to the peculiar conditions that exist in connection with trans-Atlantic passenger service, the committee decided to make one exception, and we thought that possibly by putting the preamble in the resolution it would give notice to the House, in case any other bills are offered, as to why we made the exception at this time. I am sure the committee is not wedded to the preamble and will have no objection to voting it down.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. As I understand the position of the Committee on Military Affairs it is this, that though they will not make a precedent they do at once make a precedent.

Mr. SANFORD. Only on account of the emergency that makes it impossible for these teams to go unless we do pass this resolution.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman knows as well as I do that there will always be an emergency if we leave it to the people wanting transportation furnished. This is a precedent. What is the use of saying it is not?

Mr. SANFORD. Mr. Speaker, in that connection I think perhaps the House should know that the English team will go to Antwerp at the expense of and supported by the British Government, and the French team is supported by the French Government, and all the expenses will be borne by the Governments of those countries for their respective teams until the contest is over. The American Government does not intend to contribute, and has not, in fact, ever contributed, to the support of our teams, and this measure is suggested merely because of the emergency.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Is it any worse for the Government to transport these people on this trip than it is to transport this junketing congressional party that proposes to go at Government expense and take a nice little holiday trip to the Orient?

Mr. BLANTON. That has all been knocked out.

Mr. SANFORD. The gentleman will permit me to leave that question unanswered. I think the situation with respect to it is perfectly clear.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am glad to know it has been knocked out. It is a disgraceful proposition.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is it not true that in these international contests a man must first have been entered as a contestant?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes. They can only go when they have competed in the contests heretofore held here.

Mr. BEE. They have all been selected?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes; they have all been selected.

Mr. BEE. And only those are going who have been selected?

Mr. SANFORD. Yes; only those are going who have been selected, and I suppose the Secretary of War would allow their managers to go.

Mr. Speaker, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 10 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under ordinary circumstances, with the country under normal conditions I would not object to a measure of this kind; but if there ever was a good season for objection, I think that time is now. I am in favor of encouraging athletics in every school, city, town, hamlet, and village in this Nation. But what are we proposing to do? To authorize 300 men to go on Government Army transports to Antwerp to engage in athletic contests across the ocean in foreign lands, at a time when we have just finished the waging of battle there, where strength was tested and proven beyond doubt. Is it any time now to exhibit further prowess and physical strength and endurance of American youth when our young men have just recently returned from Europe after having demonstrated there to the highest degree our physical fitness and prowess in every respect? Our Government is facing an indebtedness now of $28,000,000,000. Is not this a time for us to stop and pause and consider respecting these further expenses that are proposed almost daily from the floor of this House?

My colleagues say, "Oh, it is not going to cost anything for 300 men to be transported to Antwerp from America." One of my distinguished colleagues said it would not take an additional pound of coal. That shows how little thought he has given the matter. Government transports are to be used. For each and every one of these 300 men it is going to cost the Government at least $100 at the lowest possible estimate, even if they do pay something for meals. There is a certain overhead.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I can not yield just now.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure my colleagues who took advantage of the situation in going to Europe during the war—some of you did—on Army transports; you may imagine that it did not cost the Government anything. I am here to tell you that every space occupied by an individual on a Government ship, every meal that that individual eats on that ship, is costing this Government something every time he goes. I am here to tell you that if you leave it to your constituents as to whether or not it is costing the taxpayers of this country anything for 300 men to go from this country to Antwerp on a Government transport, they are going to tell you that they know that it does cost the Government money, and that all of these junketing trips should stop, and I want to register my feeble but solemn protest against the passage of this measure at this time when we are in debt. I want to tell you that the only safe position for Congress to take when this Government is in debt almost hopelessly is for the Government to stop this indiscriminate spending of public money.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I regret that I can not. I have not the time. I am going to tell you something about this legislation that you are proposing to pass hurriedly without thought or consideration.

Some gentleman spoke of the eastern trip that had been planned by some Congressmen. Why, I thought when the newspapers made that junketing scheme public, every man would have sense enough to drop that matter and stay at home. Here is one Congressman who is not going east on any junketing trip. If we ever adjourn, I am going down home to see my people, and that is what you ought to do. You ought to go home and get better acquainted with your people, and find out what they are thinking about during this day of rehabilitation and reconstruction. You ought to get out of this extravagant atmosphere of Washington and all go home. I may be the only Congressman to vote against this measure, but I am going to be one. I am not afraid to vote by myself when I believe I am right. My colleagues may think it is safe to vote always with the majority. I know it is usually safer to do that than to vote in a minority, but I want to tell you that sometimes your constituents appreciate your voting in the minority, and I am going to vote against this proposition. It is an awfully bad precedent to set. It is one that will be hard to set aside in the future. It is going to cost this Government a lot of money.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. JONES of Texas. I should like to know if the gentleman knows whether these Olympic games are always held in Europe, or if they are ever held over here?

Mr. BLANTON. They never have been held over here, but always abroad, as my other colleagues know very well.

Mr. SANFORD. It is expected that probably the next Olympic games will be held here.

Mr. BLANTON. If that were assured and not merely a futile expectation, it would not change me. I am not against athletics. My colleague [Mr. JONES of Texas], who is a graduate of the same institution that I am in my home State, if he is familiar with its athletic history there, knows that I was one of the first students years ago to join in a movement to install a gymnasium and an athletic club in the University of Texas. There was none there until a bunch of us got together and installed a gymnasium, just like a bunch of the Members of the House got together and recently put a gymnasium in the House Office Building at our own expense. I am in favor of athletics. We need athletics, but we do not need participation in these Olympic games in Antwerp this year, when our Government owes $28,000,000,000 and has no way to pay the interest except by taxing the people. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL] wanted me to yield a moment ago, and I yield to him now.

Mr. JUUL. I want to say to the gentleman that I did not go to Europe at Government expense, but I am told that no Congressman went to Europe unless the transport was going to the port where he wanted to go and that he paid his board. I think the gentleman might be fair enough to state that, instead of saying that the meals cost the Government money. We ought to be fair with our brethren here.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I am fair. Many went at only nominal expense. Some, of course, may have paid full fare.

Mr. JUUL. And there is one form of athletics that some gentlemen use entirely too much in this House, and that is the athletic stunt of throwing the bull. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. Sometimes it is necessary to throw the bull when there are targets present that ought to receive it. I have had some of my colleagues tell me that they went to Europe and that the expense of the round trip over there and back did not exceed $200. Let them try to go over there and back on a private ship for $200! Figure it up and you will find out how much this junketing costs the Government.

Mr. SANFORD. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GALLIVAN].

Mr. WINGO. I would like to ask a question.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Certainly, if it is not taken out of my time.

Mr. WINGO. In these Olympic games is there a lung contest? [Laughter.]

Mr. SANFORD. I am not sure, but I think there is.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. How does the gentleman from New York [Mr. SANFORD] get any time to yield?

The SPEAKER. He has charge of the bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. This bill is on the Union Calendar. Unanimous consent was given for its consideration. It is being considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule. There is no general debate. No one has charge of the time.

Mr. SANFORD. I think that is true.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. GALLIVAN. I ask to be recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not objecting to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I introduced this bill some weeks ago, and at the same time a similar bill was introduced in the other branch of Congress by the senior Senator from the State of New York. I have asked for congressional action for two reasons: First of all, because of my lifelong love for athletics; and, secondly, because I know something of the difficulties which have confronted the managers of the various athletic teams in arranging for overseas transportation. I can truthfully say to this House that the three hundred and odd representative athletes of America who will be selected to participate in the Olympic games, because they are the very best in their individual lines of competition, will not be able to go to Antwerp unless they have a helping hand from Uncle Sam.

Let it be understood now that the expenses incurred by the American teams will be met by a popular subscription. For instance, $50,000 is New England's quota, and my people are only too happy to make their contribution to help pay for the expenses of their athletic youth.

I take exception to what my friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] says about there being a heavy burden of expense upon the Government in connection with the sustenance of these boys aboard ship. Of course, he knows all about athletes and athletics, because he tells us he does; but these boys are going to Antwerp as the pride of their individual communities; they are nonpareil in their lines of athletic activity. When they go aboard ship a training table is established for every group of athletes; they are permitted to eat only certain things; each article of food and whatever liquids they use are selected by their trainers, and every such thing is paid for out of the general funds subscribed by the American people. [Applause.]

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. Certainly.

Mr. BEE. Is it not true that they are also going as the selected representatives of the American people to represent America in these world Olympic games?

Mr. GALLIVAN. That is absolutely true. They are selected as the result of competitions held in the various sections of the country; and when they achieve victory, as we expect them to achieve it, the glory will not be theirs, but will be that of the United States of America. [Applause.] Let me say to my good friend from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] that when the winners are picked in each event they are announced to the assembled throng by throwing out to the breeze the flag of the country whose chosen representative has won the event, and, of course, we want to see the Stars and Stripes flying aloft as often as possible. [Applause.] These boys can not go in the numbers necessary to this competition unless we pass this bill.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I yield to my colleague.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman speaks of the flag being thrown to the breeze. Is it not a fact that the emblem these athletes wear on their breasts is the emblem of our national colors?

Mr. GALLIVAN. It is the shield of our country. For instance, if they represent Harvard College or Yale College or the University of Texas, they do not wear the emblem of their university; they wear on their athletic shirts the shield of the Stars and Stripes of America.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GALLIVAN. I will.

Mr. BEE. Would not the fact that they go over on an Army transport add color and dignity to the fact that they truly represent America? [Applause.]

Mr. GALLIVAN. Absolutely so. I sincerely hope that as this bill passed elsewhere unanimously there will be no objection on the part of any other Member of this House to its adoption.

Do not forget that practically all of the American representatives will be either men now in the Army or Navy or men who saw service in the Army and Navy of our country in the recent war. As I have said, our Olympic team will be made up of men from all over the country, representing affiliated bodies whose membership is country wide and every contestant is a simon-pure amateur. I recall hearing Commander Mayo, in charge of the morale division of the Bureau of Navigation, make the statement that the appropriation for his bureau read "For the health, comfort, contentment, and recreation of the Navy," and he stated that he had found that one of the greatest agencies for the promotion of morale was athletics. He has brought men from all over the world in preparation for the competitions, and he has them at this moment in training at the Great Lakes Naval Training Station and the Naval Academy at Annapolis. Every midshipman who qualifies in the tryouts is going overseas, and the magnificent eight-oared crew which represents the academy at Annapolis is also going overseas because it has won out from the other crews in America.

The American Olympic committee want to send these athletes in one great party. They want to include the Army men and the Navy men with the men from civil life who have been successful in the preliminary competitions, and it is the belief of Army and Navy leaders that anything which brings the young men still in the service of their country into closer contact with the young men from civil life will be of immense benefit to the morale of the Army and Navy.

Mr. Speaker, it is true that all of the big steamship lines are fully booked for the summer months, and on several lines there is a waiting list of hundreds of people. It was clearly demonstrated to the committee which has this bill in charge that our American athletes can not get bookings on privately owned ships. Unless this resolution is passed the American teams will not be able to compete in this the first Olympic since the World War, and I for one believe that this would not only be a misfortune but almost a disaster. With this statement I appeal to the House to vote overwhelmingly in favor of the adoption of my resolution, and I do so with confidence. [Applause.]

Mr. PELL. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that this resolution should pass. This country has been well and successfully represented at all of the Olympic meets since they were first revived in 1896. The success of our countrymen has been a legitimate source of pride to us, and I can not help believing that it has had a beneficial effect on the community at large. Athletic games are a good thing for us all, morally and physically. Boys and men learn to take care of themselves, to preserve their health and vigor, and those lessons are remembered and valued long after the ambition to become a great athlete has passed away.

Everyone will be interested in those games, and in the end that interest will benefit all, and especially men like ourselves, who lead rather sedentary lives. None of us have left the hope of ever running a mile in record time, but all business and professional men will be benefited by the shock when they discover that they can not run even half a mile at all. The last 20 or 30 years has shown a great improvement in the popular attention to physical health, which has been of great profit to the individual and to the Nation. Anything we can do to foster this interest will be a good thing.

Mr. FIELDS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I think we might well give some consideration to the precedent that we establish if we pass this resolution. This resolution or a similar resolution was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs of the House, and after the most thorough consideration it was rejected by that committee.

Now, what are we doing? If we give this organization free transportation on an Army transport, we establish a precedent that will call for the admission of other organizations of this country to the Army transports. The international peace delegation, the delegates to conventions of the International Church Association, and hundreds of other organizations will ask for the same benefit, and they are just as patriotic as this organization and their work is as important. I would not say one word disparagingly of this organization. I have no quarrel with it personally about its asking for this favor. But I am talking about your duty and mine. If we establish this precedent, what argument have we against extending the same favor to other organizations who come to Congress and ask for it? Where will it lead to? Where will it stop? It will lead so far that no man can figure the effect of its results, and if the Congress grants this special favor I shall contend for the same favor for other organizations.

As I said, the Military Committee of the House studied this proposition most carefully, and decided that it would be a dangerous precedent to establish, and for that reason rejected the bill in committee. I therefore hope that the House will not take the unwise step of establishing the precedent that this bill will establish, but, on the contrary, will defeat the bill. Gentlemen, if this resolution is enacted into law, we will never hear the last of it in the House and the Senate of the United States. [Applause.]

Mr. BOX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BOX. I wish to call attention to the fact that the resolution provides that the Secretary of War may permit the use of transports. Does not that authorize the selection of a transport for that trip for that special purpose?

Mr. FIELDS. There is no question about it, there is no limitation on the Secretary of War, and in the event that other organizations come to Congress and ask for a similar favor what are you going to say to them?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. How many Army transports are there lying idle subject to the direction of the Secretary of War?

Mr. FIELDS. I have not the figures on that, but it costs something to send a transport across the sea.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not a fact that we are sending a transport once or twice a month to Antwerp?

Mr. FIELDS. That is true, but when we admit these men free of cost to the transport you have no argument against extending to other organizations the same favor. The time will come ere long when every organization that wants to go abroad to participate in some exercises in foreign countries will come to Congress and ask for this same favor, and there will be no reason why they are not as much entitled to it as these men. Gentlemen, you can not justify your action if you extend this favor to these men and reject other organizations.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FIELDS. Yes.

Mr. BLAND of Indiana. Is there any reason why an organization that wants to represent the American people in Europe should not go on an American transport if they pay their own board?

Mr. FIELDS. Then let the gentleman introduce a bill general in its terms applying to all organizations and have it considered by Congress. Let him introduce a general bill and not a bill extending this special favor to an individual organization.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, what the gentleman from Kentucky said about the resolution is absolutely true. But later it developed that a strike in France took off the French lines of ocean steamers across the Atlantic. Some of these athletes had taken passage on the steamers which were to sail. The passage had to be canceled. There was no other way to get across the Atlantic Ocean than by allowing them to go on the transports. The transports go practically empty in the passenger service. They carry supplies for the soldiers in Germany. The mere fact that they can take over a certain number of men will not consume space that would be wanted by anybody else.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. NEWTON of Minnesota. I would like to know whether the athletes are representatives of the Army or the Navy or a private club.

Mr. KAHN. There are about 100 of them in the Army and the Navy and the National Guard of this country. Some of them are members of athletic organizations recognized in this country.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. The gentleman will agree that the passage of this resolution will establish an undesirable precedent.

Mr. KAHN. It will not establish such a precedent as I am afraid of, because we show the peculiar conditions that make this legislation advisable and desirable at this time.

Mr. FIELDS. Will the gentleman further yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. FIELDS. If other organizations ask the same favor in the future, can Congress consistently refuse them?

Mr. KNUTSON. If they ask for them under similar conditions.

Mr. KAHN. It rests entirely with Congress and the conditions that exist when the request is made. I for one am ready to go on record at any time. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the committee amendment to the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the committee amendment be again reported.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the Clerk will again report the committee amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the committee amendment.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the preamble.

The preamble was rejected.

The joint resolution was read a third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the joint resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 104, noes 33.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify absentees, and the Clerk will call the roll. The question is on agreeing to the Senate joint resolution.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 259, nays 79, answered "present" 2, not voting 87, as follows:

CONFERENCE REPORT—SIOUX TRIBE OF INDIANS.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit a conference report on the bill (H. R. 400) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts submits a conference report on the bill the title of which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 400) authorizing the Sioux Tribe of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims.

The SPEAKER. Ordered printed under the rule.

TO ESTABLISH A HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13500.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13500, with Mr. SANFORD in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 13500, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 13500) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish a Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II.—HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION.

SEC. 201. (a) When used in this title—
(1) The term "commission" means the Hawaiian homes commission;
(2) The term "public land" has the same meaning as defined in paragraph (3) of subdivision (a) of section 73 of the Hawaiian organic act;
(3) The term "fund" means the Hawaiian home loan fund;
(4) The term "Territory" means the Territory of Hawaii;
(5) The term "Hawaiian home lands" means all lands given the status of Hawaiian home lands under the provisions of section 204 of this title;
(6) The term "tract" means any tract of Hawaiian home lands leased as authorized by section 207 of this title or any portion of such tract; and
(7) The term "native Hawaiian" means any descendant of not less than one thirty-second part of the blood of the races inhabiting the Hawaiian Islands previous to 1778.
(b) Any term defined or described in section 347 or 351 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii of 1915, except a term defined in subdivision (a) of this section, shall, whenever used in this title, have the same meaning as given it by such definition or description.
SEC. 202 (a) There is hereby established a commission to be known as the "Hawaiian homes commission" and to be composed of five members as follows:
(1) The governor of the Territory, and
(2) Four citizens of the Territory to be appointed by the governor, by and with the advice and consent of the senate of the legislature of the Territory. At least two of the appointed members of the commission shall be native Hawaiians.
(b) Any vacancy in the office of an appointed member shall be filled in the same manner and under the same limitations as the original appointment.
(c) The governor of the Territory shall be chairman of the commission. The commission shall designate one of its members to serve as the executive officer and secretary of the commission. The executive officer and secretary shall receive such annual salary, not to exceed $6,000, as the commission may determine. The members of the commission, except the executive officer and secretary, shall receive an annual salary of $500. Of the original appointed members of the commission, one shall be appointed for a term of one year, one for two years, one for three years, and one for four years. Their successors shall hold office for terms of four years, except that any member appointed to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he succeeds. A member may after due notice and public hearing be removed by the governor for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but for no other cause.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the chairman of the committee a question in reference to this: This commission that is appointed is supposed to administer the provisions of this law, I presume?

Mr. DOWELL. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Will there be duties conflicting in any way, or has provision been made in this bill for any possible conflict between the duties to be performed by this commission and any other governmental agency either of the Territory of Hawaii or the Government of the United States? As I understand, these are public lands, in a sense. Now, is there provision in the bill which will prevent any possibility of a conflict?

Mr. DOWELL. I am very glad the gentleman has submitted that question. There is a public-land commissioner in Hawaii whose duty it is to have charge of the public lands. Under this bill certain specific lands are withdrawn from his jurisdiction and from the jurisdiction of every commission except the special one to have charge of these specific lands described in the bill, and these lands are exclusively by the terms of the bill under the control of this commission. There is a provision, permit me to say, that if the lands under the control of this commission are not homesteaded and are not needed for the purpose of homesteading they may be released and turned back to the land commissioner who may dispose of them temporarily under a lease until they may be needed by this Hawaiian homes commission.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, if I understand correctly, some of these lands are already under the jurisdiction of the existing land commissioner?

Mr. DOWELL. All of them are.

Mr. WALSH. Now, some of these restrictions end his jurisdiction, and power over them is vested in this new commission——

Mr. DOWELL. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. For the purposes of this act. Now, who is to determine when and for how long these lands are to be under the supervision of this newly created commission in case there may be some conflicting claims in reference to lease or the actual use of it, or the continued use? Who will have the power of the determination of that?

Mr. DOWELL. This law, when enacted, will immediately place the lands described in the bill under the jurisdiction of this commission.

Mr. WALSH. They can determine finally and definitely all questions arising with reference to those lands?

Mr. DOWELL. So far as they are legally within their jurisdiction; but the law specifically places all of these lands within the jurisdiction of this commission?

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman has referred to leases, and under section 204 it provides, in reference to leases expired, that the lease shall be transferred to the new jurisdiction; but suppose the lease contains a withdrawal clause and this commission gives notice that it desires the land, and the land commissioner declines to withdraw it or to exercise the power he has, and there is a contention between this commissioner and the land commission as to whether these lands are proper lands to be utilized for this purpose; how is any such question as that to be finally and definitely determined?

Mr. DOWELL. I assume it is the intention of this bill to take the jurisdiction away from every commission except the Hawaiian homes commission. Now, if there is a controversy in reference to it, it would then, I assume, have to be determined by a court.

Mr. WALSH. But these leases may contain a withdrawal clause, and the commissioner of public lands may not think that it is proper for him to exercise the withdrawal. Now, this says that if the Hawaiian homes commission should require that these lands be withdrawn the public land commissioner must exercise that withdrawal.

Mr. DOWELL. No; that relates to the land that is turned over to the commissioner by this Hawaiian homes commission and has nothing whatever to do with the general land laws of the Territory.

Mr. WALSH. Well, what is the Hawaiian organic act?

Mr. DOWELL. That is the general law adopted in 1900, which has a provision for all of the homesteading and care of the public lands in connection with other matters. It is the organic law of the Territory.

Mr. WALSH. Some of the leases which have been taken under that act contain a withdrawal clause?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes. The organic law has a provision that states specifically how these lands may be taken from a lease where the withdrawal clause is in the lease.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask that this colloquy be extended for another hour, so they can thrash it out between themselves.

Mr. WALSH. Well, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not in order. Neither of us yielded to the gentleman. If he has no interest in this information that is being elicited, he had better go out and get his usual file of newspapers and read them.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, the point of order I was trying to make was that the colloquy has extended over a period of considerable longer time than usually allowed under the rule.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Texas is not occupying the chair, and he does not control the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I think I was recognized. I ask that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] may now have five minutes. I desire to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman desire recognition, or does he make a request? The Chair understood the gentleman from Massachusetts had the floor.

Mr. DOWELL. The gentleman from Massachusetts asked a question, and I was answering to the best of my ability. I desire to ask for time in my own right.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Will the gentleman yield for a moment?

Mr. DOWELL. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. In this withdrawal clause you are speaking of there and that you are being asked about, on line 10, page 4, you will notice that if this land is under lease—any sort of a lease—it is excepted from the land that is now turned over to the homes commission. Now, under the general law the leaseholder takes it subject to the right of the homesteader. Twenty-five homesteaders can petition the land commissioner to withdraw certain parts of the lease and subject that to homestead laws. In this withdrawal mentioned here later on in this act the homes commission, when they have got more land than they can use, turn it over to the land commissioner, and he must take it subject to the limitations of this law, which is that he must lease it only temporarily and hold it at the will of the Hawaiian homes commission. Of course, if a controversy arises between them, there is no way to settle except through a court.

Mr. WALSH. If the gentleman will permit, that is what I had in mind, namely, that this apparently permits this new Hawaiian homes commission to impose its will upon the public land commissioner as to lands which are under lease and subject to withdrawal.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No. That is where the gentleman is mistaken.

Mr. WALSH. On page 6, line 3, it says:

> If the land is covered by a lease containing a withdrawal clause * * * the commissioner of public lands shall withdraw such lands from the operation of the lease whenever the commission gives notice to him that the commission is of the opinion that the lands are required by it for leasing as authorized by the provisions of section 207.

Now, section 207 is a section which authorizes it to be leased to the native Hawaiians, and so forth, and designates the tract and contains provisions in reference to the application.

Mr. DOWELL. In other words, in a lease containing a withdrawal clause, this commission may require the turning over of the land described in this bill to the Hawaiian homes commission to be used for the native Hawaiians. That is the plain language of the law.

Mr. WALSH. That is the situation. Now, then, suppose there may be good reason why the land should not be withdrawn and why the public land commissioner in his judgment ought not to take advantage of the withdrawal clause, and he gets this request of the Hawaiian homes commission to withdraw these lands, and he says, "Gentlemen, I have got your request, and the bill gives me no option, but I think it is a very great mistake to withdraw these lands," and he should refuse to withdraw them?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. This says, as I understand it:

> Such withdrawal shall be held to be for a public purpose within the meaning of that term as used in subdivision (b) of section 73 of the Hawaiian organic act.

That, as I understand, would give this homes commission the right to proceed against him and make him do it. The land commissioner now must exercise the right of withdrawal if 25 homesteaders petition. In addition to that, he must exercise it if this homes commission asks him to do it.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose, for instance, he has an application from 25 Hawaiians under the homestead provision which would happen to be pending at the time this should become a law, and he may have given them assurance that this was going to be withdrawn. Now, along comes this act and, as I understand, abrogates all provisions in reference to that, so that if the homesteaders desire to avail themselves of this land they would then have to proceed under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. DOWELL. That is the intention of the legislation.

Mr. WALSH. Has the committee given careful consideration to that situation, as to whether it is wise to so limit the operation of the organic act as to——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask for two additional minutes.

I will ask the committee if they have given it such consideration and have looked into what the effect would be on the operations and whether they believe that is the more advantageous way for this matter to be handled to protect the rights of all concerned?

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to the gentleman the committee has examined this question very thoroughly. We had a commission before us from Hawaii presenting this very point, and it was thought by the commission, and your committee have unanimously agreed with the commission, that this should be turned over to the Hawaiian homes commission, because otherwise it has been shown that these lands are fast disappearing from the homesteader, and this act was intended to create a condition which would prevent the homesteader from the disposal of the property and to retain the homestead for the use of the homesteader and his family.

Mr. WALSH. Well, I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. PELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Senate joint resolution 179, just passed.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. ACKERMAN having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had requested a conference with the House of Representatives on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes, and had appointed Mr. JONES of Washington, Mr. CALDER, Mr. MCNARY, Mr. SIMMONS, and Mr. RANSDELL as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. 3852. An act for the relief of the Garden City (Kans.) Water Users' Association, and for other purposes.

TO ESTABLISH A HAWAIIAN HOMES COMMISSION.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

> SEC. 203. All public lands of the description and acreage as follows, excluding (a) all lands within any forest reservation, (b) all cultivated sugar-cane lands, and (c) all public lands held under a certificate of occupation, homestead lease, right of purchase lease, or special homestead agreement, are hereby designated, and hereinafter referred to, as "available lands":

(1) On the Island of Hawaii: Kamaoa-Puueo (11,000 acres, more or less), in the district of Kau; Puukapu (12,000 acres, more or less), Kawaihae I (10,000 acres, more or less), and Pauahi (750 acres, more or less), in the district of South Kohala; Kamoku-Kapulena (5,000 acres, more or less) and Nienie (7,350 acres, more or less), in the district of Hamakua; 53,000 acres to be selected from the lands of Humuula Mauka, in the district of North Hilo; 2,000 acres of agricultural lands to be selected by the commission from the lands of Pithonua, in the district of South Hilo; and 2,000 acres to be selected by the commission from the lands of Kaohe-Makuu, in the district of Puna;

(2) On the Island of Maui: Kahikinui (25,000 acres, more or less) in the district of Kahikinui; and the public lands (6,000 acres, more or less) in the district of Kula;

(3) On the Island of Molokai: Palaau (11,400 acres, more or less), Kapaakea (2,000 acres, more or less), Kalamaula (6,000 acres, more or less), Hoolehua (3,500 acres, more or less), Kamiloloa I and II (3,600 acres, more or less), and Makakupaia (2,200 acres, more or less);

(4) On the Island of Oahu: Nanakuli (3,000 acres, more or less) and Lualualei (2,000 acres, more or less), in the district of Waianae; and Waimanalo (4,000 acres, more or less), in the district of Koolaupoko, excluding therefrom the military reservation and the beach lands; and

(5) On the Island of Kauai: Upper lands of Waimea, above the cultivated sugar-cane lands, in the district of Waimea (15,000 acres, more or less); and Moloaa (2,500 acres, more or less) and Anahola and Kamalomalo (5,000 acres, more or less).

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. HICKS. I do so for the purpose of asking a question of the gentleman from Iowa. As I understand the report of the committee, this provides that these lands shall be leased for so much to anybody who desires to take out the lease?

Mr. DOWELL. That is correct. The bill provides for the nominal amount of $1 a year.

Mr. HICKS. In case these lands are settled up—and some of them, of course, are on the windward side, and some on the leeward side of the island, and those on the leeward side would have to be irrigated to make them productive—under what provisions of any law can these people take advantage of the irrigation ditches that are there already?

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to the gentleman that this bill provides for the placing of water on these tracts under certain conditions, and it provides for the issuing of bonds by the Territory of Hawaii, through legislation for that purpose in order that the water may be placed on certain of these tracts not containing water.

Mr. HICKS. Then these people who take out their land allotments in addition to $1 a year will pay for the water rights?

Mr. DOWELL. That is not correct exactly as to the water rights. Of course, whatever there is of rental they will have to pay. The securing of water and the expense of getting it there will be paid for by the Territory of Hawaii.

Mr. HICKS. The expenses will be paid?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 204. Upon the passage of this act all available lands shall immediately assume the status of Hawaiian home lands and be under the control of the commission to be used and disposed of in accordance with the provisions of this title; except that—

(1) In case any available land is under lease at the time of the passage of this act such land shall not assume the status of Hawaiian home lands until the lease expires or the commissioner of public lands withdraws the land from the operation of the lease. If the land is covered by a lease containing a withdrawal clause as provided in subdivision (d) of section 73 of the Hawaiian organic act, the commissioner of public lands shall withdraw such lands from the operation of the lease whenever the commission gives notice to him that the commission is of the opinion that the lands are required by it for leasing as authorized by the provisions of section 207, or for a community pasture as provided in section 211, of this title. Such withdrawal shall be held to be for a public purpose within the meaning of that term as used in subdivision (d) of section 73 of the Hawaiian organic act.

(2) In case any land is to be selected by the commission out of a larger area of available lands, such land shall not assume the status of Hawaiian home lands until the commission makes the selection and gives notice thereof to the commissioner of public lands. The commission shall give such notice within two years after the first meeting of the commission. Any such notice given thereafter shall be deemed invalid and of no effect.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. WALSH. Page 6, line 11, says "Such withdrawal shall be held to be for a public purpose within the meaning of that term as used in subdivision (b) of section 73 of the Hawaiian organic act." Can the gentleman say how that term is defined in that act?

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand it, that was for the purpose of making this a public purpose; that they would have similar power to what they would have to condemn for any public purpose.

Mr. WALSH. But this commission would not have any jurisdiction over land withdrawn for a public purpose for a water corporation or a gas or electric-light plant?

Mr. DOWELL. They have power in one provision of the bill even to condemn water rights to get water.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; but that does not apply, if I understand it correctly, to land which they oblige the public land commissioner to withdraw, which is held under lease.

Mr. DOWELL. This is the power to withdraw the lands that are under a lease, and this provision was added making it a public purpose, so that the question could not arise that they had no power to cancel the previous lease. In other words, there was a question as to the power of this commission to cancel a lease in existence, and this provision was added making it a public purpose so that they might have that power.

Mr. WALSH. Then, if I understand the gentleman correctly, this is a precautionary clause which will prevent any possible contention over the question of authority between the public land commissioner and this commission by declaring that the withdrawals shall be for public purposes?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; and also as to any persons who held a lease.

Mr. WALSH. Yes. Now, with reference to the second paragraph of this section, which says that this land is selected "out of a larger area of available land," does that mean larger areas than those set forth in section 203?

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to the gentleman that this is the situation: In two or three of these tracts the commission, for instance, was permitted to take 2,000 acres of a tract of land of some fifteen or twenty thousand acres. They were to select the 2,000 acres from that tract. This gives the commission the power to select any 2,000 acres of the described tract, and then there is a further provision that the commission must do this within a certain time in order to retain their right to withdraw.

Mr. WALSH. I would like to ask the gentleman to state just how this particular 2,00-acre tract can be identified.

Mr. DOWELL. The commission is authorized to make this selection.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. And they will survey and take from that tract the amount described in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will it involve a new survey or a new platting?

Mr. DOWELL. No; not necessarily; but they will necessarily have to make the designation and give notice as provided in this section.

Mr. WALSH. If I understood the gentleman from Iowa or the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. HUMPHREYS], in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], there are existing surveys and plats?

Mr. DOWELL. There are.

Mr. WALSH. Of all these tracts mentioned in section 203?

Mr. DOWELL. There are.

Mr. WALSH. And they might desire to withdraw a particular 2,000-acre tract out of a larger tract? Will they be able to designate with sufficient accuracy for the purpose of identification this particular 2,000 acres without having an entirely new survey made and a new plat made of that tract?

Mr. DOWELL. I think there will be no necessity of an entirely new survey of the tract, because the bill permits them to make a selection of any 2,000 acres within the tract. But it may be necessary, and it may become necessary, to survey or at least in some manner to designate the actual 2,000 acres, or whatever amount they take from the tract.

Mr. WALSH. Just one other question: Why is this power of withdrawal or selection limited to two years?

Mr. DOWELL. Because if they were not limited the commission might make no selection whatever. The land under these conditions could not be used because the amount designated would always be subject to withdrawal by this commission, and it could not be leased or utilized by the commissioner of public lands until it was known whether or not the Hawaiian homes commission would take this part designated in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. But it would still be subject to the homestead laws, would it not?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; but it would not be subject to the laws under the homes commission.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think this is giving ample time for the people there who desire to utilize the land for the purposes set forth in this bill to acquire it and make all the necessary arrangements, within the two years?

Mr. DOWELL. It was the opinion of the committee, and it was the opinion of the commission who came here, I think, that two years would give ample time for this commission to know exactly the land that is desired to be separated from these larger tracts. In fact I think there are only two or three in the entire description that come within this provision, and it was thought that two years was ample time; and in view of the fact that the entire tract would be withheld from use for other purposes until this selection had been made, we thought it should be done as early as the commission could conveniently do it.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the gentleman for the information and I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 205. Available lands shall be sold or leased only (1) in the manner and for the purposes set out in this title, or (2) as may be necessary to complete any valid agreement of sale or lease in effect at the time of the passage of this act; except that such limitations shall not apply to the unselected portions of lands from which the commission has made a selection and given notice thereof, or failed so to select and give notice within the time limit, as provided in paragraph (2) of section 204 of this title.

Mr. WALSH. I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking a question with reference to this section. Will the gentleman explain the limitation—

Except that such limitations shall not apply to the unselected portions of lands from which the commission has made a selection and given notice thereof, or failed so to select and give notice within the time limit as provided in paragraph (2) of section 204 of this title.

If they select 2,000 acres out of a 15,000-acre tract and give the notice within the two years, and then within the two years take no steps toward setting apart the other 13,000 acres, at the end of two years that is open to operation under the supervision of the public land commissioner, is it?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes. The situation is this, that there are large areas of land there, involving many thousands of acres, and there will be a little spot over here that the Hawaiian homes commission will think available for homestead purposes, and there will be 100 acres over yonder, and another 100 acres somewhere else. The whole tract has been made available for that purpose. There may be other uses to which this big area could be put. Some man might want it for a pasture. It might be second-class pasture land, requiring many more acres than it does in this country to feed one animal, for instance. They will say, "You have the right to select 2,000 acres out of this big tract, but you must do it right away." They thought two years would be ample. We were very careful about that; asked them very carefully. They said there would be no trouble about making these selections. Now, they do not have to lease the land as soon as they select it, you understand, but they can designate it. This is for future use under the provisions of this bill, for what is called the rehabilitation of the Hawaiian people. As soon as the two years are up all the land that they have not designated can then be leased to other people for other purposes.

Mr. WALSH. If there is a 15,000-acre tract, or an 11,000-acre tract, or a 3,000-acre tract, the designation must be made within the two years. Now, what I desire to know is this: Is the jurisdiction of the public land commissioner, at the expiration of the two years, and when all the designations have been made, identified, and filed, in any way curtailed or abrogated as to the remainder of the land that has not been affected by selection?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; not at all. There are, as I recall, 190,000, or perhaps 195,000 acres, involved in this that we call available land, and probably not more than 30,000 acres, or at most a very small portion, is thought to be suitable for homesteading under the provisions of this act. This commission are allowed to go in there and make these selections out of this great body of land, but they are to do it at once. They said they could do it easily within two years. I think they could do it in less than two years, but we wanted to give them ample time. They can go in there and make their selections, and after they have made their selections of what land they want, then the rest of it can be disposed of as it can now under the general law.

Mr. WALSH. Perhaps I have expressed myself rather clumsily. This limitation says:

Available lands shall be sold or leased only (1) in the manner and for the purposes set out in this title, or (2) as may be necessary to complete any valid agreement of sale or lease in effect at the time of the passage of this act.

And that such limitations shall not apply to the unselected portions of lands.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Suppose there is a 13,000-acre tract and 3,000 acres have been selected and 10,000 acres remain. Does the public land commissioner then have jurisdiction and supervision over the remaining 10,000 acres, or is his power and jurisdiction broadened in any way?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No; it is not affected at all. It is just relieved from the limitations. The 10,000 acres remain in statu quo. They are not subject to the limitations put on the other.

Mr. WALSH. So it could be sold or leased in a manner not necessary to complete any agreement?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Not necessary for the purposes set out in this title.

Mr. WALSH. I see. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 207. (a) The commission is authorized to lease to native Hawaiians the right to the use and occupancy of a tract of Hawaiian home lands within the following acreage limits:

(1) Not less than 20 nor more than 80 acres of agricultural lands, or

(2) Not less than 200 nor more than 500 acres of first-class pastoral lands, or

(3) Not less than 500 nor more than 2,000 acres of second-class pastoral lands.

(b) The title to lands so leased shall remain in the United States. Applications for tracts shall be made to and granted by the commission under such regulations not in conflict with any provision of this title as the commission may prescribe. The commission shall, whenever tracts are available, enter into such a lease with any applicant who, in the opinion of the commission, is qualified to perform the conditions of such lease.

Mr. WALSH. I think it would be of benefit if the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. DOWELL] would explain for the purposes of the RECORD by whom these pastoral lands are classified and what is embraced within the two classes.

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to the gentleman that they are divided under an act of the Territorial Legislature of Hawaii, and are described and defined in the first part of the bill, which defines what they are and refers to them under the title and section of the act of the Territorial legislature.

Mr. WALSH. Is it because of the difference in the value or the availability that there is such a difference in the amount that the person may acquire between the two classes?

Mr. DOWELL. All the difference in the world. Heretofore a homestead has been something like 10 acres, which the commission said was not sufficient to maintain a family. It was thought by the commission and by your committee that the agricultural lands should be leased in not less than 20 acres, depending on their locality, up to 80 acres. The pastoral lands are divided into two classes and are used exclusively for pasture and not in any sense for agriculture. The best of these are well defined and well known and designated as first class. These will maintain a certain number of head of stock, and the less valuable a greater number of acres is required, because it would be necessary to have a larger tract to maintain the same number of stock.

Mr. WALSH. Can the gentleman state about how much agricultural land there is and how much pastoral land in the tract that is going into operation?

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to the gentleman that in the tract designated in the bill the agricultural lands aggregate about 40,000 acres. The other is all pastoral land.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman from Mississippi stated there were about 93,000 acres made available.

Mr. DOWELL. About 190,000 acres. That is the aggregate—between 185,000 and 200,000 acres.

Mr. WALSH. According to the report there are 169,000 acres of first-class pastoral lands, 316,000 second-class, and 50,000 of agricultural lands, of which 659,000 is sugar-cane land.

Mr. DOWELL. I think that is the entire land owned by the Government. The aggregate Government land is 1,600,000 acres in round numbers. This is a part of the entire tract. There are some 78,970 acres of agricultural lands owned by the Government, and only a part of this comes within the jurisdiction of this commission.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I will read from the hearings:

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is not what I have in mind, though. How much land is there in the Hawaiian Islands out of these 33,000 acres of highly improved land that could be reclaimed by irrigation or otherwise so as to become suitable for homestead entries?

Mr. SHINGLE. There would be at least 43,850 acres of the agricultural irrigable land.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That would be 43,000 acres outside of the 32,000? That would be enough, then, to give each of the 1,500 entrymen a homestead of sufficient size, in your opinion?

Mr. SHINGLE. I should think so.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I notice on page 7 that you make the requirement that under class 3 these second-class pastoral lands shall not be less than 500 acres.

Mr. DOWELL. That is correct.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. And under the section which follows, which relates to the descent of these lands, it goes in accordance with the law. Can the gentleman give us any information as to what the provisions of law are with reference to the descent of lands or interest in lands? What I have in mind is this: Does this provision conflict with what might be the law of descent of Hawaii?

Mr. DOWELL. No. There is a provision that if it is inherited by any other than by a native Hawaiian it must be disposed of within a limited time and kept within the ownership of those of Hawaiian blood.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The following section also touches this matter, and I will ask the question now—your lease terminates in 99 years?

Mr. DOWELL. That is correct.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Does that abrogate all rights of the lessee, or does he have some right or advantages by reason of being the occupant?

Mr. DOWELL. There is no provision in the bill extending the lease beyond the 99 years. It was assumed by your committee that long before that time the problem would be worked out. If the Hawaiians have been reasonably successful there would be a provision adopted giving them title to the land long before that time. If they are successful in homesteading under this provision, long before the lease expires the land could be turned over to these lessees.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 208. Each lease made under the authority granted the commission by the provisions of section 207 of this title and the tract in respect to which the lease is made, shall be deemed subject to the following conditions, whether or not stipulated in the lease:

(1) The lessee shall be a native Hawaiian.

(2) The lessee shall pay a rental of $1 a year for the tract and the lease shall be for a term of 99 years.

(3) The lessee shall occupy and commence to use or cultivate the tract as his home or farm within one year after the lease is made.

(4) The lessee shall thereafter, for at least such part of each year as the commission shall by regulation prescribe, so occupy and use or cultivate the tract on his own behalf.

(5) The lessee shall not in any manner transfer to, or mortgage, pledge, or otherwise hold for the benefit of, any other person, except a native Hawaiian and then only upon the approval of the commission, or agree so to transfer, mortgage, pledge, or otherwise hold, his interest in the tract. Such interest shall not, except in pursuance of such a transfer, mortgage, or pledge to or holding for or agreement with a native Hawaiian, be subject to attachment, levy, or sale upon court process. The lessee shall not sublet his interest in the tract or improvements thereon. Upon the death of the lessee his interest in the tract and improvements thereon shall vest under the limitations provided for homesteads in section 403 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii of 1915.

(6) The lessee shall pay all taxes assessed upon the tract and improvements thereon within 60 days after they become delinquent. If the lessee fails so to pay, the commission shall thereupon pay the taxes and have a lien therefor, as provided in section 216 of this title.

(7) The lessee shall perform such other conditions, not in conflict with any provision of this title, as the commission may stipulate in the lease.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I call attention to the subdivision No. 6. What is the ultimate result to come from a failure to pay taxes? You will note that they have a lien thereon.

Mr. DOWELL. The commission pays the taxes and holds that as a lien against the lessee.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. Suppose he continues indefinitely not to pay the taxes?

Mr. DOWELL. Under certain conditions, after a certain time, if the commission sees that he is not performing the conditions of the lease, upon full hearing by the commission they can cancel the lease and evict the tenant.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. The taxes are not collected except by forfeiture of his rights, there is no sale of the land to any person.

Mr. DOWELL. No; the commission pays the taxes and takes care of it and holds it as a lien against the lessee.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. What is the result of successive failures to pay the taxes?

Mr. DOWELL. The commission may, if it determines that he is not a proper person and that the conditions of the lease have been forfeited, evict the tenant. That is one of the conditions in the lease, that he must pay the taxes. The specifications are placed in the lease, and if they are not kept, the lease is forfeited or canceled.

Mr. EVANS of Nebraska. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. I would like to ask where this interest in the land goes if the lessee should die?

Mr. DOWELL. To his widow and children.

Mr. WALSH. The same as other property would.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes; the intent was that this should be inherited the same as any other property.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Subject to the limitations prescribed here. If it should go to anyone not within the thirty-second degree of Hawaiian blood, he can not hold it longer than two years.

Mr. DOWELL. I think that is correct.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. The heir to the Hawaiian takes his rights. If the heir happens not to be a Hawaiian, he must dispose of this with the permission of the commission.

Mr. WALSH. Within two years?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Within a certain time. I do not recall exactly what it is, but I think it is two years.

Mr. WALSH. He must dispose of it to a native Hawaiian.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes; with the consent of the homes commission.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 213. There is hereby established in the treasury of the Territory a revolving fund to be known as the "Hawaiian home-loan fund." The entire receipts derived from any leasing of public lands under the provisions of section 212 of this title and 30 per cent of the Territorial receipts derived from the leasing of cultivated sugar cane lands under any other provision of law or from water licenses shall be covered into the fund until the total amount of the moneys paid therein equals $1,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The 30 per cent of Territorial receipts derived from the leasing of sugar-cane lands or from water licenses is to be put into this revolving fund. That, of course, comes from the receipts paid into the Territorial treasury by others than native Hawaiians, I assume.

Mr. DOWELL. That is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Will taking such a large share of the receipts for this purpose in any way hamper the Territory?

Mr. DOWELL. Further on in the bill there is an explanation of this. It is the purpose of this bill, if enacted into law, that the lands shall bring in, perhaps, three times as much income as is now derived from these lands. We have provided further in the bill for an amendment to the organic act giving the power to withhold the withdrawal clause from the lease, which it is estimated by the commission who testified before the committee will increase this from about $150,000 up to four or five hundred thousand dollars per annum.

Mr. WALSH. The receipts from the land leased under the provisions of this act will be very small, I suppose—a dollar a year.

Mr. DOWELL. That is negligible.

Mr. WALSH. The receipts from the leasing of public lands under section 212—that is, lands which will be leased by the public lands commission, which do not come under the provision of this act—will amount to how much? Does the gentleman think the revenue derived from that will be greater after the passage of this act than it has been heretofore?

Mr. DOWELL. If the commission exercises the option authorized in this bill, the rentals will amount to some three times as much as they are now receiving. In other words, if the land commissioner leases the cane lands, some 32,000 acres now under lease, for what they are actually worth, and if the Territory receives the amount that the leases should bring, the estimate is that the Territory will receive some $400,000, minimum, annually, and probably a very much greater sum than that.

Mr. WALSH. Then the balance, of course, will have to be made up from water licenses and cultivated sugar-cane lands.

Mr. DOWELL. Yes. This fund comes from two sources, from the lease of sugar-cane lands and water licenses, and the 30 per cent that is taken for this purpose will leave a much greater sum in the Treasury than is now collected by the commissioner for the rental of all of the valuable cane lands and water licenses.

Mr. WALSH. How does the gentleman figure that out?

Mr. DOWELL. Because they have been leased at a much less rental than they are actually worth.

Mr. WALSH. Are they going to terminate those leases?

Mr. DOWELL. They do terminate, beginning, I think, the 1st of June of this year, and next year on June 1, I think, another large number of leases expire.

Mr. WALSH. And the rental will be so increased that the application of the 30 per cent will be more than taken care of?

Mr. DOWELL. Yes. As I understand it, it is the purpose of this legislation to authorize the leasing of these lands for a definite term of years and to secure for them the actual rental value. That is the purpose of enacting this legislation and amending the organic act.

Mr. WALSH. How long will it be before the revolving fund equals the sum of $1,000,000?

Mr. DOWELL. A number of years, I have not estimated how many. It will be a number of years before the 30 per cent will aggregate $1,000,000.

Mr. WALSH. If the amount comes in $400,000 from the leasing of public lands and 30 per cent of the water licenses and the sugar-cane land, and the sugar-cane lands rental is to be increased, it ought not to take so very long.

Mr. DOWELL. They are unable to receive more than $1,000,000.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Mr. Chairman, I will state that 30 per cent of the $500,000, and that is a low estimate, of the rental from these places would leave $350,000 to go into the Territorial treasury. In other words, 70 per cent of the rent that they will be able to collect from these leases hereafter will be twice as much, and perhaps nearly three times as much, as 100 per cent is now. The 70 per cent that is left to the Territory will be very much more than they are now receiving, when they are getting 100 per cent.

Mr. WALSH. How long does the gentleman think it will be before the revolving fund reaches the $1,000,000 mark?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I think five or six years, at least. One hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year for five years is $750,000. To that must be added what they get for water licenses. It will be six or seven years.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think that this language in the bill will permit any of this fund to be used for the purpose of making loans before it reaches the million-dollar mark?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. It is our intention that it should. We intend they shall have the right to make loans, and it is our expectation they will do it as soon as they get the first $150,000.

It is thought that there probably will not be more than 1,500 or 2,000 of these Hawaiian families who would want to take advantage of this law.

Mr. WALSH. It says that there is established a revolving fund, and then goes on to say how it shall be made up until the total amount of money paid in equals $1,000,000, and I was wondering whether this language in that section would permit any of this fund to be used before the revolving fund amounts to a million dollars.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Well, I think so. Our thought was that a million was simply a limitation upon the total amount that can be paid into this fund and that that would permit it to operate right from the start.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 214. The commission is hereby authorized to make loans from the fund to the lessee of any tract or the successor to his interest therein. Such loans may be made for the following purposes:

(1) The erection of dwellings on any tract and the undertaking of other permanent improvements thereon;

(2) The purchase of live stock and farm equipment; and

(3) Otherwise assisting in the development of tracts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This prescribes the purposes for which these loans may be utilized. What is the intention of the committee in using the term "farm equipment"? What would that embrace?

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I think that has quite a definite meaning.

Mr. WALSH. It may out in the gentleman's country, and I assume perhaps it has.

Mr. DOWELL. I suppose in Massachusetts they may not use them extensively, but I think it has a very definite meaning.

Mr. WALSH. Would it include seed or cuttings of plants?

Mr. DOWELL. I think not. This is merely equipment for farm purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Tools?

Mr. DOWELL. Tools.

Mr. WALSH. Cultivators, tractors; would it include live stock?

Mr. DOWELL. Anything that can be used for cultivating the land. I do not think——

Mr. WALSH. Would it include live stock, does the gentleman think?

Mr. DOWELL. I think not. There is a provision here specifically——

Mr. WALSH. Purchase of live stock and farm equipment.

Mr. DOWELL. Farm equipment, I think, has a generally understood meaning.

Mr. WALSH. What is the third subdivision, where you say "otherwise assisting in the development of tracts"?

Mr. DOWELL. I will say to the gentleman that that has a very indefinite meaning, and it was only placed there because the committee believed the commission ought to have some little latitude in the way of these loans, and there might be instances where the homesteader would need funds in order to cultivate the land that would not come within the provisions of the two former divisions, and it was only a saving clause to give this commission an opportunity if a case developed where some money should be loaned that was not covered by the other provisions.

Mr. WALSH. Well, would that permit the installation of an irrigation station?

Mr. DOWELL. Oh, I think not. There is a specific provision in the bill for that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. How otherwise would they permit this money to be utilized for assisting in the developing of tracts?

Mr. DOWELL. As I have stated, it is indefinite; but there may be conditions arising where it would be necessary to make these loans. As it is only for the purpose of starting the homesteader in his work, some condition may arise where the loan will be very beneficial to the homesteader and very advantageous to the commission in getting a good homesteader upon the land who could not otherwise go upon the land. That is the purpose of this provision, though, as I stated, it is quite indefinite.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. WALSH. I ask for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. WALSH. But the gentleman would agree, I assume, under his definition, that all that would be necessary would be to boil this section down to one authorization, to make loans for that specific purpose, for assisting in developing tracts, and that would include everything?

Mr. DOWELL. Possibly the gentleman's interpretation is correct.

Mr. WALSH. Well, does not the gentleman believe that is rather a broad discretion to vest in this commission, after detailing two specific purposes for which this money might be utilized, and then say, if necessary in any other way they wanted to use it?

Mr. DOWELL. I concede it is a broad and a very generous provision for the commission and that they can go some distance under this general authorization, but believing as we do that this commission would have one purpose and that is to get a homesteader who was properly equipped and suited to build a homestead, we felt we could trust the commission to protect the Treasury and at the same time assist the homesteader to get a start on his homestead.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 215. Each contract of loan with the lessee or the successor to his interest in the tract shall be held subject to the following conditions, whether or not stipulated in the contract of loan:

(1) The amount of loans to any one borrower outstanding at any one time shall not exceed $3,000.

(2) The loans shall be repaid upon an amortization plan by means of a fixed number of annual installments sufficient to cover (a) interest on the unpaid principal at the rate of 5 per cent per annum, and (b) such amount of the principal as will extinguish the debt within an agreed period not exceeding 30 years. The moneys received by the commission from any installment paid upon such loan shall be covered into the fund. The payment of any installment due may, with the concurrence therein of at least four of the five members of the commission, be postponed in whole or in part by the commission for such reasons as it deems good and sufficient and until such later date as it deems advisable. Such postponed payments shall continue to bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on the unpaid principal and interest.

(3) In case the borrower's interest in his tract or his successor's interest therein is transferred to or mortgaged, pledged, or otherwise held for the benefit of any native Hawaiian, or agreed so to be transferred, mortgaged, pledged, or otherwise held, as permitted by paragraph (5) of section 208 of this title, the commission may at its option declare all annual installments upon the loan immediately due and payable or permit the successor to the borrower's interest in the tract to assume the contract of loan. In case of the borrower's death, the commission shall permit the successor to the borrower's interest in the tract to assume the contract of loan.

(4) No part of the moneys loaned shall be devoted to any purpose other than those for which the loan is made.

(5) The borrower or the successor to his interest in the tract shall comply with such other conditions, not in conflict with any provision of this title, as the commission may stipulate in the contract of loan.

(6) The borrower or the successor to his interest in the tract shall comply with the conditions enumerated in section 208, and with the provisions of section 209, of this title in respect to the lease of the tract.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, when I heard the very able and interesting statement of the Delegate from Hawaii on yesterday in reference to this measure I realized the desirability of the legislation, but I had not realized until to-day its great importance. There were some of us who had anticipated that to-day would be given up to a consideration of the so-called adjusted compensation legislation for the benefit of the World War veterans. However, this legislation before us seems to have been of sufficient importance to have displaced that program. I feel that this legislation is of such great importance that we should have a larger membership here to give it consideration, and I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Forty-one gentlemen are present, not a quorum, and the Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Thereupon the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having under consideration the bill H. R. 13500, finding itself without a quorum, the roll was ordered called, and that 295 Members, a quorum, had answered to their names, and that he presented a list of the absentees for insertion in the Journal and RECORD.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 216. The commission may require the borrower to insure, in such amount as the commission may by regulation prescribe, all live stock and dwellings and other permanent improvements upon his tract, purchased or constructed out of any moneys loaned from the fund; or in lieu thereof the commission may directly take out such insurance and add the cost thereof to the amount of the annual installments payable under the amortization plan. Whenever the commission has reason to believe that the borrower has violated any condition enumerated in paragraphs (2), (4), (5), or (6) of section 215 of this title, the commission shall give due notice and afford opportunity for a hearing to the borrower or the successor to his interest in the tract, as the case demands. If upon such hearing the commission finds that the borrower has violated the condition, the commission may declare all annual installments immediately due and payable, notwithstanding any provision in the contract of loan to the contrary. The commission shall have a lien upon the borrower's or lessee's interest in his tract, dwellings and other permanent improvements thereon, and his live stock to the amount of all annual installments due and unpaid and of all taxes upon such tract and improvements paid by the commission. Such liens shall have priority over any other obligation for which the tract, dwellings, other improvements, or live stock may be security. The commission may, at such time as it deems advisable, enforce any such lien by declaring the borrower's interest in his tract or his successor's interest therein, as the case may be, together with the dwellings and other permanent improvements thereon and the live stock, to be forfeited, and the lease in respect to such tract canceled, and shall thereupon order the tract to be vacated and the live stock surrendered within a reasonable time. The right to the use and occupancy of the Hawaiian home lands contained in such tract shall thereupon revest in the commission, and the commission maye take possession of the tract and the improvements thereon: Provided, That the commissoin shall pay to the borrower any difference in his favor between (1) the fair value of the live stock and any improvements in respect to the tract made by the borrower or any predecessor to his interest in the tract and (2) the amount of the lien.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to the language contained on page 15, lines 7 to 11, on the revesting in the commission of these lands after failure to pay interest. Under those circumstances, what will the commission do with the land? Can they reassign it?

Mr. DOWELL. The commission will reassign it as though no transfer had been made.

Mr. WALSH. For another term of 99 years?

Mr. DOWELL. For another term of 99 years.

Mr. WALSH. Can they handle these lands that have reverted in any different manner than the original tracts so selected?

Mr. DOWELL. The bill provides they are to be handled precisely as they were originally.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 221. (a) When used in this section—

(1) The term "water license" means any license issued by the commissioner of public lands, granting to any person the right to the use of government owned water; and

(2) The term "surplus water" means so much of any Government-owned water covered by a water license, or so much of any privately owned water, as is in excess of the quantity required for the use of the licensee or owner, respectively.

(b) All water licenses issued after the passage of this act shall be deemed subject to the condition, whether or not stipulated in the license, that the licensee shall, upon the demand of the commission, grant to it the right to use, free of all charge, any water which the commission deems necessary adequately to supply the live stock or the domestic needs of individuals upon any tract.

(c) In order adequately to supply live stock or the domestic needs of individuals upon any tract, the commission is authorized (1) to use free of all charge Government-owned water not covered by any water license or covered by a water license issued after the passage of this act, or covered by a water license issued previous to the passage of this act but containing a reservation of such water for the benefit of the public, and (2) to contract with any person for the right to use, or to acquire, under eminent-domain proceedings similar, as near as may be, to the proceedings provided in respect to land by sections 667 to 678, inclusive, of the Revised Laws of Hawaii of 1915, the right to use any privately owned surplus water or any Government-owned surplus water covered by a water license issued previous to the passage of this act but not containing a reservation of such water for the benefit of the public. Any such acquirement shall be held to be for a public use and purpose. The commission may institute the eminent-domain proceedings in its own name.

(d) The commission is authorized, for the additional purpose of adequately irrigating any tract, to use, free of all charge, Government-owned water upon the island of Molokai and Government-owned surplus water tributary to the Waimea River upon the island of Kauai, not covered by a water license or covered by a water license issued after the passage of this act. Any water license issued after the passage of this act and covering any such Government-owned water shall be deemed subject to the condition, whether or not stipulated therein, that the licensee shall, upon the demand of the commission, grant to it the right to use, free of all charge, any of the water upon the island of Molokai and any of the surplus water tributary to the Waimea River upon the island of Kauai, which is covered by the license and which the commission deems necessary for the additional purpose of adequately irrigating any tract.

(e) All rights conferred on the commission by this section, to use, contract for, or acquire the use of water, shall be deemed to include the right to use, contract for, or acquire the use of any ditch or pipe line constructed for the distribution and control of such water and necessary to such use by the commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Under what jurisdiction are these water licenses, the licenses to use surplus water, now? Are they under the public land commissioner, or do they have a——

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, the commissioner of public lands now issues the leases to these water companies.

Mr. WALSH. Then I would like to ask the gentleman about subparagraph (b). It says:

All water licenses issued after the passage of this act—

That is, issued by the public land commissioner—

shall be deemed subject to the condition, whether or not stipulated in the license, that the licensee—

The person to whom the license runs—shall, upon demand of the commission, grant to it the right to use, free of all charge, any water which the commission deems necessary adequately to supply the live stock or the domestic needs of the individuals upon any tract.

Does not that involve conflict of jurisdiction there?

Mr. DOWELL. I think not, because it would only be reserved when this license is granted—the use of so much of the water as may be necessary for the domestic use of the homesteader. It was not intended that this should go beyond that point, because it might take more than could be secured in certain licenses; but it was thought that the land could not be used at all unless there could be water furnished for domestic use.

Mr. WALSH. They get this water for domestic use and for live stock without additional charge?

Mr. DOWELL. Without additional charge. And it would go in the granting of the license. In other words, the license would not be granted except with this reservation.

Mr. WALSH. But on these tracts that are occupied by native Hawaiians—who will pay for installing the water on them?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That would not involve any ditching. This is not for anything except domestic use and the use of the live stock. It simply means practically taking a pipe and tapping a main wherever the supply is for domestic use and the use of live stock. There would be no ditching.

Mr. WALSH. Subparagraph (e) says that the rights conferred on the commission to acquire the use of water shall include the right to use, contract for, or acquire the use of any ditch or pipe line constructed for the distribution and control of such water and necessary for the use of the commission. They can not use it for irrigation purposes?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Nothing except as provided there in subparagraph (e) in Molokai and on the Waimea River, on the island of Kauai. With that exception they can not use the water except for domestic purposes and for live stock. In Molokai the homes commission has not established water works. On the Waimea River they can take the surplus water, water that other people do not use, if more than necessary, and the commission, when it does that, can have the right to condemn.

Mr. WALSH. This did not involve the installation of irrigation works there and having the cost of it imposed on the people who occupy these tracts?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No. They are authorized to do that by another section here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 304. The first, second, and third paragraphs of section 73 of the Hawaiian organic act are hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 73. (a) That when used in this section—

"(1) The term 'commissioner' means the commissioner of public lands of the Territory of Hawaii;

"(2) The term 'land board' means the board of public lands, as provided in subdivision (1) of this section;

"(3) The term 'public lands' includes all lands in the Territory of Hawaii classed as Government or Crown lands previous to August 15, 1895, or acquired by the Government upon or subsequent to such date by purchase, exchange, escheat, or the exercise of the right of eminent domain, or in any other manner, except (1) lands designated in section 203 of the Hawaiian Homes Commission act, 1920, (2) lands set apart or reserved by Executive order by the President, (3) lands set aside or withdrawn by the governor under the provisions of subdivision (g) of this section, (4) sites of public buildings, lands used for roads, street landings, nurseries, parks, tracts reserved for forest growth or conservation of water supply, or other public purposes, and (5) lands to which the United States has relinquished the absolute fee and ownership, unless subsequently placed under the control of the commissioner and given the status of public lands in accordance with the provisions of this act, the Hawaiian Homes Commission act, 1920, or the Revised Laws of Hawaii of 1915; and

"(4) The term 'person' includes individual, partnership, corporation, and association.

"(b) Any term defined or described in section 347 or 351 of the Revised Laws of Hawaii of 1915, except a term defined in subdivision (a) of this section, shall, whenever used in this section, if not inconsistent with the context or any provision of this section, have the same meaning as given it by such definition or description.

"(c) The laws of Hawaii relating to public lands, the settlement of boundaries, and the issuance of patents on land-commission awards, except as changed by this act, shall continue in force until Congress shall otherwise provide. Subject to the approval of the President, all sales, grants, leases, and other dispositions of the public domain, and agreements concerning the same, and all franchises granted by the Hawaiian government in conformity with the laws of Hawaii between the 7th day of July, 1898, and the 28th day of September, 1899, are hereby ratified and confirmed. In said laws 'land patent' shall be substituted for 'royal patent'; 'commissioner of public lands' for 'minister of the interior,' 'agent of public lands,' and 'commissioners of public lands,' or their equivalents; and the words 'that I am a citizen of the United States' or 'that I have declared my intention to become a citizen of the United States, as required by law,' for the words 'that I am a citizen by birth (or naturalization) of the Republic of Hawaii' or 'that I have received letters of denization under the Republic of Hawaii' or 'that I have received a certificate of special right of citizenship from the Republic of Hawaii.'

"(d) No lease of agricultural land or of undeveloped arid public land which is capable of being converted into agricultural land by the development, for irrigation purposes, of either the underlying or adjacent waters, or both, shall be granted, sold, or renewed by the government of the Territory of Hawaii for a longer period than 15 years. Each such lease shall be sold at public auction to the highest bidder after due notice as provided in subdivision (h) of this section and the laws of the Territory of Hawaii. Each such notice shall state all the terms and conditions of the sale. The land, or any part thereof so leased, may at any time during the term of the lease be withdrawn from the operation thereof for homestead or public purposes, in which case the rent reserved shall be reduced in proportion to the value of the part so withdrawn. Every such lease shall contain a provision to that effect: Provided, That the commissioner may, with the approval of the governor and at least two-thirds of the members of the land board, omit such withdrawal provision from the lease of any lands suitable for the cultivation of sugar cane whenever he deems it advantageous to the Territory of Hawaii. Land so leased shall not be subject to such right of withdrawal.

"(e) All funds arising from the sale or lease or other disposal of public lands shall be appropriated by the laws of the government of the Territory of Hawaii and applied to such uses and purposes for the benefit of the inhabitants of the Territory of Hawaii as are consistent with the joint resolution of annexation, approved July 7, 1898.

"(f) No person shall be entitled to receive any certificate of occupation, right of purchase lease, cash freehold agreement, or special homestead agreement who, or whose husband or wife, has previously taken or held more than 10 acres of land under any such certificate, lease, or agreement made or issued after May 27, 1910, or under any homestead lease or patent based thereon; or who, or whose husband or wife, or both of them, owns other land in the Territory the combined area of which and the land in question exceeds 80 acres; or who is an alien, unless he has declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States as provided by law. No person who has so declared his intention and taken or held under any such certificate, lease, or agreement shall continue so to hold or become entitled to a homestead lease or patent of the land unless he becomes a citizen within five years after so taking.

"(g) No public land for which any such certificate, lease, or agreement is issued after May 27, 1910, or any part thereof or interest therein or control thereof, shall, without the written consent of the commissioner and governor, thereafter, whether before or after a homestead lease or patent has been issued thereon, be or be contracted to be in any way, directly or indirectly, by process of law or otherwise, conveyed, mortgaged, leased, or otherwise transferred to or acquired or held by or for the benefit of any alien or corporation; or, before or after the issuance of a homestead lease or before the issuance of a patent, to or by or for the benefit of any other person; or, after the issuance of a patent, to or by or for the benefit of any person who owns, holds, or controls, directly or indirectly, other land or the use thereof the combined area of which and the land in question exceeds 80 acres. The prohibitions of this paragraph shall not apply to transfers or acquisitions by inheritance or between tenants in common."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, in line 16, page 25, after the word "from," I move to strike out the comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DOWELL moves to amend, on page 25, line 16, after the word "from," by striking out the comma.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chair announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division in order to check up.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 48, noes 0.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 306. The sixth paragraph of section 73 of the Hawaiian organic act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"(j) The commissioner, with the approval of the governor, may give to any person (1) who is a citizen of the United States or who has legally declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States and hereafter becomes such, and (2) who has, or whose predecessors in interest have, improved any parcel of public lands and resided thereon continuously for the 10 years next preceding the application to purchase, a preference right to purchase so much of such parcel and such adjoining land as may reasonably be required for a home, at a fair price, to be determined by three disinterested citizens to be appointed by the governor. In the determination of such purchase price, the commissioner may, if he deems it just and reasonable, disregard the value of the improvements on such parcel and adjoining land. If such parcel of public lands is reserved for public purposes, either for the use of the United States or the Territory of Hawaii, the commissioner may, with the approval of the governor, grant to such person a preference right to purchase public lands which are of similar character, value, and area, and which are situated in the same land district. The privilege granted by this paragraph shall not extend to any original lessee or to an assignee of an entire lease of public lands."

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to obtain information. What is the number of acres that is considered to be a reasonable amount of land for a home?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. To what line does the gentleman refer?

Mr. WATSON. In line 24, which provides that the commissioner shall parcel out the amount of land deemed necessary for a home. I was wondering how many acres it would require.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I will state to the gentleman that is the present law, which we do not change in that respect in this bill. But for first-class agricultural land about 10 or 15 acres, and sometimes 20.

Mr. WATSON. Not as much as in this country, of course?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. No. It is a very small acreage.

Mr. WATSON. What is raised upon such small plats to enable the natives to make a living?

Mr. HUMPHREYS. They raise pineapples, and sugar beets, and various vegetables. They can raise hay, but they can not cure it.

Mr. WATSON. Can they grow sufficient produce to provide for their subsistence.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. Yes. It is not limited to 10 acres. It can go higher. Ordinarily they can. This taro that they speak of is what the ladies make their poi out of. It is the favorite dish. They can grow that on a small acreage. They all have fishing rights. They can get along very well on 10 or 20 acres of land, provided it is agricultural land.

Mr. WATSON. I thank the gentleman. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

(e) Whenever after the passage of this amendatory act, there first occurs a vacancy in the office of district judge, such office is abolished and the district court shall thereafter consist of one district judge. Such judge shall, in addition to the powers and duties incident to his office as district judge, exercise all the powers and perform all duties previously incident to the office so abolished.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, this is a very valuable discussion, but I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want the gentleman to assume my prerogatives over there. [Laughter.]

Thes CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan withdraws the point of no quorum. The Clerk will read.

SEC. 312. Section 92 of the Hawaiian organic act is hereby amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 92. That the following officers shall receive the following annual salaries to be paid by the United States: The governor, $8,000; the secretary of the Territory, $4,500; the chief justice of the supreme court of the Territory, $7,500; the associate justices of the supreme court, $7,000 each; the judges of the circuit courts, $6,000 each; the United States district attorney, $5,000; the United States marshal, $4,000. The governor shall receive annually from the United States, in addition to his salary, (1) the sum of $1,000 for stationery, postage, and incidentals, and (2) his traveling expenses while absent from the capital on official business. The governor is authorized to employ a private secretary who shall receive an annual salary of $3,000, to be paid by the United States."

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers a committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. DOWELL: Page 33, line 12, after the word "of," strike out the figures "1,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WALSH. I should like to ask the members of the committee how much the United States marshal out there gets now.

Mr. DOWELL. Three thousand dollars.

Mr. WALSH. It seems to me that these are rather extraordinary increases to all these Government officials there. We have United States marshals in some of the largest States who are not getting over $3,000, and I understand that all these salaries in this paragraph have been increased practically $1,000. Is that so?

Mr. DOWELL. From $500 to $1,000, I think.

Mr. WALSH. Certainly the cost of living has not borne down as severely on the inhabitants of this Territory as it has in this country. I can not quite understand why the committee have been so generous in this matter. What testimony did they have as to the necessity for granting the thousand-dollar increase?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Mr. Chairman, we have a peculiar situation there. I can readily understand that some of the Members here may wonder why larger salaries should be paid to the officials in Hawaii than you pay in some of your States. You must understand that Hawaii is a Territory which has a commerce back of it of $150,000,000. That fact alone shows that it is not a one-horse Territory and deserves consideration. You pay the Federal judges in Hawaii $7,500 a year, while our circuit judges are getting only $4,000, and any one of our circuit judges does five times as much work as the Federal judges in Hawaii do. Our Territory recognizes the worth of even police magistrates. We pay our police magistrates in Honolulu more than you pay our circuit judges. We pay our attorney general more than you pay the governor. It is not easy to get good men to serve in these places. To get good men you must have salaries commensurate with the positions that they hold. You speak of high cost of living. Why, in Hawaii we import most of our food products from the mainland. If it is true of the profiteering that is going on here, imagine, gentlemen, what it costs us to live in far-off Hawaii.

Mr. WALSH. It is estimated that you have only 200,000 people there in the Territory, a much less number than in most of the States.

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. That is true, so far as population goes, but when you consider our commerce and our contributions to the National Treasury, you will find that we are warranted in asking for this increase.

Take the case of the marshal. In order to properly carry out his duties, it is necessary that he travel from one island to the other, necessitating long ocean voyages, and as the islands are volcanic, in some sections he must travel on horseback. A salary of $3,000 does not seem sufficient for a good man in such a position.

Mr. WALSH. You have been able to get them heretofore at the salaries paid, have you not? You have had no difficulty in filling these positions at the salaries that have been paid?

Mr. KALANIANAOLE. Oh, we have had difficulty in getting good men. We have had difficulty in getting good men for our judges.

Mr. WALSH. I am glad that this is a Territory, and that this bill is reported from the Committee on the Territories, because if it were reported from an ordinary committee we would not stop increasing salaries at a thousand dollars a clip. I shall make no more objection than what I have said, and thank the gentleman for the information.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 401. All acts or parts of acts, either of the Congress of the United States or of the Territory of Hawaii, to the extent that they are incopsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

Mr. ALMON. Mr. Chairman, I intended to make some remarks in support of this bill under general debate, but only a short time was allowed for general debate, and I yielded to the Delegate from Hawaii [Mr. KALANIANAOLE] the time that was offered to me.

The legislative commission of the Territory of Hawaii which visited Washington in the month of February last, consisting of Gov. McCarthy, Attorney General Irwin, Senator Shingle, Senator Wise, and Representatives Rawlings and Lyman, of the Hawaiian House of Representatives, were given a hearing before the Committee on the Territories of the House, of which I have the honor of being a member. The facts brought out in said hearings, especially the information furnished by the members of the legislative commission, are most interesting and instructive. I invite the attention of Members of the House to those hearings, because they not only give a history of the Hawaiian Islands but a very accurate and interesting account of the islands and those good people at this time. The members of this commission are all high-class and intelligent gentlemen, and made a most favorable impression on the committee.

This commission brought the expression of the Legislature of the Hawaiian Islands recommending that such legislation as is incorporated in this bill be enacted by Congress.

The committee was unanimous in reporting the bill, and very few amendments have been made. I am glad that the time has come when it can be passed. I am sure it is just and right and in the interest of those good people, and I trust it will pass by unanimous vote. [Applause.]

The Clerk resumed and completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. DOWELL. I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendations that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SANFORD, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee, having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 13500) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. The question is on the amendments. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put the amendments in gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. CRAMTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CRAMTON. If the House adjourns at this point the passage of this bill on Monday will be in order, will it not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. CRAMTON. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman withhold that a moment to allow a report from the Committee on Enrolled Bills?

Mr. CRAMTON. I withhold it for a moment.

ENROLLED BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS SIGNED.

Mr. RAMSEY, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill and joint resolutions of the following titles, when the Speaker signed the same:

H. J. Res. 327. Joint resolution repealing the joint resolution of April 6, 1917, declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and Germany, and the joint resolution of December 7, 1917, declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and the Austro-Hungarian Government; and

H. R. 12626. An act for the relief of certain persons to whom, or their predecessors, patents were issued to public lands along the Snake River in the State of Idaho under an erroneous survey made in 1883.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to an enrolled joint resolution of the following title:

S. J. Res. 189. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the accounting officers of the Treasury to allow credit to the disbursing clerk of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance in certain cases.

CALL OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks he must recognize the gentleman from Michigan, if he wishes to be recognized.

Mr. CRAMTON. I must insist on the point that there is no quorum present.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan makes the point of order that no quorum is present. The Chair will count. There is no quorum present.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves a call of the House.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. DOWELL) there were—ayes 57, noes 0.

Accordingly a call of the House was ordered.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The doors were opened.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CRAMTON) there were 220 ayes and 14 noes.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. DOWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, had further insisted upon amendment numbered 93 to the bill, and had asked a further conference with the House, and had appointed Mr. GRONNA, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. GORE as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

AGRICULTURAL BILL.

Mr. HAUGEN, chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, presented a conference report on the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, for printing under the rule.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. EVANS of Nevada, for several weeks, on account of the serious illness of his mother and important business.

To Mr. LARSEN, for three days, on account of attending the meeting of the board of trustees of the Georgia Normal School.

HOUSE OF BURGESSES AND LANDING OF THE PILGRIM FATHERS.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing an address on the significance of the three hundredth anniversary of the House of Burgesses and the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, whose address is it?

Mr. FESS. It is signed by the Vice President of the United States, ex-President Taft, three or four members of the Cabinet, and others.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

AMERICAN MERCHANT MARINE.

Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 10378) to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, disagree to the Senate amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. R. 10378. An act to provide for the promotion and maintenance of the American merchant marine, to repeal certain emergency legislation, and to provide for the disposition, regulation, and use of property acquired thereunder, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. GREENE of Massachusetts, Mr. EDMONDS, Mr. ROWE, Mr. HARDY of Texas, and Mr. LAZARO.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this bill just passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the Hawaiian bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I make the same request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by publishing a letter written by Secretary Houston to the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee in response to a letter written to him.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The letter is as follows:

MAY 18, 1920.

DEAR MR. FORDNEY: I received your letter of May 1, with the inclosed copies of bills H. R. 13798, introduced by Mr. JOHNSON, and H. R. 13799, introduced by Mr. RAINEY, to provide for the payment of adjusted compensation to the veterans of the World War. Both bills impose an 80 per cent war-profits tax.

The most serious aspect of this compensation matter, as I pointed out when I had the honor of appearing before the committee, is the proposal greatly to add, especially at this time, to the present grievous burdens resting upon the people of the Nation and upon the Treasury. The method of financing the proposal raises grave problems, but is secondary. The very heavy burdens which will rest upon the Treasury by reason of laws already enacted, including particularly the recent railroad laws, which it is estimated will entail an expenditure of approximately $1,000,000,000, and also by reason of the delay in making provision to realize upon the Government's investments in railroads and ships, taken in connection with the existing credit situation, suggest the need of grave consideration of the question whether, quite aside from and in addition to any taxation which it might be necessary to impose in order to pay a bonus to the soldiers, it may not be necessary to provide for meeting the necessities of the Government in larger measure from taxation. The total indebtedness of the Government maturing within three years, represented by Treasury certificates, war savings certificates, and Victory notes, is in the neighborhood of $8,000,000,000. It is no longer possible to finance the current needs of the Government in part by the issue of Treasury certificates except on onerous terms, which reflect upon the value of the Government's long-time bonds and depreciate them in the market. Furthermore, it would appear to be bad economy and bad finance for the Government to borrow money on short-term certificates of indebtedness (maturing within three to six months) to be invested for a term of years in railroads and ships.

It is a matter of serious concern to have the Government appearing in the market every few weeks for loans. Certainly nothing ought to be done to add to existing credit expansion that can possibly be avoided. The result would be to increase prices and to make a difficult situation less satisfactory. In the circumstances obviously the Government ought to appear in the market for loans as infrequently as possible and for the lowest sums. Additional taxes are also undesirable, but they may be less undesirable than borrowing. They would at least have the effect in part of enforcing economies. The first thing to do, I am sure you will agree, is to keep Federal expenditures down to the minimum, and it is obvious also that other governmental jurisdictions and private individuals should do likewise.

I beg to submit to your committee for its serious consideration the question whether, all things considered, it would not now be advisable to seek out additional sources of revenue to meet the current requirements of the Government over and above any additional revenue which would be necessary if the soldier-bonus plan is determined upon, in order to obviate the necessity of continuing in considerable measure to meet them by borrowing. Having these things in mind, I hesitate to express an opinion concerning the bills which you have submitted to me, taken by themselves. There are many grave objections, both to the proposed new war-profits tax and to the alternative measure—a sales tax—which, I understand, your committee is considering. If, in view of the urgent needs of the Government for money to meet its requirements, your committee concludes that it will be wise to raise a larger amount by taxation and desires any suggestions from the Treasury, I shall be glad to have the experts place themselves at its disposal. In the meantime I refrain from making any further comment on either proposal.

For the reasons indicated, and for other reasons, I think it would be highly unfortunate for any new obligations to be placed upon the Treasury through the enactment of the bonus proposal in any form, however financed.

Very truly, yours, D. F. HOUSTON.

Hon. JOSEPH W. FORDNEY,
Chairman Committee on Ways and Means,
House of Representatives.

REPORT FROM WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to report, at any time before midnight to-night, two bills unanimously approved by the Ways and Means Committee.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to report before midnight two bills unanimously agreed upon by the Committee on Ways and Means. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. What kind of bills are they?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. One relates to administration measures and one refers to personal service corporations, the tax of which as now levied is cut out by the Supreme Court.

Mr. BLANTON. Neither of them is a tariff bill?

Draw us near to Thyself. Give us ever the light of Thy presence upon our pathway. May our hearts be constantly in attune with the Divine. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—UTAH-IDAHO SUGAR CO.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent at this time to present a question that has particular reference to myself. I will say to Senators that it will not take more than 15 minutes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Senator from Utah will proceed.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we all recognize the extreme sugar shortage in the United States as well as in all the world, and the serious consequences following such a shortage; and no one can object to any action that can be taken to control or regulate the lawful distribution of the same, but when any department of our Government undertakes to secure the defeat or the election of a United States Senator through an investigation of the affairs of a sugar company it is time that such a contemptible practice be called to the attention of the public.

I am positive the honest people of this country will not approve of any such rotten politics. This very thing is taking place in the State of Utah, and to prove this statement I have but to recite what has in the past and is taking place to-day.

In the first place, I wish to go back some months when this unthinkable proposition was first brought to my attention by Gen. Richard W. Young, during his visit to Washington as the attorney of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. He was here to learn, if possible, if there was any truth in the rumor that the Federal Trade Commission was going to make an investigation of the affairs of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co.; and if so, upon what basis and for what reason. Think of my surprise when he told me that he had no doubt the investigation would be made some time before the next election, and among other causes assigned was the one that it would help to defeat me for reelection. I could not see how any investigation could possibly affect me, for I have never been an officer of the company; I have nothing to do with its management; I have never done anything for the company that I would not willingly have done for any other business organization in the United States; that I own but 440 shares of the capital stock of the company, valued even to-day at $9 per share, and the same came to me through the purchase at public sale of about 76 shares of the stock once owned by my father's estate, and the balance of my present holdings came to me by my subscribing $1,500 to build a sugar factory at Dewey, Idaho, which proved a failure and was dismantled and removed to Utah by the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co., after which I received stock in the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. for my stock invested in the sugar factory at Dewey, Idaho; that I never bought a share of the stock other than the 76 shares already mentioned; that I have never sold a share of the stock of the company in my life; and that the dividend I receive from the company is $22 per month.

So, under these conditions I paid no more attention to the matter until yesterday, when I received information of a telegram that had been sent from Salt Lake City by one George E. Sanders to Attorney H. W. Beer, of the Federal Trade Commission, at Rigby, Idaho, to which I will call the Senate's attention later. Senators will remember that last December I called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the Attorney General had fixed the price at which the producers of beet sugar could sell their sugar at 10½ cents per pound, while at the same time he allowed the cane-sugar producers of Louisiana to sell their sugar at 17 cents per pound.

The beginning of this year the sugar situation became alarming. The President had refused, upon the advice of Dr. Taussig and against the advice of the other members of the Sugar Equalization Board, to purchase the Cuban crop at 5½ cents for Cuban raws, and shortly following that decision wild speculation in Cuban sugars began and prices advanced rapidly. The beet-sugar producers considered the situation intolerable, and the officers of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. decided to request that I take up the question with the Attorney General, and following is the part, and the only part, that I have taken in which the price of sugar was involved.

On January 7 I received a telegram signed by officials of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. reading as follows:

Please see Attorney General and secure modification of his telegram dated October 18, wherein he said, in brief: "The Department of Justice will treat as an unjust charge any price in excess of the United States Equalization Board's basis for beet-sugar sales and consider such a charge a violation of section 4 of the Lever food-control act." Competitors here have sold sugars at prices ranging from 14 to 20 cents, and are competing with us for next season's beets in same fields, and we, under threat of prosecution, are maintaining Government's price of ten-fifty. Is this fair, reasonable, right, or just? Government has allowed Michigan beet to be sold at 12 cents without prosecution, and Louisiana situation is well known. To fix price for one factory or locality on basis of cost means favoring the inefficient and slothful and penalizing the thrifty and prudent. Can not the Department of Justice recognize world's market price, somewhere near 14 or 15 cents New York, and instruct district attorney here to institute proceedings only if we sell above such figure? Situation intolerable, and our directors feel that conditions warrant and justify a price in excess of a ten-fifty price. Couldn't you get district attorney here instructed to institute proceedings only if we sell above 14 cents? Parties here from East bidding for our sugar at 20 cents f. o. b. factory. Have information that thousands of tons are being sold by refiners in New York at 15 cents and above.

Immediately upon receipt of the telegram I took the subject matter up with the Attorney General's office. The Attorney General advised me that he was not familiar with the details of the sugar situation, but would instruct Mr. Garvan to come to my office the following morning for the purpose of holding a conference on the question of the future price of beet sugar. I then answered the telegram as follows:

Attorney General has instructed Mr. Garvan to hold conference with me this afternoon on question of price of sugar. Presented your telegram to the Attorney General, and he did not see his way clear under the law to pass upon the question with the information he has at hand. Will report result of conference as soon as possible.

Mr. Garvan failed to come to my office on the 9th, but the Attorney General sent Mr. A. H. Riley, of the Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, to see me on the morning of January 10. After a two hours' conference with Mr. Riley I sent the following telegram:

Held two hours' conference with Riley, sugar man, Department of Justice. Believe he will recommend to Attorney General Monday to allow beet sugar to be sold on basis of 12 cents, increase of 1½ cents per pound. Will advise me Monday and I will telegraph you results.

On January 12 I sent the following telegram:

Riley and Garvan prefer to wait until Wednesday to consult Attorney General, who is out of town, before deciding on subject matter of your telegram relative to sugar prices.

On January 14 I received the following night lettergram:

We thank you very much for your splendid work on sugar matter. This morning American Sugar Refining Co. announces price 15 cents New York, and this afternoon C and H make same price San Francisco. In normal times these two concerns virtually make sugar market for United States based on Cuban and Hawaiian raw sugars, respectively. Doubtless you have presented to Department of Justice the impracticability of ultimate consumer receiving benefit of ten and a half price in Utah when sugar is bringing 15 to 20 cents retail in eastern markets. From information received through our brokers we are convinced that little or no sugar is reaching the consumer based on a ten and a half price, hence the ridiculousness of a situation that compels one or two companies in Colorado and Utah to continue selling sugar on such a basis. As an example of the unbearable condition here speculators are buying our sugars in five and ten bag lots, assembling same into carloads, shipping to Chicago, where they net six or seven dollars per bag profit, and should we attempt control situation by withholding sugars from market would likely be charged with hoarding as we were in Northwest recently. Since previous telegram, Gunnison, Rigby, and other producers, who have accepted higher prices than Government allowed for sugars, are bidding $12 for beets in our fields, while we can not afford to go higher than $10 account having sold our sugar on 10½-cent basis. Telegraph us something definite tomorrow if possible. Our directors feel situation intolerable.

After the receipt of the above telegram and a conference with Mr. Riley I sent a telegram, dated January 15, as follows:

Wire me immediately number of tons of beet sugar that can be shipped East within 30 days from all factories in Colorado and Utah, Idaho, Montana, or factories controlled by sugar companies within those States providing price paid is on 12-cent basis.

To that telegram I received the following answer:

Fifty-five million one hundred thousand pounds all companies allotment to March 1, based on 12 cents seaboard basis, but none of this to be shipped east of Chicago, as we are obliged to take care of our trade in our eastern territory on monthly allotments.

Shortly after the receipt of this telegram I held another conference with Mr. Riley, following which I sent, on January 16, the following telegram:

Am directed to notify you that sugar companies named in my telegram, dated January 15, may ship 55,100,000 pounds beet sugar between January 17 and March 1, at 12 cents seaboard basis, but none of it to be shipped east of Chicago. Each shipment with amount, name of purchaser, and destination to be sent daily by letter direct to A. W. Riley, Bureau of Investigation, Department of Justice, Washington, D. C. Please make best possible distribution. Letter will follow.

I received in answer to this telegram on January 17 a wire as follows:

We wish to express to you our thanks for the quick action you have secured in relation to sugar matters. As a consequence the different sugar companies have practically arrived at the conclusion that they will announce a $12 price per ton for beets in 1920. Inasmuch as New York and San Francisco basic price 15 cents, why is it Government continues to try to hold down price of beet sugar, in which farmers of all these States so greatly interested?

After consultation with Mr. Riley on January 19 I sent the following telegram:

Read your telegram January 17 to Riley, Department of Justice, and he thinks if all beet sugar now on hand is sold at 12 cents announcement should be made that companies will pay $12 per ton for 1920 beets. If sugar is sold at 15 cents, undue profits would follow and would lead to prosecution under existing law.

I wired the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. on January 20, after receiving a telephone message from Mr. Riley, as follows:

Reported to Department of Justice you have withdrawn sugar from sale. Wire facts in case.

I received an answer to that telegram January 24 reading as follows:

Report of our withdrawal from market absolutely untrue. More than 40,000 bags now rolling to eastern territory, and in addition have invoiced 158,000 bags so far this month. Total amount of new sugar shipped 670,000 bags out of this season's production, or more than 50 per cent of total sugar produced to date, as compared with less than 35 per cent sold same date last year.

On January 17 I received a telegram from Mr. W. L. Petrikin, of the Great Western Sugar Co., Denver, Colo., as follows:

In conformity with your telegram to Nibley, dated January 16, regarding distribution of sugar to March 1, it is our intention to cooperate to full extent, and we will immediately arrange to distribute as early as possible the quantity reported on 12-cent seaboard basis.

On January 19 I directed a letter to Mr. Petrikin, in which I inserted a copy of my telegram of January 19 to the manager of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co.

This is the full and true account of every action of mine in connection with the price at which sugar was to be sold. I read every telegram I received and every telegram I sent on this subject to Mr. Riley, of the Department of Justice, and every one of them met his approval.

From the Salt Lake City daily papers I learned that recently the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. has advanced the price of beet sugar to the market price of sugar at New York and San Francisco, and the only reasons assigned for so doing that I am aware of are announced by the company in advertisements in the Salt Lake papers. Following is an extract from one of the advertisements received by me this day:

The business of this company is to manufacture and sell sugar. It has been in business for almost 30 years. Its commodity until the beginning of the war was always sold at the market price, based on supply and demand. Prices sometimes have been up and sometimes have been down. Many years have been lean years from a profit standpoint. Others have been profitable. The company's sales for the fiscal year ending February 28, 1920, amounted to 1,756,834 bags, on which it made a profit of $1.02 per bag. There is not a fair price committee in the land that has named as low a price for the wholesaler or retailer. Even the Attorney General of the United States in his latest statement says that the retailer is entitled to a margin of $2 per bag for handling sugar. From the standpoint of fair play, isn't the manufacturer of sugar entitled to as much profit as the middleman who distributes his goods?

The Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. has always been fair with the people of Utah. During the past six months it has sacrificed a lot of money in order to retain sufficient sugar for home consumption. Had it not done so, sugar to-day might have been selling in Utah at 30 to 32 cents wholesale and from 33 to 35 cents retail, as it is in scores of cities in the land. During the past year it has distributed in this intermountain country more than 600,000 bags of sugar, or nearly one-half of its entire production. In ordinary times it has never been able to sell in this market more than 15 per cent of its output, which demonstrates beyond question of cavil that in spite of all the Government's efforts thousands and thousands of bags of sugar have been picked up at the prevailing low price in Utah and shipped to eastern markets, where the manipulators have enjoyed a profit of from $5 to $10 per bag. Failure of the Government to prevent this sort of profiteering made the recent advance necessary in order to stop the drain on intermountain sugar supplies. Hence the advance in price to the prevailing eastern and western wholesale market. The Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. has been charged by the Department of Justice with profiteering, and yet this company has never exacted one penny more than the prevailing market price, which is and always has been established by New York, New Orleans, and San Francisco markets.

I am not defending the action of the company nor am I responsible in any way for the advanced price of sugar, nor am I complaining of the Federal Trade Commission making an investigation of the affairs of the company; but I do object to the program and object to the investigation as outlined in the following telegram to one George E. Sanders, an ordinary financial crook, so demonstrated in his swindling deal in promoting a paper sugar factory at Hamilton, Mont., from Attorney W. H. Beer, of the Federal Trade Commission, who has the investigation of the company in charge, and Sanders's answer to the same:

RIGBY, 13, 1920.

GEORGE SANDERS,
Care of Dr. Snow, 60 First Avenue, Salt Lake City, Utah:

Expect to close; leaving here Saturday. What do you intend to do regarding Medford and Grants Pass proposed hearing? Wire me collect.

BEER,
Federal Trade Commissioner.

(Gov. rates, 23222 Fed. Trade Comm.)

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, May 13, 1920.

HENRY W. BEER,
Special Counsel, Federal Trade Commission,
Rigby, Idaho:

Do not know what to advise you about proposed hearing at Grants Pass. Think you ought to have about three weeks from now. One of your investigators should be there a week in advance lining up witnesses. Do not be in too big hurry to finish your case, as public sentiment is fast changing and almost entirely for Government prosecution. Sugar magnates anxious for you to get through. Palmer should keep you on job. If you keep a going for two months, it will cost SMOOT his Senate seat. Better kill some time with Washington authority. Ogden to-morrow.

G. E. SANDERS.

9059, May 14, 1920.

Mr. President, this is the program, and I shall wait and see whether it meets with the approval of the members of the Federal Trade Commission or has received the sanction of the Attorney General. It begins to look to me as if Gen. Richard W. Young knew what he was talking about when shortly before his death he informed me what he heard was to take place in connection with an investigation of the Utah-Idaho Sugar Co. Gen. Young was one of the leading Democrats, if not the leading Democrat, in my State. Shame upon officials of a department of the Government if they have lent themselves to such action! I think I know the people of Utah well enough to know that this sort of politics will never be countenanced, and if the officials of Washington are acting in this matter upon the advice of politicians of the State of Utah their action will not assist in any way in my defeat or their success.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator a question before he takes his seat.

The Senator has referred to this man Sanders in somewhat emphatic terms. Will the Senator inform me whether his record is such that it should have been known to the authorities employing him for this work?

Mr. SMOOT. Why, Mr. President, I can not conceive that it would not be known. It is known by everybody in Utah. It is known by everybody who has suffered from his speculations. That is the most modest term by which I can characterize his activities.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, it is to the interest of the public service that the Senator should have made this statement on the floor. While I am not in political sympathy with the Senator, I fully share his condemnation of the use of any public official agency either to promote or to prevent the reelection of any man in public life, if that has been done.

JOINT POSTAL COMMISSION.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I desire to call attention to and correct a statement made by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR] on Saturday in regard to the work of the Joint Commission on Postal Salaries—a statement which I did not hear and of which I did not know until my attention was called on yesterday afternoon to the statement as found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I want to say, Mr. President, that the statement is misleading, to say the least, and in some respects quite contrary to the facts.

The Senator from Tennessee—and I regret that he is not present—begins his statement with the following announcement on page 7480 of the RECORD:

Mr. President, to-day the Joint Postal Commission completed its labors, and work has now begun in the preparation of a report and a bill.

That statement is prematurely made. The commission had not at the time the statement was made nor has it yet quite concluded its labors. There are at least two schedules of salaries yet to be finally passed upon by the commission. It is hoped, of course, that yet this week the commission may be able to make its report to both Houses of Congress, and that the report will be unanimous, but there are still some slight differences of opinion between members of the commission in regard to some of these salaries, especially the two schedules to which I refer, and no vote has yet been taken upon any schedule but that is open to reconsideration by the commission before the final report is made.

Mr. President, I have nothing to say in regard to what the steering committee should do in including the postal salary matter in its program, save that I can hardly see reason for the implied criticism of the committee by the Senator from Tennessee for not including in its program something that has not yet been reported to the Senate, especially when there is yet some uncertainty as to the time when the report will be made.

But, Mr. President, the Senator from Tennessee did not quite stop with the announcement that the commission is engaged in the preparation of a report and a bill. On page 7480, the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER] asked the following question:

And do I understand from the Senator from Tennessee that the commission, of which he is a member, has not yet reported?

To which the Senator from Tennessee made the following response:

It has not yet reported, but its report is ready.

Mr. President, after the commission has concluded its work and agreed upon a schedule of salaries for the various classes of postal employees, it will require a few days, at least, of hard work, of most intensive work, to prepare such a report as should be submitted to the two Houses of Congress.

This is a matter of great importance and I call attention to it, Mr. President, in order that no unjust or improper inference may follow from the statement made by the Senator from Tennessee in regard to this report.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to ask the Senator if it is the expectation of the commission that the report will be presented to Congress in time for action before the recess on June 5?

Mr. STERLING. I will say to the Senator from Wisconsin that it is the expectation and the strong hope that the report will be presented to the Senate and to the House during the present week. I want to say, further, that when presented I hope we may have the cooperation of the steering committee, as well as of the Senators generally, in the speedy consideration of the report.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the subject to which the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] has just called the attention of the Senate justifies a reference to a nation-wide and apparently thoroughly organized and apparently effective propaganda now being conducted in favor of this proposed measure.

I presume mine is the common experience of every Senator. My mail is loaded to the guards with letters, telegrams, petitions, requests, and entreaties from all sorts and conditions of people—black, white, Jews, gentiles, Americans, foreigners, everybody—organizations, social and industrial, the constituents of the American Federation of Labor being particularly active in the campaign.

I present to the view of the Senate a full-page advertisement taken from yesterday's New York Times, and purporting to be reprinted from the May 27 issue of the Literary Digest, and am informed that similar editorials are appearing all over the country, which indicates that these gentlemen, so anxious for relief from Congress, must have large funds somehow, somewhere, in order to meet the enormous cost of this sort of advertisement.

These gentlemen may need, and greatly need, relief from the United States Treasury. The commission in all probability will ascertain that fact; but I am reaching a point where my interest is aroused by these continuing and repeated organized demands upon the Treasury of the United States, and I shall therefore demand a full consideration of the report of the committee report, in view of the matters to which I have just called attention.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, just a word in reference to some observations made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], wherein he assumes that all of the letters we are receiving with reference to the increase of pay of postal employees are inspired propaganda upon the part of the postal employees. I am very certain that is not true, and if the Senator from Colorado should visit his own State, as I visited mine for a few days two or three weeks ago, I am very sure that he would find, as I found, that the great business and commercial interests, the heavy patrons of the Postal Service, are interested in this increase, not primarily as a matter of justice to post-office employees, but because they believe that the entire postal system, bad as it is now, will be utterly broken down through wholesale resignations from the service, and that the employees will seek more profitable employment elsewhere unless Congress very speedily takes action, giving them such recompense as will make it to their interest to remain in the service rather than to leave.

So, I am very sure that the hundreds of letters we are now receiving constantly from the business interests of the country, asking for action, are not inspired by the employees, but are inspired by the self-interest of the writers of the letters.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am, of course, aware of the fact that many business interests are identifying themselves with this movement, and no doubt for the reasons, among others, which have just been stated by the Senator from Wisconsin; but of course they know, they must know, that increase of salaries has been a policy of the Congress for the last four or five years, which increases, instead of improving, have had little effect upon the efficiency of the service, for the very good reason that prices move upward out of proportion to these increases, thus leading to new demands; and such, in my judgment, will be the result of this increase if it shall be made.

I do not want the Senator to understand that I will oppose a favorable consideration of this measure. I do say, however, that in view of what seems to be an abnormal activity in behalf of it, we should give it full consideration before disposing of it.

I confess, Mr. President, that the service is not efficient at present. That is largely true of many other branches of the public service. But it will continue so until normal conditions are resumed all over the country. I can well understand—indeed, I applaud—the man in any branch of the public service who, having opportunity for private employment, wants to avail himself of it. I do not know of any greater misfortune that could overtake a friend or a relative of mine than his entry into permanent service for the Government. He may be able to make some slight advance in life; he may secure a promotion here or there; his compensation may be increased somewhat, perhaps materially, but he has placed himself in a rut; he has a certain routine of duty; he ceases to be self-reliant as the years pass; his energy and his enterprise are sapped by the dull and dry round of official life, and therefore many, perhaps a majority, of those who have spent half of their active lives in the public service, realize, and realize more fully than myself, because theirs is the experience, that the principal good fortune coming to a public employee is an opportunity to engage in the activities of private life. If I have any friends in the service—and I think I have quite a number—I would say to them that now is the opportunity to leave this dull, hidebound, chrysalis condition and expand themselves in private activities, for there, and there only, can their full ambitions have opportunity for realization.

SIGNAL CORPS SCHOOL—CAMP ALFRED VAIL, N. J. (S. DOC. NO. 278).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of War, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation in the sum of $1,500,000 required by the War Department for beginning construction of the Signal Corps School at Camp Alfred Vail, N. J., being for the fiscal year 1921, which, with accompanying papers, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. By the enactment of a joint resolution of the Congress of the United States authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass., there has been created what is known as a commission to be known as the United States Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, and the President of the Senate is, by the terms of said joint resolution, authorized to appoint four Senators as members of that commission.

GOVERNMENT OF ITALY.

Mr. KING. I offer a resolution which I ask may be read, and I shall ask for its adoption unless there is objection to it.

The resolution (S. Res. 372) was read, as follows:

Whereas upon the 24th day of May, 1915, Italy declared war upon Austria-Hungary for the redemption of her people who had for centuries been under the Austrian yoke; and

Whereas the armies of Italy with unexampled fortitude and sacrifice, and in the face of unparalleled obstacles, battled heroically and persistently throughout the war, and upon the 24th day of October, 1918, initiated the gigantic offensive which expelled the vanquished armies of the enemy from Italian soil, caused the collapse of the Austro-Hungarian Empire, and was the prelude to the victories of the French, Belgian, British, and American forces in France and Flanders, which ended in the armistice of November 11, 1918; and

Whereas the unshakable faith, tenacious valor, and heroic courage of Italy were vital factors in the war, and through the intense sufferings and privations of Italy, liberty has come not only to the Italians of Trent and Istria, but also to the Czecho-Slavs and Jugo-Slavs, formerly subject to the alien rule of Austria-Hungary: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate, on this fifth anniversary of the entrance of Italy into the war, felicitates the Government and people of Italy upon the splendid accomplishments of Italy for the defense of civilization and the liberation of subject peoples, congratulates Italy upon the reintegration of her ancient national territories and the complete national unity of the Italian people, and extends its good will for the continued prosperity and glory of Italy in the community of the free nations of the world.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. If there is to be objection to the resolution, let it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. BORAH. I do not see why it should not be adopted.

Mr. KING. Very well; I ask for its adoption at this time.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to.

ACTIVITIES AND ACCOMPLISHMENTS OF WAR DEPARTMENT.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on Thursday next, at the close of the routine morning business, I shall address the Senate upon the subject of the activities and accomplishments of the War Department during the war.

OLYMPIC GAMES.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 179) authorizing use of Army transports by teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and international competitions, which was to strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That authority be, and is hereby, given to the Secretary of War, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to use such Army transports as may be available for the transportation of teams, individuals, and their equipment representing the United States in Olympic games and other international competitions during the present year.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the language adopted by the House as a substitute and the language used by the Senate is so nearly alike that there is no objection at all to it. I therefore move that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

H. R. 13500. An act to amend an act entitled "An act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii," approved April 30, 1900, as amended, to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Pacific Islands, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands.

THE BONUS IN POLITICS.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I desire to read into the RECORD a very timely and pertinent editorial from yesterday's Washington Post, entitled "The bonus in politics."

"If the Republicans of the House of Representatives were actually moving to impose an additional tax of $1,276,500,000 on the people at this time for the purpose of giving a bonus to soldiers and sailors, the move could not be ascribed to anything but madness. But as the House Republicans know very well that no such tax will be imposed, their proposal to impose it may be set down for what it really is—a hypocritical and disreputable attempt to hoodwink the soldier boys for purposes of political advantage in the forthcoming campaign.

"The House Republicans are trying to make it appear that they favor the imposition of another billion-dollar tax upon the people; that the soldier and sailor boys must have this bonus; that the Democrats are opposing the plan, and the Democratic President is intent upon vetoing the bill, and therefore that the Republican Party is the only friend of the soldiers and sailors. Hence, if the soldiers and sailors have any gratitude they will be expected to vote the Republican ticket from President to dog catcher.

"The Republicans of the House would not pass the bonus bill if they knew it would pass the Senate and be approved by the President, for they know that the people would relegate all of them to private life for incompetence in swelling the public debt at a time when the public back is bending under an excessive load. The House Republicans rely upon the Senate and the President to block the bill. Thus these 'statesmen' hope to fool the soldiers and sailors and yet avoid the wrath of the taxpayers.

"Such is the quality of statesmanship exhibited by the majority of the once great Committee on Ways and Means and seemingly approved by the Republican majority of the House.

"No more humiliating spectacle has ever been witnessed in the Capitol than that which will occur this week if a majority of the House shall vote in favor of the bonus bill. The proposal is so offensive to decency, when stripped of its hypocrisy, that no individual Member of the House would dare to champion it in the presence of self-respecting soldiers and sailors of the recent war. It is an indictment of the good faith of its supporters, and the roll call will be used against them, individually, by their rivals in their districts. These rivals will not fail to tell the people how their Congressmen voted for an additional tax of $1,276,500,000. They will fully explain to all soldiers and sailors how the vote was cast in the knowledge that the bill could not pass—that it was, bluntly speaking, a swindle disguised as a bribe, intended to deceive them into voting the Republican ticket. How can any Congressman voting for this bill successfully cope with a rival who thrusts these deadly facts into the campaign?

"The Congressmen engineering this fraudulent measure confidently count upon the ignorance of the soldiers and sailors. They seem to regard these young men as too simple to understand the intricacy of the scheme that has been hatched. They expect to convince the fighting men that a Democratic minority in Congress, or the Democratic President, as the case may be, blocked the bonus which a grateful Republican Party was anxious to give them. But the soldiers and sailors will not be misled. The truth will be conveyed to them before the bill is voted down in the Senate or vetoed by the President.

"Should the House pass this bill, a storm of protest will arise from the taxpayers. They will speedily rip off all the pretense that now covers the proposal. The Senate debate, if held before the recess, will expose the hypocritical action of the House majority and will place before the two great elements concerned—taxpayers and fighters—the full truth. Thus the Congressmen who vote for the bill will be impaled upon one horn or the other.

"In the meantime it behooves the soldiers and sailors to understand clearly what is being attempted in the name of patriotism and gratitude. The protests which are coming in from former soldiers and sailors reveal that many of them detect the unwisdom of imposing extra taxation upon the people for the purpose of giving the fighters a bonus. Everyone knows that a tax is not only collected from the consumer, but is usually made the excuse for an extra charge. The bonus would amount to $1,276,500,000, which is staggering enough in itself; but by the time the consumers paid the tax it would have grown to $2,000,000,000 or more. The fighters and their relatives would pay this tax and its profiteering trailer. All patriotic families have Liberty bonds, and the value of these bonds would depreciate if they were dumped upon the market, as they would be if taxpayers were squeezed by a bonus bill. Thus the fighters' families would be doubly out of pocket.

"But there is no danger of committing the folly of enacting the bonus bill. Congress is about to adjourn. The campaign will be on. Business conditions are changing. Extra taxes must be laid to carry on the Government. The people will know more about the Government than they know now. If the House, before adjourning, should pass the bonus bill, its action will have become a hissing and a byword before the Senate, next winter, will be called upon to discuss it."

This editorial, Mr. President, indulges in very plain and, I think, truthful expression. I do not think it goes far enough, however, because I believe that many of the members of my own party are quite as much concerned for political reasons in preparing and enacting this measure as are the Republicans. But if it be true, and I do not question it, that, as here stated, the Republicans of the House would not pass a bonus bill if they knew it would pass the Senate and be approved by the President, then I feel justified, both for the purpose of relieving those gentlemen of the apprehensions they are said to entertain, and to assure them that they can accomplish their desire by accepting my statement, that four of us on this side of the Senate propose, if the bill comes from the House, to oppose it to the best of our ability. If any political advantage can be drawn from this statement, I am perfectly willing to add that every one of us is a Democrat. Whether there be others, I do not know.

We are pressed for time, and only for that reason do I make the statement, for, assuming the correctness of this editorial that the sole basis for the proposed legislation is politics, if its sponsors can be assured that their end can be reached without indulging in so much useless work, it will be mutually beneficial to declare it.

THE MEAT-PACKING INDUSTRY.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask unanimous consent to read into the RECORD a statement by the Institute of American Meat Packers.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHERMAN. It reads:

In reference to that part of Senator WALSH's speech in the United States Senate yesterday—

Referring to the day after the delivery of the speech—which referred to the packing industry, the Institute of American Meat Packers to-day issued the following statement:

"Senator WALSH evidently has been misled by the old charges of the Federal Trade Commission, which has been disproved in detail. What the consumer wishes to know is, How much profit does the manufacturer receive when he sells a pound or a dollar's worth of product? In the case of the packers the answer is that the average profit is a fraction of a cent a pound or less than 2 cents on a dollar's worth of product. This is doubtless the smallest rate of profit received by any industry in the world.

"The packers' profit in 1919 cost the average American family only about 5 cents a week. These facts often have been cited publicly and they never have been denied. No amount of prejudice and erroneous accounting calculations will obscure them. Moreover, the consumer is not unaware that according to the United States Bureau of Labor Statistics, meat has decreased substantially in price since last spring, while most commodities have continued on their upward trend. The consumer is beginning to realize that the campaign of abuse and misrepresentation which has been directed at packing companies has damaged the industry, thereby affecting the interest of public adversely and working serious injury to live-stock producers. No industry can serve the public with its maximum efficiency when constantly harassed by deliberate organized vilification. All the packing industry asks is to be judged on the facts, and it is now high time for the facts to rule.

"It has been demonstrated time and time again on the basis of Government figures that the profits of packing companies play only a negligible part in meat prices—a fraction of a cent a pound. The United States census figures show that in the packing industry the cost of raw materials constitutes 87.2 per cent of the value of finished products. The packing industry has given the consumer and the Government a square deal. On that account it now deserves to be considered on its merits and not as a convenient political target."

THE SUGAR SITUATION.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed a letter written by the junior Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] to a constituent of his on the sugar situation. I will not ask to have it read, but merely printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. I understand it is a communication from the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. CURTIS. Yes; from the Senator.

There being no objection, the communication was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LETTER OF UNITED STATES SENATOR CHARLES L. MCNARY WRITTEN APRIL 26 TO AN OREGON CONSTITUENT.

"In the summer of 1918 the United States Sugar Equalization Board was incorporated under the laws of the State of Delaware, the stock being entirely held by the President as trustee for the American people. This corporation was based upon the food-control bill passed by the Congress in 1917.

"This board, following its organization, entered into contract with the Cuban sugar board, through the instrumentality of the Cuban Government, and acquired Cuban raw sugar at the price of 4½ cents a pound at northern ports and 4 cents a pound at southern ports. The sugar was then transported to the United States where it was refined.

"The Sugar Equalization Board entered into agreement with the refiners for a charge of $1.54 per hundred pounds for refining, so that the sugar was sold by the refiner at 9 cents per pound less 2 per cent for cash. This brought refined sugar to the home of the consumer at from about 10 cents to 10½ cents per pound.

"This arrangement worked satisfactorily. In fact, at the hearings held by the subcommittee, of which I was chairman, no complaint was made by producers, refiners, or distributors to this plan.

"PRESIDENT REFUSED TO ACT.

"In the summer of 1919 the Sugar Equalization Board petitioned the President to again acquire the Cuban crop of sugar. He refused to act. In the early fall they again renewed their petition to the President to buy this sugar at a price not agreed upon but thought to be about 5½ cents, a rate in increase of 1 cent above the 1918–19 price.

"Again the President refused to take any action. Therefore a resolution was introduced in Congress setting forth the President's position and anticipating the condition which now exists—namely, conscienceless prices.

"The Agriculture Committee was asked to look into the matter. I was chairman of the subcommittee. I held hearings. Later I framed a bill authorizing the President to buy the crop and to license refiners and dealers in sugar. Again he refused to act, and a statement to that effect was issued from the White House. This is the history of the transaction.

"Now I shall present the consequences. The Attorney General, acting, in my opinion, without authority of the law, told Louisiana refiners of cane sugar that they might charge 18 cents for their product and it would not be considered profiteering.

"Naturally the Cubans, realizing that the price of 18 cents had been placed on the product here, began to raise the price for their product until the last information I have had from the President of the Cuban Republic is that Cuban raw sugar is being sold for 14 cents a pound in Cuba, whereas we bought it for 4½ cents last year.

"Not only that, but as stated and stated by me on the floor of the Senate, foreign nations have entered the Cuban market and from statistics supplied me by the Cuban people they have taken almost one-third of the crop.

BIG PROFITS FROM SUGAR.

"The refiner is charging more for refining than he did last year by practically 100 per cent. I suppose the broker and retailer are taking a big profit, until now sugar is being sold from a wide spread of from 20 to 30 cents per pound. Our beet-sugar crop does not come in until October, and I am afraid during the canning season that sugar will go up higher.

"I do not know what Congress can do. The President has the old food-control bill which he can act under, and which he did in 1918. He has what is called the McNary bill, passed in 1919, again reciting his power, giving him power to purchase, and power to license, and power to control, and power to set prices, but he does not act. I have given up a tremendous lot of time in the hope that something might be done, and worked days to get the bill through Congress, only to have it overthrown by a stubborn and short-sighted Executive.

"More money has been wasted by reason of the excessive price on sugar for this year than it cost to run the Government before the war, and that was in excess of $1,000,000,000."

RECLASSIFICATION OF SALARIES.

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Mr. President, I have listened with a good deal of interest to the discussion which has been going on here with regard to the postal employees. I am hopeful that in the near future something may be done to readjust the salaries of those servants of the people. I am inclined to believe that something will be done regarding the postal employees, and I sincerely hope so. One reason for my hope is that those employees as a rule vote, and there is an election coming on, and that may be some spur to activity in regard to them. I hope it will prove such a spur.

I wish, however, to call attention to another class of employees who generally do not vote, and see if I can not in some way arouse some interest in their behalf.

On the 12th of March the Joint Commission on the Reclassification of Salaries of Federal Employees in the District of Columbia made its report and at the same time reported a bill for the purpose of putting its work into operation. There is no question that the Federal employees in the District of Columbia are unfairly treated. There is no question that the service of the Government in the District is suffering because of this unfair treatment. Hundreds and thousands of these employees are leaving the service because they can not support themselves on the meager salaries which they are receiving. The result of it is that these active, progressive employees who can find employment elsewhere are seeking it and the Government service is suffering accordingly.

This is a matter of prime importance. The commission has made its report. It reported a bill at the same time and, so far as I am advised, neither has received the slightest consideration.

I desire to state also that there are other thousands of employees throughout the country to whose interest no attention is being paid by anyone connected with Congress, so far as I know. The Joint Commission on the Reclassification of Salaries of Federal Employees in the District of Columbia related only to those employees and the other commission related only to postal employees throughout the country, but there are the other thousands from whom I am receiving letters from all sections of the country who are pleading that something may be done for their relief. I think there is not a Senator here who does not believe that they are justly entitled to some relief, and I trust while this matter is being brought to the attention of the Senate something may be done regarding the postal employees, something with respect to Federal employees in the District of Columbia, and that we may then take up this other great army of employees who demand, and justly demand, relief. They are not making an assault upon the Treasury of the United States, but they are simply asking for justice, that they may serve their country faithfully and efficiently.

Mr. PHELAN. May I ask the Senator from New Mexico if the report of the commission has been filed?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. The commission's report was filed on the 12th of March. It also presented a bill at the same time, which the commission hoped might be acted upon by Congress; and it reported a scheme of reclassification and readjustment of salaries that it was hoped might be put into operation.

Mr. PHELAN. That is in relation to the postal employees?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. It relates to the Federal employees in the District of Columbia.

Mr. PHELAN. Not the postal employees?

Mr. JONES of New Mexico. Not the postal employees. There has been considerable discussion this morning regarding the postal employees, and the hope has been expressed that something will be done regarding them before the close of this session of Congress.

Mr. PHELAN. The Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] made the remarkable observation that the Federal Government is suffering by reason of the fact that the Federal service is no longer attractive to energetic and active men, and that he would advise those now in the service, since there is an opportunity to find employment elsewhere, to leave the service.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I think the Senator unintentionally misquotes me. I did not say the Government was no longer responsive to the needs of the public service. I think the Government is as responsive now as it ever was. What I said was that the average man and woman is better off in private life than in public service.

Mr. PHELAN. I understood the Senator to say that he would advise his friends in the service to abandon it for these reasons.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; every man and woman who writes me asking my advice gets that reply. I think they owe it to themselves, especially if they have initiative, to develop it in private life because it is difficult to do so in the public service.

Mr. PHELAN. I am sure the Senator has no serious intention of trying to break down the Federal service.

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly not. There is always an army of applicants ready for the places which become vacant.

Mr. PHELAN. If the Senator seeks to obtain good service for the Federal Government, one of the means by which the service could be improved would be by making it more attractive and increasing the pay, for instance, of deserving employees of the Post Office Department.

Mr. THOMAS. What advance would the Senator suggest?

Mr. PHELAN. I have been waiting for the report of the commission, not desiring to anticipate it; but I know, and the Senator knows, that the service is demoralized, because men are seeking and accepting employment elsewhere.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator knows, too, that the advance will only be to meet the high cost of living, and will remain at about that level. Does the Senator think that an improvement which would prove attractive to the ordinary man or woman endowed with ordinary American initiative?

Mr. PHELAN. Whereas there is great call for men in all branches of work, I suppose those who are attached to the service of the Post Office Department would like to remain if the conditions of life were made tolerable for them by the Federal Government.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Following the thought suggested by the Senator, is it not undoubtedly true that a large number of these men are hunting for other work and are wanting to get out because they simply can not live on the present pay, the Government pay now being below the pay for similar work in private life?

Mr. PHELAN. That is true, Mr. President.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I have just returned from my own home and I find that the same kind of work, work requiring the same capacity, is receiving in private occupations 50 per cent more than these people are getting.

Mr. PHELAN. Mr. President, I should like to put myself in the position of one in common with my colleagues who are seeking a means and a method by which we can keep these people in the Government service. We are charged with the duty of making employment sufficiently attractive to hold experienced men in the service. So it is more than a question of meeting the high cost of living. That is a temporary matter. We can reach that by a bonus, perhaps; but the Federal Government does not adequately compensate its employees in both the high positions and the low positions. A commission should seriously consider readjusting salaries.

During the war many were attracted to the service of the Government for patriotic reasons. Now, when there is no great emergency which calls upon them to sacrifice their private interests, we should be able to hold in the Shipping Board, for instance, and in the great departments men capable and experienced. The whole service has deteriorated since the war, which during the war showed great efficiency.

The postal employees, I know of my own knowledge, are inadequately compensated. I consider that they are the connecting link between the manufacturer and the customer, between the producer and the consumer. It is an agency of the highest value to the people, and I think the administration will stand the highest in history—as the most efficient—which carefully maintains its Postal Service as among its most useful activities.

We have just provided for speed by making an appropriation of $1,400,000 for conveying letters across the country by airplane. We must not in this age of speed forget the necessary work of distribution in the great cities by carriers, and maintain a standard of adequate pay and living conditions just and fair to the rank and file alike.

EUROPEAN FOOD CONDITIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there further morning business?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I will occupy the attention of the Senate for a moment if I may be permitted to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. BORAH. A few days ago I called attention to a statement of one of our leading financiers, who is advising the Congress to appropriate $500,000,000 with which to do charity work in Europe. I was of the opinion then that the necessity for such an appropriation was greatly exaggerated, to say nothing of the constitutional difficulties. Since that time I have received a letter from the president of the Baldwin Locomotive Works, of Philadelphia, Mr. Samuel M. Vauclain, who has just returned from a 10 or 12 weeks' trip in Europe, during which he traveled throughout central Europe, visiting most of the countries which were most directly affected by the recent war. In this letter he says:

I have just returned from an extensive tour of this district and take pleasure in sending you a printed copy of a confidential letter in connection therewith which I sent to my works.

I am opposed to appropriating any more money for relief purposes and am in favor of removal from Europe of all our various representatives excepting those which of necessity must remain for military or governmental purposes.

The manufacturers of the United States should be placed in a position that will enable them to extend credit for a period of years to the various industries of central and southeastern Europe to assist these wonderful peoples by their own effort and industry to rehabilitate their countries and assume their rightful places among nations.

In an interview which he gave to the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, upon his return home, he said:

"Prices on all foodstuffs will come down after a while," said Mr. Vauclain. "Wages will have to come down, too. Wheat prices will come down fast when grain can be imported from Europe. When the seven or eight years' crop that is being stored in Siberia can be exported the effect on the prices here will be something awful. Wheat, I think, will be one of the first things to drop in price."

* * * * * * *

"Crop conditions are wonderful all over Europe. In Serbia I saw some of the most beautiful fields of grain and herds of cattle that I have ever seen in my life. The outlook for good crops is excellent in every country in Europe."

The political aspect in Poland, according to Mr. Vauclain, is excellent. In his opinion it will be only a matter of a few years when that country will have paid its debts to the outside world.

* * * * * * *

The sugar shortage, judging from Mr. Vauclain's remarks, is confined almost solely to the United States. In every European country, except England, he said, sugar is plentiful.

Mr. Vauclain did not visit Russia on account of "diplomatic reasons." From what he could learn, however, he does not believe that the conditions in that country are as black as they are painted, and is confident that Russia will recover its stability soon.

Since receiving that letter I have had the pleasure of an interview with Mr. Vauclain, and it is exhilarating to talk with a man who sees Europe as it really is, who has been on the ground and actually observed, and is faithfully reporting, in my judgment, the conditions that there obtain. I repeat what I said the other day, that what we need is to restore business relations as rapidly as practicable with all of the countries of Europe.

There is a plentiful food supply in Europe. There is, of course, a breakdown in their transportation system, which prevents the distribution of the food supply as effectually as desired, and as it ought to be had; but, outside of that, the conditions in Europe are by no means so bad as they have been supposed to be.

Dr. Alonzo Engelbert Taylor, of the University of Pennsylvania, upon May 16 said:

Americans are largely wasting their sympathy when they talk of destitute, hungry women and children in Europe. There are not any. We might save our sympathy for America, where the food situation is not much better than abroad. Either Americans are becoming hysterical in their desire to aid everyone or else the people here are being imposed upon.

Europe is producing more foodstuffs to-day than ever before in its history. There is an abundance of food on hand to last until October, when, according to the present outlook, food will be more plentiful there than in America.

I have no doubt, Mr. President, that there are places in Europe where there is a lack of a proper supply of food; in the districts where contention and strife are still going on and in those districts which it is difficult to reach by transportation, I have no doubt there is a want of food; but the conditions which have been presented to the Senate by some of those who feel so desirous of appropriating money for the purpose of taking care of the situation, in my judgment, do not exist. If we can restore our business relations and connect up the commercial lines between those countries and the United States, there will be no necessity for our appropriating $500,000,000 to be used for charitable purposes. Mr. Vauclain told me of an interview which he had with the Queen of Roumania, which I do not feel entirely at liberty to repeat, but it would seem that the people of Europe who are responsible as its rulers and governors are not asking for charity. They are asking for a restoration of business relations and for a certain amount of confidence until they can demonstrate their capacity to take care of themselves.

HIGH PRICES AND CONCENTRATION OF WEALTH.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate resolution 366. I do not think there is any opposition to it, and it certainly should not take a very long time to act upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that the resolution is one coming over from a preceding day, and the Senator from Massachusetts is entitled to have it taken up under the rule.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that the resolution be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 366) submitted by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts, on the 18th instant, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the Senate is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a select committee of five Senators, three from the majority and two from the minority, to investigate and report to the Senate the relation between high prices for necessaries and the concentration of wealth, and for this purpose the President is hereby requested to permit such committee to inspect the tax returns of any corporation, association, or partnership in accordance with section 257 of the revenue act of 1913.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, it seems to me that if the proposed investigation for which the resolution provides is to amount to anything, of necessity it would call for the expenditure of some money; and if that is the case the resolution would have to go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate under the law before it could be acted upon by the Senate. Does the Senator have any objection to having the resolution referred to that committee?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Certainly not; because I can well appreciate that any investigation would be useless if money were not furnished with which to conduct it.

Mr. SMOOT. The law itself, not the rule of the Senate, requires wherever there is to be an expenditure of money from the contingent fund of the Senate that the resolution calling for such expenditure shall go to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. May I urge upon the chairman of the committee to give the matter as early attention as possible?

Mr. SMOOT. I am a member of the committee, and I shall call it to the attention of the Chairman.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

THE CALENDAR.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Morning business is closed.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the call of the calendar may be dispensed with. I will say that I make the request in order that the conference report on the water-power bill may be considered.

Mr. PHELAN. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. PHELAN. My objection arises from the fact that, the session being limited, we will not reach the bills on the calendar if we abandon the morning hour on Monday, which is set aside for their consideration.

RESTORATION OF PEACE WITH GERMANY.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the first business on the calendar.

The resolution (S. Res. 76) defining a peace treaty which shall insure to the people of the United States the attainment of the ends for which they entered the war, and declaring the policy of our Government to meet fully obligations to ourselves and to the world, was announced as first in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution be transferred on the calendar from Rule VIII to Rule IX.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, before that is done I desire to say that I am not sure about the wishes of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX] in regard to the resolution, whether he might want to call it up and possibly offer amendments to it in case his other resolution shall meet with an Executive veto. I should rather have him on the floor when the request is made.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I withdraw the request. I thought that the so-called Knox resolution having passed the Senate there was no real necessity for having Senate resolution 76 remain on the calendar under Rule VIII.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. If this were the same resolution, there would not be any such necessity, but the Senator from Pennsylvania introduced several resolutions on the same subject, and the Senator from Utah will remember that the one which was passed was amended in the committee, and I am not sure of the identity of the resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I withdraw my request, and merely ask that the resolution go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be passed over.

BUSINESS PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 529) for the relief of the heirs of Adam and Noah Brown was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 600) for the relief of the heirs of Mrs. Susan A. Nicholas was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. I ask that that bill go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

STEAMER "MAYFLOWER."

The bill (S. 1223) for the relief of the owner of the steamer Mayflower and for the relief of passengers on board said steamer was announced as next in order.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, this bill is similar to other bills which have already been passed. It is permissive only, and merely allows the parties interested to file claim for damages in the United States district court.

Mr. SMOOT. It does not make a direct appropriation?

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. It does not, I will say to the Senator, but is only permissive. Several bills of a similar character have been passed, but for some reason this one has been held up.

Mr. SMOOT. Then I will not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Massachusetts to the fact that the bill provides that if there shall be a decree finding the sum due, the money is appropriated by the bill to pay it.

Mr. SMOOT. Then, of course, the Senator from Massachusetts must either allow that provision to be stricken from the bill or else let the bill go over. I will say to the Senator from Massachusetts that in the case of all the bills of a similar character which have been passed the provision for an appropriation to meet whatever judgment might be obtained has been stricken out, and it must be stricken out of this bill if it is to pass.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I see no objection to that provision being stricken out, and I move an amendment to that effect.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In section 1, page 2, after line 10, it is proposed to strike out "Provided further, That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owner of said steamer Mayflower and her passengers, or any or either of them, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated," and, on the same page, on line 16, after the word "Provided," to insert the word "further," so as to make the section read:

That the claim of the owner of the steamer Mayflower and the claims of the passengers on board said steamer rising out of a collision between said steamer and the U. S. submarine L–10 in President Roads, Boston Harbor, on the 11th day of August, 1917, for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owner of said steamer Mayflower through damage to and detention of said steamer Mayflower, and by the passengers on said steamer by reason of personal injuries sustained in said collision, may be submitted to the United States court for the district of Massachusetts, the district in which said collision occurred, under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty: Provided, That the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due, either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability with costs as in like cases in admiralty between private parties with the same rights of appeal: Provided further, That such suit shall be brought and commenced within four months after the passage of this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS, ETC., PASSED OVER.

The bill (S. 174) for the relief of Emma H. Ridley was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1722) for the relief of Watson B. Dickerman, administrator of the estate of Charles Backman, deceased, was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 168) to create a commission to investigate and report to Congress a plan on the questions involved in the financing of house construction and home ownership and Federal aid therefor was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 2224) to incorporate the Recreation Association of America was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 1060) to provide a division of tuberculosis in, and an advisory council for, the United States Public Health Service, and for other purposes, was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 41) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States was announced as next in order.

Mr. KING. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The joint resolution will be passed over.

LIBRARY INFORMATION SERVICE.

The bill (S. 2457) to provide for a library information service in the Bureau of Education was announced as next in order.

Mr. SMOOT and Mr. KING. Let that go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Utah if he has not concluded that he can now remove his objection to this bill?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that as the bill is drawn it simply requires a duplication of work which is absolutely unnecessary. I have talked to a number of persons interested in this bill, and have called their attention to that fact. They have left my office, many of them, stating that they would study the bill, and if they found it to be as I suggested they would either send me a proposed amendment to the bill or they would say nothing more about it. Up to the present time I have not received any suggestions as to how the duplication of work would be done away with.

I recognize that there is a necessity for this class of legislation, but we do not want to pass legislation that will interfere with the Superintendent of Documents at the Government Printing Office and bring about the duplication of work that would follow from the passage of this particular bill, and it is for that reason that I ask that it go over.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I am glad to get the Senator's suggestions. It seems to me that the bill has a great deal of merit. It proposes to make every public library in the country an information bureau to the citizens about the activities of their Government, and I am sure that if that is done the Members of Congress will be relieved of a great many inquiries that are made of them from time to time at present and about which people could be informed by going to the library. I hope the Senator will agree that the action of the committee, which was unanimous in this matter, is in the public interest, and will support the measure after the proposed amendment is suggested.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware that a few of the principal libraries of the United States would be greatly benefited by the passage of a bill of this character, even though the duplication of work were taken out of the bill; but I will say that under the law the great majority of the libraries of the United States now receive every public document that is printed, and I have been appealed to by many of them to stop having them sent, because they have not the room for them.

I have not any doubt but that the libraries in Boston and New York and some of the larger centers could make use, and have made use, of the information that has been sent to them in the past. I want to assure the Senator from Massachusetts that I recognize that fact, and I recognize the wisdom of passing a bill of this kind perhaps, if we confine it to the libraries that make application for the documents, or if we confine it to such documents and publications as are not sent them under existing law.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. The trouble now is that this information is not catalogued or indexed. A pamphlet is sent to-day and another one to-morrow. The purpose of this bill is to inform the librarians of just what these documents are, how useful they can be made to the patrons of the library, and direct them in disseminating the information they contain.

Mr. SMOOT. If we pass the printing bill, which I hope will be passed at some time or other, almost all of the reasons for the passage of this bill will be eliminated. I recognize, however, that that bill has not become a law, and really I do not know when it is going to become a law, because I find that it is a mighty hard thing to pass a law through Congress if it is going to save any money to the Treasury of the United States; and if we can pass that bill it will save about a million dollars a year to the Treasury.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts that a number of persons have been to see me in regard to this bill, and have suggested that the duty should devolve upon the Congressional Library here in the city of Washington. I have no opinion on the subject, but I merely invite the Senator's attention to it. They say that they have the personnel fully equipped to discharge the duties which this bill would impose upon another department of the Government.

I have no opinion on the matter myself, and I merely challenge the attention of the Senator to the suggestions which have been made to me.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection having been made, the bill will be passed over.

Be it enacted, etc., That after the passage of this act the minimum compensation of any person employed by the United States or by the government of the District of Columbia shall be not less than $3 per day, including any Government bonus; or if employed by the hour not less than 37½ cents per hour; or if employed by the month not less than $90 per month; or if employed by the year not less than $1,080 per annum, including any Government bonus: Provided, That persons employed on a monthly or annual salary basis and who regularly perform less than a full day's service shall receive compensation at the rate of not less than 37½ cents per hour: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not apply to persons enlisted in the military or naval branches of the Government nor to the employees in the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, the Territory of Hawaii, the Territory of Alaska, and the Panama Canal Zone, nor to persons holding appointments as postmasters, assistant postmasters, rural carriers, postal clerks, carriers in the City Delivery Service, or railway mail clerks: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall apply only to those persons who shall have attained the age of 20 years: And provided further, That in the case of an employee receiving quarters and subsistence in addition to his compensation, the value of such quarters and subsistence shall be determined by the head of the department, and the compensation of such employees, plus the value of quarters and subsistence, shall in no event be less than the rate fixed by this act.

LANDS IN HAWAII.

The bill (S. 3461) to provide for the exchange of Government lands for privately owned lands in the Territory of Hawaii was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized, when in his opinion the public good demands it, to exchange any land or any interest in land owned by the United States now or hereafter set apart for military purposes in the Territory of Hawaii for privately owned land or any interest therein of equal value located in that Territory and selected by the Secretary of War, and thereafter to set apart for military purposes the lands or interest therein so acquired: Provided, That the Attorney General of the United States shall first pass upon and approve the title to the privately owned lands or interest therein to be acquired by the United States before any exchange of lands shall be made under the provisions of this act.

SEC. 2. That the value of the lands or interests to be so exchanged shall be determined by three appraisers, one of whom shall be appointed by the Secretary of War, one by the owner of the private property, and the third shall be chosen by the two appraisers so appointed. The expense necessary to effect the appraisements herein authorized, when approved by the military commander of the Hawaiian Department, may be paid out of the current appropriations for contingencies of the Army.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator reporting the bill is in the Chamber, and I would like to ask him whether he knows what lands are involved, whether it is a general bill to be passed without a real necessity for it at this time, or whether it is to take care of some particular situation existing in the Hawaiian Islands now?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is to take care of a situation existing at this time in the Hawaiian Islands. It is to effect an exchange of lands without cost to the Government. The Government will get lands it wants and give up lands it does not want. That is the effect of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I know that is the effect of it, but I was wondering whether it is really intended to take care of a situation at Honolulu or in the Island of Oahu.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is in the Territory of Hawaii, as the bill describes in line 7, page 1, and it affects lands only which are now or which may hereafter be set apart for military purposes in the Territory of Hawaii. The War Department informed the committee that the exchange would be to the great advantage of the Government. There is some land which the Government owns which is very desirable for private ownership and some lands which private parties own which will be very desirable for Government ownership. The values are about alike, and they want to make a trade.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

R. 8078) to regulate the importation of coal-tar products, to promote the establishment of the manufacture thereof in the United States, and, as incident thereto, to amend the act of September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," was announced as next in order.

Mr. ROBINSON. Mr. President, may I inquire whether there was an objection made to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. THOMAS. I objected to it; but I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. ROBINSON. It was discussed in the Senate on a former occasion, upon the objection of the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING]. I merely want to say that I would like to have the bill considered, if the Senator will withdraw his objection.

Mr. THOMAS. I will withdraw the objection.

Mr. KING. I would like to say to the Senator that since I objected to the consideration of the bill I have received a communication from the Compensation Board, and likewise a written statement, which was submitted at my request, and from the statements made to me it would seem that the bill ought not to be passed; that it would be a very bad precedent.

Mr. SMOOT. It would involve a great many other cases, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON. I merely want to say, Mr. President, that the bill has a favorable report from the Surgeon General and from the Secretary of War. Of course, the question of policy involved in the bill is one for the determination of the Senate, and I realize that under the rule under which we are proceeding I can not insist upon a further discussion of the matter, if the Senator objects.

Mr. KING. I would like to say to the Senator that I intended to bring that report here this morning. I shall hand it to the Senator, and if he still insists that the bill should be taken up, I shall withdraw objection; but I shall vote against the bill. I shall not object to taking the judgment of the Senate upon it.

Mr. SMOOT. I take it for granted that the junior Senator from Utah has received the same information I have received, and if the information I have is correct, and I get it from the department, of course it will open the door for all sorts of claims, amounting to a greater expenditure than I or anyone else can estimate.

Mr. ROBINSON. Of course, I am not in possession of the information to which the Senators from Utah refer, and I am not in a position to pass upon the value of that information without having seen it. I suggest that it might be well for them to put it in the RECORD, if they care to do so, or furnish me with a copy of it. I do not know of any other way to get it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There being objection, the bill will be passed over.

SALE OF TIMBER ON POWER-SITE LANDS.

The bill (S. 3763) regulating the disposition of lands formerly embraced in the grants to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and Coos Bay Wagon Road Co. was considered as in Committee of the Whole and was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the act approved June 9, 1916 (39 Stats. L., p. 218), revesting title in the United States to the lands formerly granted to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. remaining unsold July 1, 1913, and the act approved February 26, 1919 (40 Stats. L., p. 1179), authorizing the United States to accept from the Southern Oregon Co. a reconveyance of the lands granted to the State of Oregon by the act approved March 3, 1869, the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to sell the timber on lands classified and withdrawn as power-site lands in such manner and at such times as he is now authorized to sell the timber from lands classified as timber lands: Provided, That if a valid claim for a preferred right of homestead entry is shown to exist, in accordance with the terms of section 5 of said act of June 9, 1916, or a preference right of purchase or entry under section 3 of said act of February 26, 1919, for lands thus classified and withdrawn, it may be exercised therefor, as provided in section 2 hereof.

SEC. 2. That the lands embraced in homestead entries or sales authorized by the proviso to section 1 hereof shall be subject to disposition as water-power sites upon the compensation of the owner of the land for actual damages sustained by the loss of his improvements thereon, through the use of the land for water-power purposes, such damages to be ascertained and awarded under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior; and the rights reserved under this section shall be expressly stated in the patent;

SEC. 3. That the provisions of the act of Congress approved May 31, 1918 (40 Stats. L., p. 393), entitled "An act to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to exchange for lands in private ownership lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co.," as amended in section 4 of this act, shall be extended to the lands reconveyed to the United States under the terms of said act of February 26, 1919, and authorize the exchange of lands embraced therein in like manner and for the same purpose.

SEC. 4. That said act of May 31, 1918, is hereby so amended as to require the applicant for exchange to pay a filing fee of $1 each to the register and receiver for each 160 acres or fraction thereof of the public lands embraced in proposed selections, whether now pending or hereafter tendered.

SEC. 5. That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to perform any and all acts and to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary and proper for the purpose of carrying the provisions of this act into full force and effect.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS PASSED OVER.

The bill (H. R. 13229) to establish in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the women's bureau was announced as next in order.

Mr. THOMAS. It will be impossible to consider this bill in the moment of time left of the morning hour, and for that reason I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill will be passed over.

The bill (S. 64) to establish military justice was announced as next in order.

Mr. MYERS. Let that go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be passed over.

The bill (H. R. 2) to pension soldiers of the War with Spain, the Philippine insurrection, and the China relief expedition, was announced as next in order.

Mr. NEW. It is very evident that we can not get anywhere in the consideration of this bill in the one minute of time which remains of the morning hour; that is, if there is anyone who cares to speak further on it. The bill has been twice under consideration in the Senate. I do not know whether anyone cares to speak on the bill. The Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was interested in it and I think at one time expressed to me a desire to say something further on it before it came up for final passage. I would like to know if he is still of that mind?

Mr. KING. Yes, I will say to the Senator, and I have several amendments to offer to it.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which is House bill 13587.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13587) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, just prior to adjournment on Saturday last the reading of the bill was completed and the last amendment passed over until this morning. That amendment reads:

That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Col. William C. Brown, United States Army (retired), to the position and rank of brigadier general on the retired list.

Of course, if a point of order is made against the amendment, it will go out. I shall occupy a very brief space of time before such point is presented, if it is to be made, addressing myself to the merits of the amendment, although its purpose is obvious from the recital.

Col. Brown is now upon the retired list, and is therefore ineligible for further promotion or official consideration except as provided by this amendment, which, while it might be more appropriate upon some other measure, has been offered and accepted here largely because of my inability to secure its recognition in the omnibus bill of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], which was designed to and did cover other similar cases, and which has recently become a law.

The omnibus bill to which I refer, among others, included the case of Col. William A. Simpson, a case largely similar to that of Col. Brown, and perhaps more analogous to it than any of the other various measures of relief of this sort which have been favorably considered by the Congress. It is thus referred to in the committee report:

Senate bill 2488—

Which was the omnibus bill—

provided that the President should be authorized to promote Col. William A. Simpson to the grade of brigadier general. Col. Simpson entered West Point as a cadet in 1871 and graduated four years later. On February 11, 1918, he was retired, after more than 46 years of active service, but was immediately called into active service and assigned to duty as adjutant of the Eastern Department, serving in that post during the war with Germany. It appears upon the records before the committee that in 1898 Col. Simpson, then a major, was taken from duty with troops and assigned to The Adjutant General's Department. In that department promotion was slow, and although he rendered very valuable service many officers of the line junior to him reached higher rank than he did. It is for the purpose of giving him the rank he would have reached had he not been assigned to The Adjutant General's Department that this is proposed.

Col. Brown was recommended for promotion to the rank of brigadier general immediately prior to his having reached the retirement age, and his misfortune is that he was born a little too soon to receive the full meed of recognition which his service requires. It is also unfortunate that this gentleman, whose record is of the best, should not have received the same distinction which in another bill has been conferred upon an equally gallant and deserving officer.

If the Senate will bear with me for a moment, I will briefly refer to this officer's record, which, I think, will be recognized as exceptional.

He has served continuously upon the active list for over 45 years. He participated in two Indian campaigns, in the Spanish-American War, in the Philippine insurrection, in the Mexican punitive expedition, and was under fire in all of them; he has been brevetted for gallantry in action against hostile Indians. He served in France in the war against Germany for over a year, and has been cited for exceptionally meritorious and conspicuous service in such war. Before retirement he was recommended for promotion to the grade of brigadier general.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think it was at my suggestion, or upon my inquiry, that this item went over on Saturday.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I desire to say to the Senator that I am entirely satisfied with the statement the Senator has made, and the statement that the Senator has in his hand, which I have examined.

Mr. THOMAS. I am very greatly obliged to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will make no objection to it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I would not want the Senator to stop his argument on the strength of the statement of the Senator from Washington. I am satisfied with the merits of the case, but I shall feel constrained to make a point of order, as I am informed that if this goes on without a point of order there are a number of cases that will be offered here on the floor. I have just been informed of one or two of them, and in accordance with what I have done in the past I shall have to make the point of order.

Mr. THOMAS. If there are other cases as meritorious as this I think they ought to be included in the bill. The crowning difficulty with cases of this kind is their unquestioned merit, coupled with the inability of the department to recognize them except by further congressional legislation.

Of course, if the Senator from Wisconsin feels it to be his duty to make the point of order the amendment will be stricken out. There is no question about that. But I appeal to the Senator to consider that this is a case in which 45 or nearly 46 years of constant, active, dangerous, and recognized service has been rendered by one of the finest officers who ever wore the uniform of the United States Army; that he performed the last year of his service in France, and as a result of it his chief, Gen. Harbord, one of the greatest of the officers developed in that greatest of all wars, took occasion to specifically make this recommendation. The recommendation was supported by that of other officers, notably Gen. Kuhn, also thoroughly familiar with the character and the extent of the service rendered. Under these circumstances I venture to appeal to the sense of justice of my friend from Wisconsin and ask him to allow this matter to go to conference.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, it is certainly not an agreeable task for one to make a point of order upon a private bill that is very meritorious. It does not seem to me that it is fair to other cases, which may be equally meritorious, to violate the rules of the Senate by giving preference to one and shutting out others. It is not very long since I made a point of order on a very meritorious bill under similar circumstances, and I think that officer would have very good grounds for complaint against me if I made the point of order in his case, as I did make it, and decline to make it in another case, certainly not any more meritorious, in my judgment.

There is no objection whatever to the passage of the bill as a separate bill, a private bill, and if it is as meritorious as the Senator says—and I do not question that it is—it seems to me there ought not to be any difficulty in securing the passage of the bill through the Senate and through the House as well, without placing it as a rider upon an appropriation bill. If we are going to begin to set a precedent for putting private bills on appropriation bills, then the Senator can readily see where our appropriation bills are going to come to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. EDGE in the chair.) Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. THOMAS. Of course, this is not the precedent. It has many precedents of similar character to justify it. I have no doubt that a special bill would pass this body at once, but I think the Senator is mistaken in his estimate of the possibilities of securing its consideration at this session of Congress by the House.

Mr. LENROOT. I make the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin makes a point of order as against lines 9, 10, 11, and 12, page 75, of the bill under consideration. The presiding officer, under Rule XVI, of the standing rules of the Senate, must decide that the point of order is well taken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, may the deferred amendments be taken up in their order? There were some that were passed over on Saturday.

The READING CLERK. The first amendment passed over is, on page 7, line 14, after the word "records" to insert a comma and the following words:

And for the employment of clerical help required to furnish to the adjutants general of the several States statements of service of all persons from those States who entered the military service during the war with Germany, is hereby reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1921, for all expenses, including the employment of clerical and other help in the office of The Adjutant General of the Army, necessary for the completion and preservation of the selective-service records and the completion of the work of furnishing statements of service to adjutants general of States: Provided, That this appropriation shall be disbursed by such officer as may be designated by the Secretary of War for the purpose.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is interested in that amendment, and he informed me a few moments ago that he was compelled to be out of the Chamber for a little while. He will be back in a short time, and I ask that the amendment be temporarily laid aside until his return.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from New York if he would just as lief turn to page 39 of the bill and take up an amendment at that point in which I am interetsed? I am a member of a conference committee, and I should like to have the amendment disposed of, if that course is agreeable to the Senator from New York, before I am called upon to attend the meeting of the conferees. The amendment to which I refer—on page 39—was passed over on last Saturday. It covers an item which was estimated for by the War Department and which the House accepted after the estimate had been reduced by the House Committee on Appropriations, but the Senate committee has reported to strike it out. The clause reads:

Provided, That not to exceed the following sums may be used in the erection and completion of buildings enumerated at the places named—$404,256 for motor training-school buildings at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.; $600,000 for construction of officers' and noncommissioned officers' quarters and the repair and remodeling of such existing buildings as may be available for such quarters at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

I may state to the Senate that when the Army appropriation bill was before the Senate for consideration a year ago I was about to offer an amendment providing for the construction of these buildings, when I asked the chairman of the committee the following question:

I desire to ask the chairman a question with reference to an item which was sent up by the War Department. It asks for an appropriation of $383,000 for the building of a mechanical repair shop at Fort Leavenworth, Kans. I ask the chairman if the item requested by the department can be taken care of out of the lump-sum appropriation for barracks and quarters, water supply—

And so forth.

The Senator from New York replied:

It is my opinion that it can be taken care of out of the item for barracks and quarters, water, sewers, roads, walks, and drainage.

So I did not offer the amendment, because, although the department had asked for the appropriation, the opinion was expressed by the chairman of the committee that the sum needed for the purpose indicated would be available from a lump-sum appropriation; but afterwards it was held by The Adjutant General, I think, that under section 1136 of the Revised Statutes the lump-sum appropriation could not be used for that purpose. So this year when the bill was under consideration an appropriation was asked for and was granted by the House of Representatives. For some reason, however, the Senate committee has seen fit to eliminate the provision.

The buildings referred to are greatly needed at Fort Leavenworth. In the construction of the motor training school buildings old material now on hand at the fort may be used, prison labor may be employed, and the buildings can thereby be erected at a saving of several hundred thousand dollars. It seems to me it would be economy to erect the buildings at this time. I think the chairman of the committee will admit that the buildings are greatly needed. The War Department desired the appropriation, and, after careful consideration, the item was inserted in the other House. I hope the Senate committee amendment will not be agreed to. That is all I desire to say at this time.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Chief of the Construction Division, Gen. Marshall, came before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate to defend the items in this bill, his department being interested, and there were also laid before the committee recommendations of a similar character emanating from other branches of the War Department—I mean by that, recommendations involving the erection of permanent buildings at Army posts and cantonments. The list, is a very long one, and, if all the recommendations were acceded to, many millions of dollars would be required.

On examining the different recommendations and the different proposed projects, the committee was unable to determine why this particular provision was the only one authorized by the other House. The conditions at Leavenworth with respect to motor training facilities and quarters for officers and noncommissioned officers are not nearly so difficult or inconvenient as at many other places. The Senate will note that the appropriation of $600,000 in this instance is asked for the construction of officers' and noncommissioned officers' quarters at Fort Leavenworth. That is a large sum of money to be spent at this time on permanent construction. We have examined the reasons given, and which the Senator has set forth, for this proposed appropriation, and we found the reasons to be about as follows: Fort Leavenworth is the site of the school of the line or the service school. There are a number of noncommissioned officers stationed there on duty at the school. My recollection is that the total number is about 52; that something over 30 of them have quarters provided now in the post; and there are something like 12 or 15 men who live outside the reservation in town and come in and go out each morning and each afternoon. Their quarters are commuted for them. Of the officers I think something like 50 out of several score have to do the same thing, and their quarters are also commuted for them by the Government under the law. The situation does not constitute an emergency.

It is true that there is a certain degree of inconvenience for the small number of men involved, but the Senate committee thought we might postpone the spending of $600,000, especially as there are many other places at which the Army is stationed where conditions are infinitely worse. I can name one close at hand. At the Army War College in Washington, as Senators know, there are officers' quarters, though there are not many of them. A large number of officers are on duty at the Army War College, but the quarters at the Washington Barracks, next to which the War College is situated, are utterly incapable of housing more than a small percentage of the officers at the Army War College. The result is that those officers have to rent apartments and houses here in the city of Washington at very high rentals. The value of the commutation of quarters which they receive from the Government does not anywhere near pay the rent which they have to pay the owners of the apartments and the houses here in Washington. The percentage of inconvenience at Washington Barracks is infinitely greater than it is at Leavenworth, and yet we do not find anything in this appropriation bill which has been passed by the House which does anything for Washington Barracks. As a matter of fact, in going through these projects proposed by the General Staff and submitted to the committees by the chief of construction it actually seemed to us that the Leavenworth item was the one which ought to be attended to last; but we declined to act upon any of them.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President——

Mr. WADSWORTH. I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I am aware of the fact that there is a shortage of barracks here in the city of Washington, but I presume additional barracks have not been erected because it is expected that many of the officers now detailed in Washington will leave here.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But others will come in their places; the War College is full all the time.

Mr. CURTIS. They ought not to; there are probably more here now than are needed. However, in view of the Senator's statement, and in view of the fact that motor training-school buildings, involving an expenditure of $404,256, can be erected at this time by utilizing material on hand and employing prison labor and other available labor at the school, resulting in an estimated saving of about $300,000, I should like to ask if the Senator will not consent to disagree to that part of the amendment ending with the word "Kansas," in line 21, and allow the remainder of the amendment to be agreed to? That would give us $404,000 for the erection and completion of buildings for the motor training school, in connection with which old material on hand could be utilized and the prison and other labor there could be employed. The department states in its letter that there will be a saving, as I recall, of some $300,000 if that can be done.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Do I understand that the $404,000 appropriation is supposed to represent the cost of the proposed construction, even though prison labor is used?

Mr. CURTIS. That would be the cost if prison labor were used, but without prison labor the cost would be over $700,000; and I wondered if the chairman of the committee would not consent to having that item remain in the bill and let the others go out for the present, in view of the policy followed by the committee.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Kansas puts me in an embarrassing position.

Mr. CURTIS. I do not desire to do that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I know, of course, the Senator's interest in this matter, and it is quite a legitimate interest; but the committee struggled hard to save money and to keep these appropriations down.

Mr. CURTIS. I feel more interested in this than the Senator realizes, because of the fact that I was going to offer a similar amendment last year, and it was the statement of the chairman himself that prevented me from doing so.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had no idea that the Senator was going to ask for over $400,000 for erecting a motor-training school building.

Mr. CURTIS. Three hundred and odd thousand dollars was the amount estimated at that time, but it will cost more now than it would then. I do not blame the Senator, for he thought, as I did at the time, that the buildings could be erected out of a general lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I thought the buildings for a motor-training school could be covered in an item of something like twenty or thirty thousand dollars. My recollection was that there was some rule or perhaps some statute which authorized the erection of buildings under the appropriation for "barracks and quarters," when the amount to be expended was limited, and I thought that the item in which the Senator from Kansas is interested could be taken care of in that way. My recollection is that there are nine motor transport stations over the country. There is no real emergency for this item right now.

Mr. CURTIS. Does the Senator think that the department would have recommended the appropriation if it had not wanted it?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, as the Senator knows, the department recommended estimates carrying a billion dollars; they do not care what they recommend; they estimate for and recommend anything they want. The item covered by the amendment is rather desirable, I will admit, and some day they ought to have a moor-raining building a Leavenworh, probably.

Mr. CURTIS. Did not the Senator feel last year that there should be such a building at Leavenworth?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not at this cost; I had no idea such an amount was involved. I had no idea that the Senator had in mind such an extensive program and elaborate program, involving the expenditure of over $400,000, to erect permament buildings at this time, when the Army is in a state of flux and when the Motor Transport Corps already has a training school at Holabird, in Maryland, in full blast, with 2,500 men there, and has, according to my recollection, although I am not absolutely certain, eight other depots scattered over the country similar to the one which it is proposed shall be erected on a permanent basis at Leavenworth.

Mr. CURTIS. How much does the Senator think ought to be required to erect the necessary buildings at Leavenworth?

Mr. WADSWORTH. That would be a hard question to answer, even if I could be persuaded that the buildings are necessary. I hope the Senator will not insist upon my taking one and leaving the others. They are, as I have said, not emergency items; they are desirable I will admit, but they are not emergencies.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask for a division of the amendment, so that we may have a vote, first, on the part of the amendment ending with the word "Kansas," in line 21, on page 39, which will cover the item appropriating $404,256 for the erection of a motor-training school building or buildings. As I said a moment ago, the labor is to be performed by prison labor and much of the material is old material which now is on the ground.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CAPPER in the chair). The Senator from Kansas asks for a division of the question.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask that the amendment be stated; I do not understand it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the amendment as proposed to be divided.

The READING CLERK. The committee amendment proposes to strike out the proviso, beginning with line 17 and ending with line 24, on page 39. It is proposed to divide the question so that the vote may be taken on the first portion of the proviso, which reads as follows:

Provided, That not to exceed the following sums may be used in the erection and completion of buildings enumerated at the places named—
$404,256 for motor-training school buildings at Fort Leavenworth, Kans.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I should like to read merely one little paragraph from the memorandum for Gen. Hervey, Director of Operations of the General Staff:

Subject: Repair unit and shop at Fort Leavenworth.
With reference to the memorandum of the Acting Secretary of War, dated April 10, 1919, herewith, it would appear that the Acting Secretary did not thoroughly understand what the plan for building and equipping shop at Fort Leavenworth contemplated. It is recommended that the disapproval of this proposition be reconsidered and that the project be approved, or, if necessary, that it be submitted to Congress recommending approval.

Then the memorandum goes on and makes an argument for it; but it is apparent from that that the War Department itself was not convinced that it was an emergency, as the Acting Secretary of War upon one occasion disapproved it as an estimate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the first branch of the amendment and the second branch of the amendment will be voted on separately, as requested by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I should like to clarify this matter a little. This neither increases nor diminishes the appropriation, as I understand.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, yes, Mr. President; the Senator will note that we decrease——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not the amendment as stated. The proviso is that $404,000 may be used for that purpose. That is stricken out. I will say to the Senator from Kansas that I have had some experience with an amendment of that sort. I succeeded in securing the insertion of such an amendment at one time upon a bill of this sort, and I found afterwards that it was merely permissive, and that it did not require the department to make the appropriation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator from Nebraska need not worry about it; they will spend it.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I did worry about the other, and they did not spend it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator wanted it spent on that occasion.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I feel reasonably satisfied that the Senator from Kansas will not secure his appropriation by securing the elimination of this amendment. I inquire again of the chairman of the committee whether this changes in any way the total amount appropriated for these items?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator will notice that on line 17 the House had appropriated $10,000,000 for barracks and quarters. The Senate committee has reduced it to $7,500,000 and has stricken out a million dollars for the special purposes. Now, if the Senate is going to defeat the Senate amendment and restore those two Leavenworth items, we will have to raise that $7,500,000 by a million dollars.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I have not asked for any such amendment. I am asking for a separate vote on the one matter.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes; I was grouping them together. I was simply explaining the parliamentary situation.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think, then, in view of what the chairman states, that I am in favor of the amendment. I believe in holding the appropriations down.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the first branch of the committee amendment.

On a division, the first branch of the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the second branch of the committee amendment.

The second branch of the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will state the first amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The first amendment passed over is on page 14, in lines 20, 21, 22, and 23, which reads as follows:

And provided further, That hereafter the Army Air Service shall control all aerial operations from land bases, and that naval aviation shall have control of all aerial operations attached to a fleet.

Mr. LODGE obtained the floor.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to perfect the Senate committee amendment?

Mr. LODGE. Certainly; I am not opposing the amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had it printed on Saturday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 14, line 23, after the word "fleet," it is proposed to insert:

Including shore stations whose maintenance is necessary for operations connected with the fleet, for construction and experimentation, and for the training of personnel.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I understand that this is for the purpose of perfecting the original amendment?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, as I have just stated, I have no objection to the amendment. It makes the clause better. My objection is to the clause put in by the House, and even with the amendment I object to it.

The House provided:

That hereafter the Army Air Service shall control all aerial operations from land bases, and that naval aviation shall have control of all aerial operations attached to a fleet.

That, of course, as it stood, as it came from the House, made it simply absolutely impossible for the Navy to carry on an air service. All they were permitted to do was to command their own ships, and when they were using airships in connection with the other ships they would have control of them. It is utterly impossible to carry on naval aviation without land bases. We have six provided for in the appropriation bill. We must have bases for the hydroplanes, for the training of the men, and for all that goes with the maintenance of an air squadron.

Mr. President, I think such an arrangement can lead to nothing but dissension and trouble. If you attempt to put the men and officers of the Navy under the control of Army officers in connection with everything on shore, you create a situation which seems to me utterly impossible. I can not imagine running the military and naval departments on such a basis as that. If all the air services are to be consolidated into one, as proposed by the Senator from Indiana, that is another and very different question. This, as it stands, as it came to us from the House, simply transfers the Naval Aviation Service to the control of the Army, except while the hydroplanes are in absolute use with the fleet at sea. It did not put the ships and the hydroplanes, when at sea, under the control of the Army, but it did everything else.

That I can not conceive to be a good working arrangement. I think to put the sailors of the Navy and the officers of the Navy under the command of Army officers at all the land bases could not possibly lead to good service. I know, of course, that the Navy Department is strongly opposed to it, and I am also assured that the War Department is opposed to it. The two departments have made an arrangement between themselves, which is printed on a little leaflet that I have not here at the moment, for cooperation in air service.

I can not extend particularly the argument upon this subject, because it seems to me to argue itself. I hope that the Senate will strike out the whole provision, and let it go back to the House for reconsideration.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have taken some little pains to ascertain the views of both the War Department and the Navy Department touching this amendment; and as they are very brief I think I will have them appear in the RECORD.

The first is a letter from the Secretary of the Navy. He says:

MY DEAR SENATOR: I thank you very much for your kind letter of April 20, regarding the clause appearing in the Army appropriation bill. Your communication reached me to-day just as I was directing a letter to the President of the Senate regarding this matter.

There can be no doubt of the impropriety of inserting such a clause as this in the Army bill. Necessarily, all naval operations must primarily start from a land base. While we hope to give naval aviation the mobility which belongs to other naval units, nevertheless in certain activities aviation will be compelled to make its start from the land. Manifestly it would be confusing, and therefore undesirable, to have such activities controlled or interfered with by another service than the Navy.

I trust that the Senate will see fit to eliminate this clause which is included in the Army bill as it passed the House.

Attached herewith is a copy of the letter above mentioned regarding this matter, which has been addressed to the President of the Senate.

Very truly, yours, JOSEPHUS DANIELS.

This letter was written in April, but the matter has been the subject of a good deal of discussion in the Navy Department as well as in the War Department; and Assistant Secretary Roosevelt, under date of May 19, wrote me another letter in which he expresses substantially the same view. I will read it:

I have to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of May 18, 1920, regarding a measure which has been inserted in the Army appropriation bill, and which is objectionable to the Navy.

The impropriety of including in an appropriation bill for one branch of the Government anything involving the policies of other branches of the Government would seem manifest.

And that is what they do in this case. This is a matter pertaining to the Navy. The amendment does not originate with the Naval Affairs Committee either in the House or in the Senate, but is a matter put on by the Committee on Military Affairs in the House. It seems to me that they are overstepping their particular bounds of propriety in seeking to regulate the Navy from the Army end.

Where the interests of both services have not been previously investigated, the insertion of such a clause would seem particularly objectionable.

I have invited the attention of Senator LODGE to this point, and he is in agreement regarding the impropriety of inserting the clause proposed in the Army bill. I have also discussed the matter with Secretary Baker—

I want to call especial attention to this fact, because I understand that Secretary Baker has written a letter which, it seems to me, ought to be given to us by the Senator from New York. Am I right about that? Has the Senator from New York a letter from the Secretary of War touching this matter?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have.

Mr. PAGE. I understand that both the Army and the Navy are agreed.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Has the Senator from New York any objection to supplying us with that letter from the Secretary of War?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not the slightest. I was going to describe, when my turn came, just how everybody felt about it.

I am not attempting to conceal what the Secretary of War feels and says. There are occasions, however, when the Committee on Military Affairs has not followed the advice of the Secretary of War.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like very much to have the letter available, so that we can see exactly what his attitude is.

Mr. PAGE. I commence again:

I have also discussed the matter with Secretary Baker, who informs me that the clause was inserted without his knowledge, and that he is in agreement that the enactment of this legislation is undesirable.

Thanking you for your interest in this matter, and trusting that the clause in question may be eliminated from the Army appropriation act, I am, very truly, yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
Acting Secretary.

Senator C. S. PAGE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

The man who perhaps knows more about this matter of aviation than any other—at any rate he is in a position to know—is Capt. Craven, director of naval aviation. It is true that Capt. Craven has had a long conference with the Senator from New York, and they have agreed in regard to this amendment, which Capt. Craven and the Senator from New York drew. It provides:

Including shore stations whose maintenance is necessary for operations connected with the fleet, for training of personnel, and for construction and experimentation.

It is true that that very much improves the bill as presented to us originally, but it does not remove the objection which I think exists properly to transferring, without the knowledge or consent of either the Secretary of War or the Secretary of the Navy, something which pertains to the naval side of this matter, and ought not to have been introduced on the military side, from my point of view. I ask to have the letter of Capt. Craven read by the Secretary.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SMITH of Georgia in the chair). Is there any objection? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF NAVAL OPERATIONS,
Washington, May 15, 1920.

MY DEAR SENATOR: My attention has been drawn to a clause appearing in the Army appropriation bill, as agreed to recently by the Senate Military Affairs Committee, which is very detrimental to the best interests of the Navy.

This clause reads as follows:

"And provided further, That hereafter the Army Air Service shall control all aerial operations from land bases, and that naval aviation shall have control of all aerial operations attached to a fleet, including fleet shore naval air-station bases."

I deem it my duty to bring to your notice the following results of such a measure, if it should be enacted into a law:

(a) The definition of a base at once becomes an important point at issue, and the exact meaning of the law as written in the above clause, if it should be enacted, is not evident. Possibly the committee had no intention of restricting naval operations, but a rigid interpretation of the clause might prevent the Navy from projecting aviation operations from the land, which in preparation for war or in time of war would materially and improperly interefere with naval activities.

(b) If the bill is passed as framed by the committee, the future of the station now being created by the Navy at great expense in Lakehurst, N. J., for the purpose of erecting rigid dirigibles, is immediately changed. The work is now progressing under appropriations for the Navy, the rigid having been shown to be essentially a naval unit. By recent arrangements between the Army and the Navy, to avoid duplication, the development of rigids in this country has been placed in the hands of the Navy. If the only station at which erection of these large craft can be undertaken is taken out of the hands of the Navy, confusion, delay, and expense to the Government must result.

(c) The status of the Naval Aviation School, at Pensacola, becomes uncertain with the enactment of a measure such as that proposed. The reasons would seem compelling for the Navy to retain a school for teaching flying in seaplanes and the operation of these craft in connection with ships. At this school Army fliers designated to fly seaplanes are instructed. Aside from merely piloting a machine, many other details of a professional and highly technical nature and necessary for a naval aviator are taught at this place.

(d) With the enactment of this legislation, the naval air stations at Chatham, Rockaway, Cape May, Anacostia, and Coco Solo would immediately pass into the hands of the Army. These stations have been maintained by and for the Navy, and are in neighborhoods where it is deemed important that such stations should exist for naval purposes, though they may not be considered as naval bases.

Chatham is on Cape Cod, and is the only naval air station in New England. It is convenient to the naval rendesvous and to the area in which the Navy is accustomed to exercise in Cape Cod Bay.

Rockaway is off the entrance of the port of New York. It would seem unnecessary to point out the responsibility of the Navy in guarding this region, in the event of hostilities, and of the necessity for training and preparing for this work in normal times of peace in this region.

Cape May is an important station, where aviation would work in connection with submarines and other small naval craft, for guarding the entrance of the Delaware.

Anacostia is a small station for seaplanes on the edge of Bolling Field, at Washington, D. C., from which important experimental work is carried on. This work is in connection with the development of radio communication, direction finding, engineering, and ordnance features of naval aviation.

Coco Solo is a small air station in the Canal Zone, from which naval aviation projects its operations for assisting in the guarding of this important region.

At all of the above-named stations, training and development operations are carried on, essential at this time, in order to make the art of aviation useful for naval purposes.

(e) With these stations taken from the Navy, the only aviation bases remaining would be at Hampton Roads and at San Diego.

A clause of this kind, having such a wide effect upon the military and naval policies of the country, it would seem should not be enacted into legislation, without a full consideration of its results from every point of view, and therefore I deem it my duty to bring this matter to your careful attention at this time.

Very truly, yours,

THOMAS T. CRAVEN,
Captain, United States Navy,
Director of Naval Aviation.

Senator C. S. PAGE,
Chairman Naval Affairs Committee,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I want to say simply, in connection with the matter, that it has been before us now for something more than a month, and the protests which come to me from all branches of the Navy Department with whom I have been in contact are uniformly opposed to this legislation. They think it is so wrong that it is surprising that anybody should try, from the military end of the matter, to regulate the Navy, as is sought to be done by this amendment.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the letter put into the RECORD by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], from Capt. Craven, which has just been read, is completely out of date. It might just as well have not been read. It does not apply to the question before the Senate at all, for since that letter was written Capt. Craven and myself prepared the amendment to the committee amendment which the Senate a few moments ago adopted.

It may be that the captain at the head of naval aviation is not in favor of any legislation at all. I think it is true that he is not in favor of any legislation. It may be that the Secretary of the Navy is opposed to any legislation. It may be that the Secretary of War, on being requested by the Secretary of the Navy, replies that he, too, thinks that legislation is undesirable. But the fact is that this committee amendment as now presented to the Senate does not do to the Navy any of the things which it is alleged the House of Representatives or the Senate Committee on Military Affairs intended to do.

The House language was clearly faulty. The House language, as the Senator from Massachusetts has said, would probably have confined naval aviation entirely to the carrying of airplanes on battleships or airplane carriers, and would have prevented the Navy from maintaining any naval aviation base or station on shore. Such a proposal as that was clearly impossible. When it came before the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate we recognized that situation, and our first amendment, which we intended as a cure to the fault which we believed existed in the House provision, provided for adding the words, after the House language, "including fleet shore bases." On consultation with Capt. Craven we learned that the term "fleet shore bases" would not include several of the activities of naval aviation which it was absolutely necessary for them to carry on upon shore, for example, the training schools, the aircraft factory at Philadelphia, the new dirigible base at some point in New Jersey, and two or three other of the naval stations which could not be called "fleet shore bases."

So this language was drafted in my office by Capt. Craven and myself. We had already stricken out, at the end of line 23, the first committee amendment, which read "including fleet shore bases," and we had substituted this language:

Including shore stations whose maintenance is necessary for operations connected with the fleet, for training of personnel, and for construction and experimentation.

I am assured that that language covers every naval aviation activity on shore which is a legitimate part of naval aviation on shore; that it covers everything they intend to do in the future. It is true, however, that it would not permit them to do in the future some of the things which they have done in the past, and those things which they have been doing in the past which the committees of both the House and the Senate want stopped are things which duplicate what the Army must do anyway.

I refer, especially, Mr. President, to aviation patrol of the coasts. I am informed now that the Navy intends no longer to continue coast patrol with its aviation. It has been doing that in the past. We do not want to see it resumed in the future, because the Army must do it anyway. We want to see it understood that naval aviation should not be used to patrol forest areas. We want to see it understood that naval aviation should not be used to patrol, for example, inundated areas on the Sacramento River. We know that those things have been proposed. We know that there has been a great deal of duplication in the past and a good deal of it has been eliminated. As I said before, the chief of naval aviation tells me that this does not do the naval aviation any harm whatsoever, but where we can stick a pin in without doing any harm to either service we propose to do it in order to save the taxpayers' money.

This whole question of aviation, of course, is a mighty difficult one, because, try as they will, Mr. President, there is bound to be some duplication. We are trying to reduce the duplication. Even under this amendment there will be duplication, because both services are training fliers to do exactly the same kind of thing in the elemental courses. The Army trains part of the Navy fliers and the Navy trains a part of its own fliers. The day will come some time when one service will train all fliers.

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] and myself argued that to the Senate at the time his aviation department bill was being considered. We proved to our own satisfaction, but not to that of the Senate, that it would be to the interest of the taxpayer to cut down overhead. There is an example right here at Bolling Field. There is one Government flying field. The Army has a repair shop there, the Army has hangars there, and the Army has officers and enlisted men. Four hundred yards away from that the Navy has a repair shop, the Navy has its hangars, and the Navy has officers and enlisted men, and when the naval aviators want to indulge in their prescribed flying in order that they may be entitled to flying pay they go over to the Army and ask them to let them fly their machines in order to qualify to get the advanced pay of a flier.

As a matter of fact, Mr. President, while it is a pretty thing to have around, there is no more use from the taxpayers' standpoint, there is no more use from a tactical standpoint that I can think of, for having a naval aviation station equipped with a fleet of boats here at Washington than there would be of having it at the top of Pikes Peak. It is not operated in conjunction with the fleet. It is not used as a training school to teach the personnel in the first instance, so far as I know, and it is not used to construct airplanes or flying boats.

Our attempt in this matter is not to injure anyone. Not one of the letters that have been put in the RECORD asserts that the amendment which has been agreed upon injures the Navy. But it will prevent the Navy from establishing a coast patrol up and down the Atlantic coast, running on exactly parallel lines with the Army coast patrols which must operate between the several coast-defense stations of the Army. The Army aviation is compelled to assist the Coast Artillery posts up and down the coast where the fixed emplacements and the big guns are located. The Army aviation perform their reconnaissance duties for them. They patrol out from the Coast Artillery stations, and wireless or telephone back the signals to the forts who are members of the Army. They start out from these posts and go up and down the coast in time of war, keeping in constant touch with the Army that has control of the Coast Artillery stations and the mine fields.

There is no reason whatsoever in having another coast patrol and this amendment in part is to stop that duplication. It has been given up at this moment. The Navy is giving up its coast patrol under regulations, but it is astonishing how easy it is to amend regulations in order to permit two people to do the thing which one person alone can do.

The amendment will also stop what I think that the Navy does not want to do; it will stop the naval aviation from being used as a patrol for the forests. There is a provision in the Army reorganization bill which authorizes the Secretary of War to use the Army aviation to patrol the forest reserves for the next year. We simply want it so that if it has to be used to patrol the forest reserves the work will be done by the Army aviation, and that the naval aviation will not be used. That is the purpose of the amendment. There is nothing mysterious or dangerous or destructive about it. Neither of the Secretaries is apparently enthusiastic about it, and neither has pointed out what harm will be done the Navy.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. WADSWORTH. In just a moment.

Mr. THOMAS. I merely wish to ask that the amendment may be read again, so that we may be able to understand it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have assured the Senator from Washington that I would put in the RECORD a letter received from the Secretary of War by myself, dated May 21, on this question.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I would like to have the letter read at the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be read.

The Reading Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 21, 1926.

MY DEAR SENATOR WADSWORTH: I venture to inclose a letter which has just come to me from Secretary Daniels with regard to the provision in the pending Army appropriation bill on the subject of air bases. I fully concur with Secretary Daniels in believing that an Army appropriation bill ought not to contain provisions of any sort with regard to naval operations, since naval authorities are not heard by the Military Affairs Committee, and their views are not, therefore, consulted. As I understood from our telephone conversation, you also agree to this view, and I supposed that you had accomplished the entire object of the Navy in the amendment worked out with Capt. Craven. I assume, however, from Secretary Daniels's statement that the Navy Department would still desire the entire elimination of my reference to the Navy, and for the reasons above stated I take pleasure in concurring in the Secretary's views.

Cordially, yours,
NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

Hon. JAMES W. WADSWORTH, Jr.,
United States Senate.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, the Senator from New York very kindly stated that the letter from Capt. Craven is entirely a back number, that it has no particular force after adding the few words that have been added by the amendment at the bottom of page 14.

The facts are that Capt. Craven, speaking for the Navy, accepted this amendment as possibly the best thing that could be done under the circumstances, but I wish to say that the amendment is not satisfactory to the Navy Department, that the amendment does not meet with the approval of the Secretary of War, as is shown by this letter, and that it does not meet the approval of the Secretary of the Navy. All I can say is that the department which seems to control on the part of the Army has stepped in and said not that this or that thing must be done, but let me read it so you can see how sweeping it is:

That hereafter the Army Air Service shall control all aerial operations from land bases, and that naval aviation shall have control of all aerial operations attached to a fleet, including—

And so forth.

If it is true that this is a duplication of work, instead of having this passed over to the Army, as is done by the bill, why do not the Army and the Navy Departments say that the Navy shall have control, as in my judgment they ought to have charge, of all matters pertaining to naval aviation? It is so objectionable to everyone with whom I have talked from the Navy Department that I think there must be some mistake on the part of the Senator from New York in insisting that everything is cared for by these three or four lines. That is not the view of the Navy Department.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Will the Senator point out what is not cared for in this perfected amendment?

Mr. PAGE. The burden of proof is put upon the Navy to show that everything except the little matter mentioned in those three lines has been passed over to the Army.

Mr. WADSWORTH. It certainly did not alarm the head of naval aviation. He almost guided my pencil as I wrote it.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the Senator a moment ago to state that Capt. Craven desired this entire provision to be eliminated.

Mr. WADSWORTH. He expressed that as a preference, but he certainly assured me and other members of the committee that if this perfected amendment in the bill were agreed to it would not hurt the Navy at all.

Mr. PAGE. I was present when Capt. Craven and the Senator from New York, the chairman of the committee, got together and tried to improve the provision, but the fact is that after they had improved it to the extent that they could, and had gone on to their different departments and sat down and studied it in cool blood, those representing naval aviation said they did not believe that we ought by one sweep to pass over everything beyond recall to a department that ought not to have taken consideration of naval aviation affairs at all.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have listened to this discussion, and I have listened very carefully to the Senator from New York. Of course, the amendment offered by him does clarify the situation very much indeed and eliminates three-fourths of the objections contained in the amendment as it came to the House. But I wish to call to his attention the reason why the men in the Navy think this amendment will interfere with some of their operations.

During the war the Army and the Navy had a specific agreement as to aviation—as to what part the Army should do and what part the Navy should do and what they should do jointly. I will not refer to the Army part of the aviation, as this provision certainly could not under any circumstances interfere with that. This was the agreement during the war, or rather a memorandum of the understanding as to what they should do:

Naval forces: Operation from mobile floating bases or naval air stations on shore (a) as an arm of the fleet—

The provision as amended could not interfere with that part that was given to the Navy—

(b) for overseas scouting—

It could not interfere with that—

(c) against enemy establishments on shore when such operations——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Why does the Senator say it would not interfere with overseas scouting?

Mr. SWANSON. Because the Army would not do the scouting outside of the 3-mile limit.

Mr. POINDEXTER. We are speaking about what the situation would be. If the Army would not do it and the Navy is prohibited from doing it, then it is not done at all.

Mr. SWANSON. It is not prohibited from overseas scouting, but I will point out where it does seriously interfere.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I am not going to interfere with the course of the Senator's argument, except to point out at this particular juncture his statement that the amendment as now proposed by the Senator from New York would not interfere with overseas scouting. In my opinion it would interfere with it, because the amendment proposed by the Senator from New York limits the aviation service of the Navy to the stations that are connected with the operations of the fleet. Overseas scouting is not necessarily connected with the operations of the fleet.

Mr. SWANSON. In that way it might be, under that narrow construction, if that narrow view was taken.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had assumed, as apparently had the author of the memorandum from which the Senator was reading——

Mr. SWANSON. This is my interpretation of the memorandum that was furnished to me.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Overseas scouting is a part of the operations of the fleet.

Mr. SWANSON. The third duty given the Navy, which a literal, narrow construction of this amendment would seriously interfere with, is the following:

(c) Against enemy establishments and on shore when certain operations are conducted in cooperation with other types of naval forces, or alone when their mission is primarily naval.

At the Navy Department those who have read this amendment tell me that if they endeavor to establish on shore a naval base that they are afraid it would be so construed that they could not do scouting work in connection with it. The Comptroller of the Treasury might construe it that no money could be utilized for the purpose because it was given as a part of the naval functions during the war.

I can readily see when I read it that the establishment of a base which might be used for Army or naval purposes is not connected with operations of the fleet. If that is true, under a strict legal construction of this amendment as amended, the naval aviation would be powerless and could not be utilized for that purpose.

When we have this naval aircraft what is the use of putting in amendments to the effect that it can not be used for this purpose, which under a strict construction of it might so confine it that in time of war it could not be used? The Navy is compelled to build aircraft for that purpose, and if they should put the naval base down in Cuba in time of war, which was friendly to us, or on St. Thomas, and if an effort was made by the enemy, under a literal construction and if they did not broaden this construction, naval aircraft could not be utilized. That is a very serious objection to it.

The next is to protect coastal sea communications. Under that the Navy was given the right to patrol the coastal sea. We prohibit the Navy from doing any patrol on the coast. It is the function of the Navy. We make no appropriations for it and it has been abandoned. There is no duplication of work there. But supposing during a war submarines of the enemy would come inside the 3-mile limit, it ought to be the right of the aircraft to follow them and destroy them. They tell me that under a literal construction, unless a very broad construction was given to it, not connected with the operations of the fleet, if a submarine of the enemy was to come within the 3-mile limit and this amendment as perfected was in effect they could not utilize the Navy aviation. We have no desire to do that. We do not want a duplication of the patrol of the coast, and Senators felt that way about it, and they made no appropriation for that purpose.

Why should money appropriated and its use be limited so that if a submarine should come inside the 3-mile limit naval aircraft could not be employed for the purpose of its destruction?

(II) Convoy operations.

The Navy during the war had aircraft and vessels for convoying ocean vessels through and outside the 3-mile limit. The convoy was not conducted as a part of the operations of the fleet; it was an independent service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. SWANSON. I do.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Was not the convoy a part of the fleet?

Mr. SWANSON. A considerable portion of the fleet was in Hampton Roads; but why adopt an amendment to an Army appropriation bill which, if construed literally, would prevent naval aircraft convoying vessels for a certain distance at sea?

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator knows that the fleet includes all the vessels of the Navy?

Mr. SWANSON. But some of these convoys were armed merchant vessels.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But were they not naval vessels?

Mr. SWANSON. To some extent they were.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Were they not actually commanded by naval officers?

Mr. SWANSON. But what is the use of adopting any such legislation as that here proposed? Under the law that now exists the Army does all of the mining within the 3-mile limit; the Navy's mine operations are outside the 3-mile limit. When it is provided that the Army shall control the air service from land bases and that the naval air service shall be limited to specific operations, it might be construed as prohibiting the Navy from operating within the 3-mile limit.

(III) Attacks on enemy submarines, aircraft, or surface vessels engaged in trade prevention or in passage through the sea area.

If an enemy vessel should come within the 3-mile limit on the coast of the United States and naval aircraft were available, they ought to be permitted to destroy it, or at least to attack it; they should not be compelled to remain idle and await the action of the Army, because, after all, naval aircraft are, perhaps, better adapted to that purpose than are the Army aircraft. I think under a strict construction of the amendment that such action could hardly be taken by the Navy.

(c) Alone or in cooperation with other arms of the Navy, or with the Army, against enemy vessels engaged in attacks on the coast.

If an enemy vessel were to come to our shores, whether a war vessel or any other kind of a vessel, if it comes within the 3-mile limit, I see no reason why Navy aircraft should not be permitted to attack it, and why they should not be permitted to engage in scouting work and be on the lookout for such enemy vessels. A literal construction of this amendment, in my opinion, would prohibit such activity on the part of the Navy, while a broad construction of it might not. The Navy has requested that its activities be not restricted in the manner proposed.

I think Gen. Mitchell, when he made the statement to which reference has been made in the hearings had before the House, was entirely unaware of some of the facts and aspects of the situation. If the Navy feels that the Comptroller of the Treasury in interpreting the provisions of the appropriation bill will decide along the lines indicated, I think it would be most unfortunate to add such a provision to the bill.

The Navy must develop aircraft so as to meet the submarines within the 3-mile limit, and to attack other vessels of the enemy that come within the 3-mile limit both here and in the Philippines; and it seems to me to put in a prohibition here to prevent their performing that useful service is not wise. It seems to me the right thing to do, if it is desired to prevent duplication, is to strike out this amendment; let the matter go to conference; and if there is any duplication which it is desired to get rid of, eliminate that duplication. In that event I will be with you; but it does seem to me unwise, in general terms, to put a limitation on the aerial activities of the Navy.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry? What is before the Senate?

Mr. LODGE. I move to strike out the proviso on page 14, beginning in line 20.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 14, line 20, after the word "appropriation," it is proposed to strike out the following proviso:

And provided further, That hereafter the Army Air Service shall control all aerial operations from land bases, and that naval aviation shall have control of all aerial operations attached to a fleet, including shore stations whose maintenance is necessary for operations connected with the fleet, for construction and experimentation and for the training of personnel.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATIONS—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator from new York [Mr. WADSWORTH], who is in charge of the pending bill, if he will agree to lay aside the unfinished business temporarily so that I may submit the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation bill? I should like to say to the Senator from New York in making this request that there is only one amendment in dispute, but it will be an amendment that will perhaps involve some debate, though I do not think very much. I shall also want a roll call on the final disposition of the report. I understand under the rule I can present the conference in any event, but that I can not have it taken up except by unanimous consent under the existing parliamentary situation.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I have every sympathy with the Senator from Nebraska in his desire to secure quick action on the conference report on the Agricultural appropriation, but it is my duty and the duty of the other members of the Committee on Military Affairs to secure quick action on the military appropriation bill, which has not yet reached conference. I understand that the matter in disagreement between the two Houses on the Agricultural appropriation bill is the famous matter of the free distribution of seeds, and I anticipate that the debate to which the Senator from Nebraska has referred may last a little longer perhaps than he thinks.

Mr. NORRIS. As representing the conferees on the part of the Senate, I desire to say to the Senator from New York that I do not expect to debate the amendment further than to state the question and to obtain a vote of the Senate thereon. There may be, however, other Senators who will desire to debate it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. But the Senator says there will be a roll call, which will probably involve the calling for a quorum. We are just about to vote on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and after that I think there are only a couple of other amendments left to the bill, which may be disposed of in a short time. If the Senator will let me get the Army appropriation bill out of the way, I shall be glad to have the conference report to which he refers considered.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I merely wish to say to the Senator from New York that I expect to make a motion to recede from the Senate amendment. I do not intend to debate it at all, but merely desire a vote, in order to get the matter out of the way, unless some other Senator desires to speak.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Is it the intention of the Senator from Nebraska to ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; there will be a record vote. Of course, I am not going to attempt to secure action on the report without the consent of the Senator from New York.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands, the Senator from Nebraska has not submitted a request for unanimous consent for the present consideration of the conference report?

Mr. NORRIS. No. I submit the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 93 to the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The conference report will be read.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the Senate numbered 93 to the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

A. J. GRONNA,
G. W. NORRIS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
GORDON LEE.
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, I shall have to deny unanimous consent on that question, although I regret to do so.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska does not need to ask unanimous consent to submit the report.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from New York does not object to my presenting the report, does he?

Mr. LODGE. That is a privileged question.

Mr. NORRIS. That is a privileged question.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I do not object to that. I object to taking up the report for consideration.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator feels that way about it, I shall not insist on the report being considered at this time; but I give notice that to-morrow after the morning hour, or immediately after the disposition of the morning business, I shall call up the conference report for consideration.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. May I ask the Senator before he takes his seat if the report presented by him is a final report on the Agricultural bill?

Mr. NORRIS. I can not say that it is. It is a report of disagreement on the only amendment that is left in conference.

Mr. WARREN. The bill has been sent back to conference and there is only one amendment in disagreement. The bill went back to conference, and the conferees now submit another report.

Mr. NORRIS. The last report submitted by the conferees embraced two other amendments, which have been disposed of.

Mr. WARREN. A report was made as to those items and it was accepted; but one item was left in disagreement, so that conferees were again appointed, and they have met again.

Mr. NORRIS. We have met again and present another report.

Mr. WARREN. The conferees have met, tried out the case, and find they can not agree, so they now report the disagreement to the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; that is right.

ARMY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13587) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the object sought to be obtained by this amendment was too clearly stated by the Senator having charge of the bill to need any further elaboration. It appears to me that the objections made to his statement are founded upon conditions which are largely, if not entirely, imaginary, certainly under conditions which have any existence in time of peace. If we should be so unfortunate as to encounter another war in the near or the distant future and any embarrassments resulting from this measure should confront the Navy Department, it would be the easiest thing in the world to remove them.

The fundamental object of the amendment is economy, unity, and efficiency in service. I can conceive of nothing more incongruous in legislation than the possibility of such a duplication of the Air Service as to give the Navy Department jurisdiction over the forests of the interior. However, the point I wish to emphasize, Mr. President, is that this discussion has, to my mind, clearly demonstrated the need for placing the Air Service in a separate department authorized to take jurisdiction of and to administer it in all its branches. I think it demonstrates the wisdom of the bill which is now pending, offered by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], to which he has devoted a great deal of thought, and regarding which he at one time addressed the Senate. Of course, nothing of that kind is at present possible. The suggestion has encountered the combined opposition of both departments, and probably always will; but the ultimate solution of the problem will come when its vast importance is duly appreciated and the conflict of authority and the duplication of administration indicate the necessity of an independent air service, as in years gone by the need was indicated for the separation of the Navy from the War Department.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. I am through.

Mr. LODGE. I merely wish to say to the Senator in connection with what he has just said that I specifically stated that I was not discussing the question of consolidation.

Mr. THOMAS. I am aware of that.

Mr. LODGE. The consolidation proposed by the Senator from Indiana is a wholly different question.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator so stated, and I understood him fully.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THOMAS. I yield the floor.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if I may trespass for a few moments on the time of the Senate, I should like to add just a word or two to what the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] has said. I think this whole discussion ought to be an object lesson to the Senate itself, but I am pessimistic enough to doubt that that will be its effect.

It is perfectly apparent here that there is involved here the same old question of a difference of opinion between the Army and the Navy. The Senator from Vermont cites a letter from the Secretary of the Navy in which that official refers to this whole matter from the standpoint of the Navy, while the Secretary of War has written another letter, which has been presented here and is now a part of the record in this case, in the course of which the Secretary of War speaks of the objection to the consideration of a naval matter by the Committee on Military Affairs.

I should like to ask the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, or any Senator here present, how you are going to refer a matter affecting the aviation service to any given committee of the Senate without in some degree trespassing upon the function of some particular department with which that committee is not in any way connected, and which it does not represent.

If this subject had been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, some objection would have been raised by the Army, as it has now been raised by the Navy, because of its consideration by the Committee on Military Affairs, and the Senator from Vermont would find himself and his Naval Affairs Committee assailed for having trespassed upon the functions and affairs of the Army; and so it is, and so it will ever be, until there is a separate department of aviation and a separate committee of each House to consider these questions as they very properly should be considered.

The Secretary of the Navy, Capt. Craven, and the others who have appeared here and who have spoken or written of this subject, speak of it from the Navy standpoint as it affects the question——

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question right there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. PAGE. Is it not true that the Army and the Navy are both in absolute accord about this matter, and are not both opposed to the amendment offered by the Senator from New York?

Mr. NEW. Oh, yes; they are in absolute accord on what? They are in absolute accord on the one fact that neither one of them wants to give up anything that his particular department has. That is all. That is the extent to which they are agreed.

Mr. PAGE. But in this case the Secretary of War declines to interfere with the action of the Secretary of the Navy in matters which pertain purely to the Navy.

Mr. NEW. Yes. That is, as the Senator from New York suggested, a case of secretarial reciprocity. That is senatorial courtesy in the Cabinet.

It is exactly true, however, that the Secretary of the Navy and those officers connected with the Navy who have testified on this subject are viewing it from the standpoint of the interests of the Navy, if you please; those who come to speak from the Army are representing the interests of the Army, and neither one of them is speaking from the standpoint of the interests of aviation. They are each considering the whole subject as an adjunct of his particular department, his particular line, and neither of them is regarding the thing from the standpoint from which it should be regarded, and that is as a thing separate and distinct from either of their departments.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana further yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. NEW. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PAGE. I should like to ask the Senator what he thinks about the courtesies he suggests when he proposes to take a matter that is very vital to the Navy, and, without a single reference on the part of the Committee on Military Affairs to the Navy, proposes to take away the functions of the Navy and transfer them to the Army without their consent?

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, this does not take away anything, and so far as that is concerned, I want to say now that for months and months I have been endeavoring here to get, just as a matter of agreement, a committee composed of members of the Committee on Military Affairs, the Committee on Naval Affairs, and the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, which might sit down and just as a matter of common agreement consider this whole question as one appertaining to aviation, as it concerns and affects all three of these services, and see if we could not agree among ourselves upon some kind of a program, some suggestion that we could make to Congress; and I have not yet been able to get that committee appointed. I never have been able to get it together. Months ago a request was made for the appointment of a committee on aviation, which should deal with this whole subject as it should be dealt with, as one pertaining to aviation and aviation alone. It has been impossible to get such a committee, and here we find ourselves, after months of consideration of this question, right up against the old proposition, the Navy objecting to the consideration of a question by the Committee on Military Affairs. I have no possible doubt that the Army would be quite as vociferous in its objection to a reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs and I think the Post Office Department probably would resent anything that might be decided by either of the other committees, and certainly they would object to anything that might be suggested by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads; and there you are.

Congress is perhaps as much to blame for the lack of progress by this country in this most important matter as is anybody else through our failure to apply the only remedy that I think can be applied, and that is by the appointment of a separate committee which can consider this thing independent of the interests of any particular branch of the service and to deal with it on its own merits.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, the argument that has just been made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW] in favor of the unification of aviation control is a very strong argument for the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] to strike this clause out of this bill and to leave this subject for consideration in a more fundamental way until there is an opportunity by the Senate to determine the question of whether or not there shall be a department of aviation independent of either the Army or the Navy.

It certainly is very inconsistent, if one believes in an independent aviation control, to proceed in the meantime, and before that control has been established, to give the Army jurisdiction over branches of the service which are now controlled by the Navy. That is no advance toward independent control. The Senator from Indiana has just said it should be independent of the Army and should be independent of the Navy. How are we arriving at any such independent control by giving the Army an extended jurisdiction over a service which is now part naval and part military?

There is another suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana to which I want to call attention. It was also made by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. In fact, I think it was made first by the Senator from New York. He said, in response to the Senator from Vermont [Mr. PAGE], that this amendment would not take anything from the Navy. Well, if it would not take anything from the Navy, why is it proposed? If it does not take anything from the Navy, if it leaves the naval service just as it was before, then we are engaged in a futile discussion, and the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts ought to be adopted, because the provision, if passed, according to both of its sponsors here, would have no effect. It would simply add to the uncertainty and confusion of this controversy between the two departments.

So far as the duplication of work is concerned, the Senator from New York called attention to Bolling Field, the hangars and machine shops of the Army and of the Navy on this same field, and the cadets in the aviation service of the Navy asking permission to fly the airplanes of the Army at this field.

The adoption of this amendment would not change that situation in any way. There is nothing in the amendment, even though it should have the effect that is apprehended, that would prevent the Navy from still maintaining the aviation service at Bolling Field in connection with the fleet of vessels which are gathered at the navy yard and in connection with the operation of naval vessels to and from the navy yard up and down the Potomac.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Washington yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I had not meant to have it understood that I thought this amendment would prevent naval aviators from doing their service flying in Army machines. I merely indicated that as one of the forms of duplication, and indicated Bolling Field as a duplication of overhead which I hoped some day would all be stopped by having one service; that is all.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I think there is a great deal to be said in favor of the object that the Senator from New York has just stated; but the point I am making is that we are making no progress toward attaining that object by the provision which is now sought to be stricken out. The Senator from New York has repeated, in his last utterance here on the floor, that these conditions that he has used as an illustration would not be improved by the adoption of this provision.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Oh, I think they would be vastly improved. I think they would not be entirely eliminated.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I understood the Senator to say that they would not be changed in any way at all.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Just as to the specific thing which the Senator had mentioned a few minutes before. That would not be changed, but there are many other things which would be prevented.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Now I want to point out just what effect it seems to me this provision would have upon the naval aviation service.

There has already been established between the War Department and the Navy Department a committee called the Joint Army and Navy Aeronautical Board for the purpose of coordinating the air service of the Navy and of the Army and avoiding duplication. That was referred to by the Senator from New York a moment ago when he said that a good deal of this duplication had been eliminated. He stated, I believe, that the coast patrol which heretofore had been maintained by the Navy had now been turned over, by voluntary agreement between the Army and the Navy, to the Army; so that no legislation is necessary to accomplish that, and all other duplication has been eliminated by this board that I have just named.

I have here the division of the branches of the Air Service which has been agreed upon by this board between the two departments. The program is as follows:

Army aircraft: Operations from bases on shore:
(a) As an arm of the mobile Army.
(b) Against enemy aircraft in defense of all shore establishments.
(c) Alone or in cooperation with other arms of the Army or with the Navy against enemy vessels engaged in attacks on the coast, such as—
(I) Bombardment of the coast;
(II) Operations preparatory to or of landing troops;
(III) Operations such as mine laying or attacks on shipping in the vicinity of defended ports.

All of that program of the Air Service, by the voluntary agreement of the joint Army and Navy Board, has been turned over to the Army. No legislation is necessary in order to accomplish that.

In this same program the following has been allotted to the Navy:

Navy aircraft: Operations from mobile floating bases or from naval air stations on shore—
(a) As an arm of the fleet;
(b) For overseas scouting;
(c) Against enemy establishments on shore when such operations are conducted in cooperation with other types of naval forces or alone when their mission is primarily naval;

(d) To protect coastal sea communications by—
(I) Reconnaissance and patrol of coastal sea areas;
(II) Convoy operations;
(III) Attacks on enemy submarines, aircraft, or surface vessels engaged in trade prevention or in passage through the sea area.
(e) Alone or in cooperation with other arms of the Navy or with the Army against enemy vessels engaged in attacks on the coast.

All that is entirely without regard to the operations of a fleet. The fleet might be a thousand miles away, and yet these services would be allowed under this program of the allotment to the branches of the service to be performed by the Navy. I continue reading:

Marine aircraft: The functions normally assigned to Army aircraft shall be performed by the marine aircraft when the operations are in connection with an advance base in which operations of the Army are not represented. When Army and marine aircraft are cooperating on shore, the control of their operations shall be governed by the one hundred and twentieth article of war, United States Army.

If there is to be an independent air service, whether under a board or an independent director or under a department, that is one thing, and it is a very different thing from transferring the powers of one department to the other department. If the functions of one department are to be transferred to the other department, why transfer the naval service to the War Department? Why not reverse it and transfer the Army service to the Navy? You would secure just as much unity of control in that way as you would by transferring the naval air service to the Army. Is there anything in the aviation records of the War Department which would lead to a selection of the War Department in preference to the Navy Department, if you are going to give either one the predominance in the air service of the country?

Mr. NEW. Yes.

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator from Indiana says "yes." I suppose he has in mind the fact that the War Department expended a large part of over a billion dollars appropriated and did not get a battle plane of our own make in France. We are somewhat familiar with that record. There is no doubt that the personnel of the Aviation Service of the Army acted in a most creditable way. The training of the men in certain respects was very commendable and the qualifications of our trained flyers were very fine. But the trouble was that under the War Department management they did not have any American battle planes to fly in, and hundreds of them who had been trained at great expense by the Government spent months waiting in France for an opportunity to fly, but the War Department furnished them with no American planes in which to fly.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if the Senator from Washington will permit me, of course, I had no reference whatever to the disastrous program for the manufacture of planes which we carried on here during the war; but in answer to the Senator's query as to whether there is a greater reason for giving the control to the War Department or to the Navy Department, if it is to be given to either, I would say that the reason is found in the fact that the Army employs a great many more men and the Army service is several times bigger than the Navy service. The Army can do practically everything that the Navy does, and the Navy can do very little that the Army does. The argument, if it is to be given to either one as against the other, is altogether with the Army.

Mr. POINDEXTER. It is, so far as numbers of men and amount of money appropriated are concerned, but otherwise, so far as the quality of the service is concerned, I do not think the argument is altogether with the Army.

Mr. NEW. I do not think it should be with either.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not think necessarily the decision ought to depend on mere size or mere numbers of men.

But that is really aside from the question, as I think this whole provision is aside from the question of the unification of the air-service control. The Navy is not asking that any part of the Army service be transferred to the control of the Navy.

The peculiar situation exists that although the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are both opposed to this amendment, by some influence, some representations that were made to the committee in the House of Representatives which put this provision in, and which I may say is very much improved, I think, from the standpoint of fairness to the Navy, by the amendments proposed by the chairman of the Senate committee—it is a peculiar situation, that so far from the Navy asking any extension of control of the air service, it is only asking to be let alone, and the head of the War Department is asking the same thing, but nevertheless some influence was exerted upon the House committee, without calling any representative of the Navy Department and giving that department an opportunity to be heard, to present that phase of the question, an amendment has been brought here which if adopted as originally passed by the House and sent to the Senate would revolutionize the relations between these two departments of the Government, and would do so without giving an opportunity for presenting the essential and vital facts upon which the entire matter ought to be decided.

I am told that the head of the Army Air Service has been engaged for a considerable time in agitating this question of a unification of the control of the Air Service, and that it was through his activity and his testimony that this provision for extending the Army control was inserted by the House.

To show the unreliable character of the information upon which, apparently, this provision was inserted, I have here the following statement, furnished to me by an officer of the Navy Air Service, and which I submit on his authority, and not upon mine, which shows that Gen. Mitchell's testimony before the House committee contained a great many errors as to important facts.

Gen. Mitchell, so it is asserted here, argued before that committee that there were a number of unnecessary stations under the control of the Navy in which the Army work was duplicated, and he named Rockaway; Yorktown; Hampton Roads; Coco Solo, Canal Zone; Anacostia, D. C.; New London, Conn.; Dutch Flats, Calif.; Boston, Mass.; Narragansett Bay; Culebra, Canal Zone; Portsmouth, N. H.; Hawaii; and Philadelphia.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. POINDEXTER. I yield.

Mr. NEW. I merely wish to inquire of the Senator from Washington if he does not think that that in itself argues a rather remarkable state of facts, that those naval aeronautic stations should have been discontinued and the head of the Army aeronautical service not advised of the fact? Is not that of itself proof conclusive that there is an utter lack of cooperation and coordination between the Army and the Navy?

If the Senator will permit me just one further word, I think, in justice to Gen. Mitchell, it ought to be said that the Senator does not accurately represent his contention. His argument is in favor of a separate service altogether, not definitely locating it with the Army, but a separate service altogether.

Mr. POINDEXTER. In response, apparently, to his information and his testimony, it was to be located, according to this provision, with the Army and put under the Army control. That is the express provision which is the subject of this discussion.

The Senator asked me if this statement on the part of Gen. Mitchell as to the existence of stations which had been abandoned did not indicate a lack of coordination of the services. It certainly indicates a lack of information on the part of the Army of the aviation service of the country, and it certainly does not afford any argument in favor of conferring upon a department which displays such an astounding lack of information about the condition of the aviation service this extended authority which would be given to it by this amendment, even as it is modified by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH].

It may be, and I accept the correction, that Gen. Mitchell proposes to have an independent service and does not urge that the services be consolidated in the War Department. All that I say is that apparently upon his testimony the War Department was given this jurisdiction.

Quoting from a letter from the Naval air service addressed to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], it is said:

It may be noted that the Culebra that the Navy has in mind is not the Culebra of the Canal Zone, but the island of Culebra in the Danish West Indies, to the east of Porto Rico. The general then goes on to show a saving due to reduction in personnel necessary to operate these stations. He stated that this saving amounted to $1,625,000. This statement is entirely incorrect and misleading, for at certain of the above-named places no complement of personnel is intended by the Navy. Therefore I fail to see what right Gen. Mitchell has to assign a complement of personnel to these stations and to claim that they are a duplication because of the presence of such personnel. The Navy has no air stations at the following above-named places: New London, Boston, Yorktown, Narragansett Bay, Culebra, and Portsmouth. The Navy has intended to have at these places facilities only for hauling out boats when aviation is cooperating with surface craft.

Mr. President, the Senator from New York stated, I think, at one time, that this proviso would not take from the control of the Navy any branch of the service which it is now conducting, but I think at other times in his argument, rather in conflict with that, he pointed out certain branches of the service which it would take from the Navy. It is either one or the other. If it takes none, then it is useless; if it takes any, then it is making an important change without a hearing.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Of course, the Senator knows I meant legitimate uses of naval aviation.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I accept that statement of the Senator and, of course, what are the legitimate uses is a matter of conflicting opinion.

If we accept the judgment of the joint board which was established as the representative of the two departments, then this provision takes away a number of the legitimate functions of naval aviation. For instance, in this program which has just been marked out by the board, as I have stated, operations "against enemy establishments on shore when such operations are conducted in cooperation with other types of naval forces, or alone when their mission is primarily naval," would not necessarily be in connection with the operations of a fleet. This proviso limiting the Navy control to such services as are in connection with operations of a fleet would prevent the Navy from carrying out this program.

Quoting further from the naval program agreed upon by the joint board—

Reconnaissance and patrol of coastal areas.

That has been allotted to the Navy, exclusively to the Navy, under the voluntary arrangement between the two departments, and yet the amendment, even as amended by the Senator from New York, would deprive the Navy of that control.

So as to convoy operations, unless they were in connection with the operations of a fleet. It might be considered that the escort of a convoy constituted a fleet, but there could very readily be a construction contrary to that, as has been pointed out here by the Comptroller of the Treasury, who might hold that such service was not in connection with the operations of a fleet.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator must know that the term "fleet" includes every vessel in the Navy.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I do not understand that at all. Suppose we have a couple of vessels engaged in escorting a convoy, or a single vessel, even; I do not understand that that would be considered necessarily as a fleet.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Not a fleet, but it is a part of a fleet. The Senator can not mention a naval vessel by name that does not belong to the fleet.

Mr. POINDEXTER. That is a very broad construction and would not necessarily be the definition that would be given by the accounting officers of the Government. I do not think that it is the ordinary definition, and if the Senator will pardon me, I do not think it is an accurate definition of the word "fleet." According to that, any tugboat, isolated as it might be in some port, would be a part of a fleet.

It is only a part of a fleet when it is operating with a fleet. We might have a number of fleets. We have vessels in the Pacific that might properly be designated the Pacific Fleet. We have vessels operating together in the Atlantic described as a fleet, but I do not accept the definition of the Senator from New York that every detached vessel of our naval equipment, of whatever size or character, or whatever work it may be engaged in, that is under the control of the Navy Department, constitutes a fleet or a part of a fleet.

Here is another division of Air Service allotted to the Navy by the joint board:

Attacks on enemy submarines, aircraft, or service vessels engaged in trade prevention, or in passage through the sea area.

Our fleet might be in the south seas. The enemy submarines might be in the north Atlantic. The only recourse, the only defense, the only means of protection that might be available might be by naval airplanes; and if they could not operate under the law except in connection with operations of the fleet, when the fleet was a thousand miles away, it seems to me it would be a somewhat strange state of the law which by this provision would forbid the Navy from engaging in that proper naval operation.

So it seems that the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] ought to be adopted, and the provision ought to be eliminated, and the matter ought to be left for consideration upon the proposal of the Senator from Indiana [Mr. NEW], supported by the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH], for the consolidation of all of the various aerial services of the Government under one head, and until that time has come that we should not complicate the situation by allowing the Army to invade the field of the naval service.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Before the question is put I should like to offer an amendment by way of a perfecting amendment, though perhaps that is not exactly an accurate description of it. I call it to the attention of the Senator from Washington. In line 21, on page 14, after the word "hereafter," I move to insert the words "in time of peace."

Mr. LODGE. There is no objection to that.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADSWORTH. In line 21, same page, after the word "all," I move to insert the word "military." That is to prevent any conflict with the coastal department.

Mr. LODGE. There is no objection to that amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I should like to have the proviso read as now amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the proviso as amended.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

And provided further, That hereafter in time of peace the Army Air Service shall control all military aerial operations from land bases, and that Naval Aviation shall have control of all aerial operations attached to a fleet, including shore stations whose maintenance is necessary for operations connected with the fleet, for construction and experimentation, and for the training of personnel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts to strike out the proviso as amended.

On a division, the motion was agreed to.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The next amendment passed over will be found on page 15, where the Senate committee proposes to strike out lines 20 to 25, inclusive, as follows:

For the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of 640 acres of land, more or less, and the appurtenances thereunto belonging, situate in Macomb County, State of Michigan, now occupied by the Air Service of the Army as an aviation station, and known as Selfridge Field, not to exceed $190,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I hope that the amendment will not be agreed to. This provision was adopted by the Senate at one time and failed to receive consideration in the House. The House Committee on Military Affairs incorporated it in the bill and the Senate committee disagreed to it. It was not considered by the Senate committee, as I understand the matter, but went out on the theory that it properly should be considered by the Committee on Appropriations in connection with the sundry civil appropriation bill.

I paid no attention to it myself, because when the House adopted it, knowing that the Senate had agreed to it heretofore, I took no further interest and did not notify the committee that I hoped it would be retained. When I learned that the Senate committee had stricken it out, I then went to the committee. I went to the Committee on Appropriations, which was then in session, thinking that it would be placed in the sundry civil appropriation bill, if true that the objection to it was that it properly belonged there. I was then told that inasmuch as it had passed the House and was on the Army appropriation bill it would be better to bring it up here and ask the Senate to disagree to the committee amendment.

I will briefly state the facts in the case. This item proposes an appropriation of $190,000 to purchase Selfridge Field, between Mount Clemens and Detroit, Mich. It is a field consisting of 640 acres of land, upon which the Government has already expended something over $2,300,000. It has an option from the owner of the property to purchase it at $190,000. It was not purchased at that time, but condemnation proceedings were instituted. When I asked the department why condemnation proceedings were instituted, I was told that they did not wish to be subjected to any criticism in the purchase of any property of this kind, and therefore they thought it best to institute the proceedings, because if a jury should find that it was worth more than $190,000 the option would compel the owner to sell for that sum anyway.

Mr. President, this property is worth a great deal more than $190,000. The owner of the property is not insisting at all that the appropriation shall be made, although he is perfectly willing that the Government should have the field, which was prepared for this particular service. I am satisfied myself that if the Government did not intend to use the property as a flying field it would still be the duty of the Government to buy it and dispose of it for a larger sum than the cost price. I am told that the property would sell to-day for at least half a million dollars and probably for a larger sum.

I repeat that the Government expended over $2,300,000 on the field. If we are to embark in the flying business in this country, if we are to conduct aircraft experiment and conduct an aircraft division under the Government, it seems to me we need this field near Detroit.

Mr. THOMAS. May I ask the Senator what the distance is from Detroit to this field?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have never been to it.

Mr. THOMAS. Approximately?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I should think perhaps 12 or 15 miles. It is between Mount Clemens and Detroit. It is on the Lake front. It is a very valuable piece of property as it has now been arranged. It is in the north central region of the country. The aircraft department believes that we need an aerodrome there and that we need the field for the purpose of training fliers. It is in the very center of aircraft production. There is opportunity there for constructing planes, for training men, and the public interest is very great indeed. I believe it is conceded, at least from all the information I can obtain on the subject, that it is one of the best located fields in the United States. May I just read a letter that was submitted to me in the form of a memorandum of this subject? It is directed to me, and is as follows:

1. The Air Service is desirous of acquiring Selfridge Field and the fundamental considerations still exist and point particularly to the necessity for its retention, owing to its strategic location, both from a military and an aircraft producing standpoint. The following are some pertinent facts relating to Selfridge Field:

(a) Acreage, 640; cost of construction, $2,385,770.53; cost to acquire, $190,000.

That is the option price; that is what it will cost the Government to obtain it.

Annual rental—

We do not own it—

$13,500.

(b) This field was one of the group selected by the General Staff of the War Department for retention by the Air Service.

(c) The subcommittee of the House Military Committee which investigated the purchase of fields for the Air Service recommended Selfridge Field for retention. A bill for the purchase of this field was passed by the House recently and several months ago was passed by the Senate.

(d) Selfridge Field is the only field in the north central section of the United States, and it is very essential that an aerodrome be maintained in this locality on account of its strategic value. This field is a terminus of a chain of Air Service stations for aerial communication through the east Central States, north and south.

(e) The Air Service desires to use Selfridge Field for the organization, training, and maintenance of aero squadrons in pursuit and aerial gunnery. This field is located on Lake St. Clair, and due to the fact that the water is very shallow in that vicinity the Air Service would be able to carry on aerial target practice without danger to the civil population and without any additional expense to the Government in providing facilities for such training.

(f) There are a large number of reserve military aviators in the north Central States; and, in order that these reserve pilots may keep up their flying training with a minimum of expense to themselves and a maximum of result to the Government, it is necessary that a flying field be retained in this part of the country. Should the War Department organize reserve aero squardons at some future date a field would be needed in this locality, and it is believed that Selfridge Field fully meets all the requirements for such purposes.

(g) In view of the cost of construction of this flying field and the investment of the Government, it is believed that it will be economical to the Government to acquire this field for permanent use.

2. The above reasons, although previously presented to the Committees on Military Affairs, both of the Senate and House, in connection with H. R. 8819, are in no way modified by any conditions which have arisen since that time.

W. E. GILLMORE,
Colonel, A. S. A., Chief, Supply Group.

Mr. President, I repeat if I had known that there was any question in reference to the favorable consideration of this item by the Committee on Military Affairs, I should have appeared before the committee; but assuming that what the Senate having done they would do again, especially as the House had passed it, and recognizing the fact that the property itself is now worth much more than the Government is called upon to pay for it, I have felt that it was entirely proper that the Senate should understand the situation, and, understanding it, I had hoped that they would agree to this amendment and permit this item to be retained in the bill as the House has inserted it.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Mr. President, the Committee on Military Affairs has had a most difficult time keeping track of these purchases of land. The Committee on Appropriations has had an equally difficult task. The time was when permanent investments on the part of the Government for the use of the Army were handled, as I understand, by the Commiftee on Appropriations. Especially was that true when any matter involving the purchase of real estate was concerned.

It is true, of course, that the Military Affairs Committee has often reported appropriations for the erection of buildings upon land already owned by the Government. Some of the members of the Committee on Appropriations have been complaining during the last year that the practice of the Committee on Military Affairs of giving consideration to questions affecting land purchases ought to stop or else the Committee on Military Affairs ought to take over the whole subject. During the war, of course, when hurry calls came from the War Department, their first and easiest channel of approach was through the Military Affairs Committee, and we abandoned, as most of the other committees of the Senate abandoned, all previous customs and divisions of functions. So the Committee on Appropriations appropriated money for the purchase of land for the Government to be used by this or that department, and the Committee on Military Affairs reported appropriations to enable the Government to purchase land for the Army. Of course, that procedure can not go on; it is utterly impossible to do business in that way. Some one committee has got to know how much land the Government is buying for all purposes.

So, as I have said, there has been a good deal of impatience expressed, notably by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, who is also a member of the Committee on Military Affairs. He has said many times in the Committee on Military Affairs that it is utterly impossible for him to keep track of both committees at the same time, as very often they meet at the same hour, and different conferences are going on at the same time, all involving purchases of this kind.

Accordingly the Committee on Military Affairs, so far as it is able to do such a thing, agreed to go back to the old policy of refusing to appropriate money for the purchase of land and allowing such matters to be taken care of by the Appropriations Committee. Therefore, we struck out of the pending bill the provision for the purchase of Selfridge Field; we struck out of the bill the item for the purchase of land at Leon Springs, Tex.; and we struck out of the bill the appropriation for the purchase of a little piece of land in Boston, on the theory that those matters should be taken care of in the sundry civil bill. I think we would not have done so in any one of those three cases had there really been a great emergency connected with the proposals for the purchases, but, as we understand, there is no real emergency in the matter of Selfridge Field or Leon Springs or Boston. I understood the Senator from Michigan to say that a bill for the purchase of Selfridge Field had gone through both Houses of Congress.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The letter which I have just read from Col. Gillmore states:

A bill for the purchase of this field was passed by the House recently—

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The letter continues:

And several months ago was passed by the Senate.

I assume that Col. Gillmore knows what he is talking about.

Mr. WADSWORTH. If the bill passed the House recently, how could it have been passed by the Senate several months ago?

Mr. TOWNSEND. It passed the Senate first, I take it, without receiving any consideration by the other House, or some similar bill passed, or a bill in some other form. I have not looked the matter up, but the House has now passed the legislation and it comes to the Senate for action on the pending bill.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I think Col. Gillmore is mistaken as to that. The only bill of which I have any recollection that has had to do with the purchase of fields or the completion of construction at fields is one a copy of which I hold in my hand, Public No. 151, Sixty-sixth Congress, which was originally House bill 8819, which was approved February 28, 1920—last winter. That carries an item of $35,000 for some general construction at Selfridge Field, but it does not provide for buying the field. It is that bill, a copy of which I have, which contains the appropriations for the purchase or the completion of the purchase of the fields which the War Department stated they must have. After much discussion, both in the House and in the Senate, with which, so far as the Senate is concerned, the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is thoroughly familiar, the bill was made up, and Selfridge Field was not included as one of the fields the purchase of which should be completed. The General Staff in their recommendations for appropriations to be given by Congress carry Selfridge Field to-day as one of those fields awaiting the declaration of the policy of Congress with respect to it. So Selfridge Field has been in the balance, so to speak; the department has been waiting to see what Congress was going to do, and Congress has not thus far pledged itself or declared its policy in connection with its purchase.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I recall very well when the so-called emergency bill was before the Senate. I raised the question at that time when the Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER], as I recall, had charge of the bill. I think the committee was then favorable to the purchase of Selfridge Field, but that was a sort of emergency bill. They appropriated $35,000 to complete some improvements on this particular piece of land, but I have never known, from any source, anything but approval of the proposition to purchase Selfridge Field. I have called up the department, and they are all favorable to it. I have presented the proposition largely from a business standpoint. There can be no denial, in my judgment, of what I have stated with reference to the value of this property.

I desire, however, to speak concerning the parliamentary situation for just a moment. Perhaps there will be no virtue in so doing, but I wish to repeat what I have said before, that I first took this matter up with the committee headed by the Senator from Missouri, but I was told that only emergency matters were to be considered and that it must wait until the general military appropriation bill was before the Senate.

That bill came to the Senate from the House with this item in it; it was referred to the committee, and the Senator from Indiana stated he would take care of it, as he was very much in favor of it, and I paid no more attention to it. When I learned the other day that objection had been made by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] that this was not a proper subject to go on the military appropriation bill but should find a place in a bill coming from the Appropriations Committee, I went to that committee immediately, as they were in session, and presented the situation just as it had been presented to me. I was told that the Senator from Wyoming was not there when this item was passed upon, but that it had been generally agreed to that items of purchase should go on the appropriation bill. I then suggested that we put it on the bill which was being considered at that time, namely, the sundry civil bill, but was told inasmuch as it had been placed on the Army appropriation bill in the House and objection would not be raised, that it had better be left on that bill and allow the Senate itself to pass upon the question whether or not the committee amendment should be agreed to. So I did not urge upon the committee having in charge the sundry civil bill the consideration of the item, because I was discouraged from so doing.

The Senator from New York says it is not an emergency matter. Possibly not, although I presume that in years to come that field or some other property will be purchased; but I am wondering if it is not the part of good business to retain a piece of property upon which the Government has expended $2,380,000 or thereabouts by paying the option price of $190,000, for which it can be obtained now, rather than allow it to go back to those who own it, and who are perfectly willing to take it back. It is a lake-front piece of property consisting of 640 acres and is worth from $500,000 to $1,000,000 at least to-day, without any regard as to whether it is used for military purposes or otherwise. It is, as I have said, a valuable piece of property, and I think the Government ought to buy it by paying the option price of not to exceed $190,000 and take it. Of course, under condemnation proceedings if a jury should find that it was worth less than $190,000 the Government would not pay any more than the jury should find; but a jury, in my opinion, would find it to be worth probably a million dollars, although the Government will not have to pay more than the option price of $190,000. So the Government stands to win and not lose on a proposition of this kind. For these reasons I feel that this property ought to be purchased.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I was a member of the subcommittee of the Committee on Military Affairs that considered the purchase of a very large number of these aviation fields purely from an emergency standpoint. At that time our subcommittee found that although the War Department had leases and options upon practically every one of these fields, running in many instances to as late as 1923, and in some cases for an annual rental as low as $1 a year, nevertheless in the face of all that, after the signing of the armistice they proceeded in many cases to exercise the option and to bind the Government to purchase this property—a case where they clearly had the legal right to do that which they did do, but, like many other things that have been done by the War Department, a very clear violation of the trust reposed in them in using the appropriations made for the purpose of carrying on the war to undertake by themselves to establish a future military policy for the Government without any action of Congress. This subcommittee in the consideration of these various matters undertook to take care of those cases where, on the one hand, the War Department had legally obligated the Government for the purchase price, and, in the second place, where the Government, having expended a very large amount of money and not being protected by options running into the future, would suffer a loss unless this real estate was purchased.

There were so many of these cases that my recollection as to Selfridge Field may not be entirely accurate; but it is my recollection that as to Selfridge Field we have an option on the purchase price of $190,000 running to 1921 or 1922. Perhaps the Senator from Michigan can tell me more accurately as to that.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The option expires the last part of next month.

Mr. LENROOT. But in the lease there is a provision for a renewal of the option and the lease, is there not?

Mr. TOWNSEND. I have not seen the option, but that is not my understanding.

Mr. LENROOT. I think that is the fact—that in each one of these cases there is the option upon the part of the War Department to renew both the lease and the option, I think in most cases running for five years from the date of the original lease; and I feel very certain that the Government is protected in this way in Selfridge Field.

In view of the present condition of the Treasury, and in view also of the fact that neither the Committee on Military Affairs nor any other committee of Congress thus far, as far as I know, has undertaken either to establish or to approve a policy with reference to permanent aviation fields in the country, I think we ought not to be making appropriations now, if the Government is protected, without that investigation being made by some committee of the Senate. The subcommittee to which I have referred did not make that investigation because I think all the members of the subcommittee—at least, all the Republican members, and I think the same was true of the Democratic members—were new Members of the Senate, who were not familiar with the aviation question; and I personally felt that when it came to the establishment of a policy as to how many aviation fields should be permanently established in the country that was a matter that should be passed on by Senators who were familiar with the entire question, and our subcommittee was not, and that the province of our subcommittee was merely to treat these matters as emergency matters so as to protect the Government in the expenditure that had already been made.

If I understand the situation correctly, the Government will not lose any rights if this property is not purchased now. If I understand the situation correctly, the original lease was to provide for a renewal of the lease and the option; and if that be true, this is no time for expending large amounts of money out of the Treasury of the United States for the purchase of real estate which can as well be purchased later on.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, as a member of the Military Affairs Committee I have not been able to attend as constantly as I should the meetings of the committee when preparing this appropriation bill. As to aviation, that, as we all know, is of comparatively late date before the Congress, and I have not taken it up as one of those things concerning which I expected to perfect my information or education.

As to this particular item, I did not hear all that the Senator from Michigan [Mr. TOWNSEND] said, but he involved somewhat the Committee on Appropriations. I wish to say, first, that until the confusion of war and the abrogation of peacetime rules and, I might almost say, principles, the purchase of land by the Government for new Army posts, for the extension of posts, and for new buildings, as well as other public buildings in the way of courthouses, post offices, and so forth, was always taken care of in the sundry civil bill. In cases of great emergency such items have at times been inserted in deficiency bills. I think I have stated that before the Committee on Military Affairs. I have done it without any desire to take anything from that committee over on to any one of the general appropriation bills, because I am not jealous of the joys that may come from enlarging the duties of other committees through absorption of certain appropriation items from sundry civil bills. At the present time, however, I think the Committee on Military Affairs, without so much reference to what had been the rule of peace times as to what the committee had immediately before it, did take into consideration the shunning of all expenses for land except what were considered emergency cases.

As to the particular field in question, I do not know whether it is an emergency case or not. I am not opposed to it, nor do I want to favor it or any other bill until we have a little more information about what the particular terms of the contract are; but in framing the sundry civil bill, which is now ready for calling up for consideration, the House has almost entirely failed to cover matters of public buildings and land, and, in fact, has granted nothing for rivers and harbors except what is in the nature of continuation of contracts, and so forth. The House went on record—not only the House committee but the House itself—with a good deal of emphasis on a rule of no appropriations for land or new buildings, so that when the matter was brought to me as chairman of the Appropriations Committee I stated very frankly that we did not have the information we should have, and I did not believe we had any chance to get it through conference if we put it on the pending sundry civil bill, and that if it could not be considered by the Military Affairs Committee the only hope for this year would be to have it follow, as many another thing has followed during war times, for consideration in the deficiency bill which is now being considered in the House committee, where any new matter should be presented.

I doubt very much whether they are going to provide for buying lands in that bill; but the matter could be and would be, if estimated for and presented with proper evidence, a subject for consideration in the next annual sundry civil bill. I understand from the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT]—and I assume that he is correct about it—that this option may rest for another year; so, without undertaking to oppose or to urge this proposition, I want to set the matter right before the Senate and before the Senator from Michigan.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment, which the Secretary will state.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 15, the committee report to strike out lines 20 to 25, inclusive, in the following words:

For the acquisition, by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, of 640 acres of land, more or less, and the appurtenances thereunto belonging, situate in Macomb County, State of Michigan, now occupied by the Air Service of the Army as an aviation station and known as Selfridge Field, not to exceed $190,000.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 34 the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH] proposes as an amendment, on line 1, after the word "receipts," to insert the following:

Provided further, That authority is hereby granted the Secretary of War to sell or otherwise dispose of, in accordance with law and regulations, the United States Army transports Sherman, Sheridan, Thomas, Logan, Buford, Kilpatrick, Crook, and Warren: And provided further, That $2,400,000 of the sum derived from such sale may be used for the purpose of reimbursing the United States Shipping Board for necessary improvements and alterations to the 12 transports now being constructed by the United States Shipping Board for the use of the War Department, as permanent transports to replace the aforementioned United States Army transports of which the sale is authorized herein.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I did not hear clearly the reading of the amendment. Has the Senator a provision in it under which these boats might be used in the coastwise trade?

Mr. WADSWORTH. It is the same amendment that I offered on Saturday, which the Senator from Washington wanted a chance to examine, and it went over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely made the suggestion. I have no objection to the amendment, but I thought it would help in the sale of these ships if we had a provision similar to that.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Let it go to conference, and if there is any trouble about it we can amend it in conference.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The conferees might not be able to put in such a provision. I suggest the following amendment to the amendment:

And provided further, That if sold to citizens of the United States such vessels may engage in the coastwise trade so long as they remain wholly the property of citizens of the United States.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I have no objection to that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that probably would assist in getting a better price for the vessels.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add at the end of the proposed amendment the following proviso:

And provided further, That if sold to citizens of the United States such vessels may engage in the coastwise trade so long as they remain wholly the property of citizens of the United States.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the next amendment passed over.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It will be found on page 44. The committee report to strike out the proviso beginning after the numerals "$50,000," in line 13, in the following words:

Provided, That there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $88,880 for the acquisition of land as an addition to the Leon Springs Military Reservation in Texas, heretofore authorized, and now in use as a target range for Camp Travis, Tex.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I trust this committee amendment, striking out the provision inserted by the House, will be disagreed to. It would be the worst sort of business judgment not to purchase the land in question. It is not even the case of land obtained through the exercise of options that were taken during the war. It is the case of land authorized by the Army appropriation bill of June 30, 1919. While purchase was in process the act of July 11, 1919, containing restrictions on the purchase of real estate, was passed, and further procedure was suspended. The act of July 11, 1919, was not aimed at purchases like this. It was aimed at purchases on options taken during the war in connection with war emergencies, but its terms were held by the comptroller to embrace land purchases of all descriptions which had not been completed on July 11, 1919.

Let me quote what the War Department says about this particular property:

There has already been constructed on the land in question, at a cost of $70,000, a target range which has been in use by the troops stationed in the vicinity of Fort Sam Houston, Tex. A target range in this vicinity is a vital necessity for the proper training of the troops. The land on which this target range is already erected is held on options which expire on June 30, 1920, and at prices ranging from one-half to one-third the prices now asked for ground in this vicinity. The target range already built on this land could not be rebuilt at the present time for less than $120,000. In addition, if the land is returned to its owners it will be necessary to restore it to its original condition or pay damage claims. It is estimated that this will be equal to or in excess of the present option prices to purchase.

In view of the fact that the failure to buy will involve the Government in a financial loss, it would seem the part of good business to make the purchase now. I hope that the committee amendment will be disagreed to. The construction of a new target range will be a far more expensive proposition than the purchase of this land and the retention of the present range.

Mr. WADSWORTH. This item falls in the same category as the one discussed by the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The Senator from New York knows that I did not further insist on this target range item when the committee announced its policy of not incorporating purchases of this kind in the bill, but since the Senate has taken the position it has with regard to land in Michigan, I believe it but proper that this purchase should be also authorized.

Mr. WADSWORTH. There are only a few Senators here and I suppose what I have to say will not have much weight with the Senate. The Senator from Texas has expressed it exactly right. If you do it for one, you had better do it for everyone else. The Senate has seen fit to put Selfridge Field back in the bill, and therefore Boston must go back in the bill; and when we get to other things I think we might as well go back and include the item of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] at Leavenworth, and have all of the Senators who stay here and attend to business get what they want, and not the other Senators who have paid no attention to the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Before we take a vote on this question, I think we had better have more Senators here than we have now.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am not in opposition to Leon Springs, I am not in opposition to Boston, and I am not in opposition to the Selfridge item. The committee made a sincere effort to reestablish consistency in the management of the finances of the Government, and we find, after carefully explaining it to the Senate, that all the Senators who have any items in the bill affecting their own States have left the Chamber, and the Senators who have no items affecting their own States stay in the Chamber and change the policy of the committee.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee whether there will be an opportunity for another vote on the amendment which was voted upon a few moments ago? Will an opportunity be given later on to reconsider that matter?

Mr. WADSWORTH. I am only speaking for myself, of course.

Mr. KING. If not, I shall move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the committee was rejected. I came into the Chamber after having been called out, and I voted——

Mr. WADSWORTH. My opposition is not to these items as such, on their merits especially. It is just as I said a moment ago, I am opposed to their being placed on this bill. The Committee on Military Affairs reached an agreement with the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations that we would not do it. That is the truth of it. It may be that members of the Committee on Military Affairs, when they learn that one exception has been made, will decide that we might as well make exceptions of them all, but I am not going to change; I am going to stand by the agreement that the committee made when it was in solemn session in the room of the Committee on Military Affairs. I do not know whether it will be incumbent upon me to reserve a separate vote on all these little items in the Senate. I do not know that much is to be gained by that.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will permit me, I reserve the right for a separate vote on that last item.

Mr. WADSWORTH. That is, of course, the right of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In order that the Senate may have a full opportunity to again pass on the policy of the committee, and in view of the fact that the question is to be raised again in the Senate when the bill is reported from Committee of the Whole to the Senate, I shall not move this disagreement at present, but will await further action of the Senate on the other proposition.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The Senator will have to reserve something.

Mr. SMOOT. If the Senator wants a separate vote he will have to have the matter voted on in Committee of the Whole, because if the amendment of the committee is agreed to when it comes into the Senate the Senator will have it reserved for a separate vote.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Then I ask the Senate to take at least tentative action on my proposition now.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to ask the Senator from New York, inasmuch as it is after 5 o'clock now, if it would not be best to take a recess at this time and leave the amendment pending, and then we shall have a quorum to vote upon it in the morning.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I understood the Senator to say it would be necessary to take a vote on it before we went into the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. It will be pending, and the vote will come up to-morrow morning.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Sharkey, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed the following acts:

On May 21, 1920:

S. 2448. An act for the relief of certain officers of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

On May 22, 1920:

S. 1699. An act for the retirement of employees in the classified civil service, and for other purposes.

MANDATE OVER ARMENIA (H. DOC. NO. 791).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS:

On the fourteenth of May an official communication was received at the Executive Office from the Secretary of the Senate of the United States conveying the following preambles and resolutions:

"Whereas the testimony adduced at the hearings conducted by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have clearly established the truth of the reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered; and

"Whereas the people of the United States are deeply impressed by the deplorable conditions of insecurity, starvation, and misery now prevalent in Armenia; and

"Whereas the independence of the Republic of Armenia has been duly recognized by the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference and by the Government of the United States of America: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the sincere congratulations of the Senate of the United States are hereby extended to the people of Armenia on the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Armenia, without prejudice respecting the territorial boundaries involved; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States hereby expresses the hope that stable government, proper protection of individual liberties and rights, and the full realization of nationalistic aspirations may soon be attained by the Armenian people; and be it further

"Resolved, That in order to afford necessary protection for the lives and property of citizens of the United States at the port of Batum and along the line of the railroad leading to Baku, the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause a United States warship and a force of marines to be dispatched to such port with instructions to such marines to disembark and to protect American lives and property."

I received and read this document with great interest and with genuine gratification, not only because it embodied my own convictions and feelings with regard to Armenia and its people, but also, and more particularly, because it seemed to me the voice of the American people expressing their genuine convictions and deep Christian sympathies, and intimating the line of duty which seemed to them to lie clearly before us.

I cannot but regard it as providential, and not as a mere casual coincidence that almost at the same time I received information that the conference of statesmen now sitting at San Remo for the purpose of working out the details of peace with the Central Powers which it was not feasible to work out in the conference at Paris, had formally resolved to address a definite appeal to this Government to accept a mandate for Armenia. They were at pains to add that they did this, "not from the smallest desire to evade any obligations which they might be expected to undertake, but because the responsibilities which they are already obliged to bear in connection with the disposition of the former Ottoman Empire will strain their capacities to the uttermost, and because they believe that the appearance on the scene of a power emancipated from the prepossessions of the Old World will inspire a wider confidence and afford a firmer guarantee for stability in the future than would the selection of any European power."

Early in the conferences at Paris it was agreed that to those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world there should be applied the principle that the well being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be afforded.

It was recognized that certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized, subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone.

It is in pursuance of this principle and with a desire of affording Armenia such advice and assistance that the statesmen conferring at San Remo have formally requested this Government to assume the duties of mandatory in Armenia. I may add, for the information of the Congress, that at the same sitting it was resolved to request the President of the United States to undertake to arbitrate the difficult question of the boundary between Turkey and Armenia in the Vilayets of Erzerum, Trebizond, Van, and Bitlis, and it was agreed to accept his decision thereupon, as well as any stipulation he may prescribe as to access to the sea for the independent State of Armenia. In pursuance of this action, it was resolved to embody in the treaty with Turkey, now under final consideration, a provision that "Turkey and Armenia and the other high contracting parties agree to refer to the arbitration of the President of the United States of America the question of the boundary between Turkey and Armenia in the Vilayets of Erzerum, Trebizond, Van and Bitlis, and to accept his decision thereupon as well as any stipulation he may prescribe as to access to the sea for the independent State of Armenia"; pending that decision the boundaries of Turkey and Armenia to remain as at present. I have thought it my duty to accept this difficult and delicate task.

In response to the invitation of the council at San Remo, I urgently advise and request that the Congress grant the Executive power to accept for the United States a mandate over Armenia. I make this suggestion in the earnest belief that it will be the wish of the people of the United States that this should be done. The sympathy with Armenia has proceeded from no single portion of our people, but has come with extraordinary spontaneity and sincerity from the whole of the great body of Christian men and women in this country by whose free-will offerings Armenia has practically been saved at the most critical juncture of its existence. At their hearts this great and generous people have made the cause of Armenia their own. It is to this people and to their Government that the hopes and earnest expectations of the struggling people of Armenia turn as they now emerge from a period of indescribable suffering and peril, and I hope that the Congress will think it wise to meet this hope and expectation with the utmost liberality. I know from unmistakable evidences given by responsible representatives of many peoples struggling towards independence and peaceful life again that the Government of the United States is looked to with extraordinary trust and confidence, and I believe that it would do nothing less than arrest the hopeful processes of civilization if we were to refuse the request to become the helpful friends and advisers of such of these people as we may be authoritatively and formally requested to guide and assist.

I am conscious that I am urging upon the Congress a very critical choice, but I make the suggestion in the confidence that I am speaking in the spirit and in accordance with the wishes of the greatest of the Christian peoples. The sympathy for Armenia among our people has sprung from untainted consciences, pure Christian faith, and an earnest desire to see Christian people everywhere succored in their time of suffering, and lifted from their abject subjection and distress and enabled to stand upon their feet and take their place among the free nations of the world. Our recognition of the independence of Armenia will mean genuine liberty and assured happiness for her people, if we fearlessly undertake the duties of guidance and assistance involved in the functions of a mandatory. It is, therefore, with the most earnest hopefulness and with the feeling that I am giving advice from which the Congress will not willingly turn away that I urge the acceptance of the invitation now formally and solemnly extended to us by the council at San Remo, into whose hands has passed the difficult task of composing the many complexities and difficulties of government in the one-time Ottoman Empire and the maintenance of order and tolerable conditions of life in those portions of that Empire which it is no longer possible in the interest of civilization to leave under the government of the Turkish authorities themselves.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, May 24, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer.

O Thou God and Father of us all, infinite in wisdom, power, and goodness, who hast placed within our reach a portion of these qualities; for we realize that there is something finer in every man than anything he says or does.

When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

For now we see through a glass, darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

It is writ:

Be ye therefore perfect, even as your Father which is in heaven is perfect.

Help us to develop out of the strenuous duties of life those qualities which we know are eternal. In the precious example of Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Saturday, May 22, 1920, was read and approved.

DEATH OF FORMER REPRESENTATIVE JOSEPH J. GILL, OF OHIO.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for two minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MURPHY. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, my purpose in asking to address the House this morning is to inform you of the death of Hon. Joseph J. Gill, of Steubenville, Ohio, who represented the sixteenth congressional district of Ohio in the Fifty-sixth, Fifty-seventh, and Fifty-eighth Congresses of the United States. In the passing of Mr. Gill our district loses one of its outstanding men—a man whose liberality made possible the building of the first modern hospital in the city of Steubenville. Mr. Gill was a large employer of labor, and in more than 40 years in the factories which he controlled there never was a strike or any serious labor disturbance, because he believed in collective bargaining and always gave a square deal to those whom he employed.

As the present Member from the eighteenth district, which district is largely made up of the old sixteenth, I feel specially grieved at the passing of this splendid citizen, for it was by him that I was given my first employment and from him I received my first dollar, and I am proud to say that from my boyhood until the present time I have had the helpful influence of this splendid man, and in his passing all eastern Ohio is conscious of a real loss, and may the God that tempers the wind to the shorn lamb bring peace and comfort to the friends and relatives of one of nature's noblemen, Hon. Joseph J. Gill.

CONSOLIDATION OF FOREST LANDS, SIERRA NATIONAL FOREST.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2789) for the consolidation of forest lands in the Sierra National Forest of California, and for other purposes, with House amendments, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill 2789, with House amendments, insist on the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman spoken to the ranking minority member who will be on the conference concerning sending this bill to conference at this time?

Mr. SINNOTT. The minority member will be on the conference.

Mr. GARNER. I know there will be a minority Member on the conference committee, but has the gentleman from Oregon discussed with the ranking minority Member the question of agreeing to the conference asked for by the Senate on this bill?

Mr. SINNOTT. I have not spoken to him about it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I serve notice upon the majority side at this time that while I am in the House, if I happen to be present when such requests are made, I shall insist upon the request being accompanied with the statement that the majority has consulted with the minority Members. Therefore I object.

Mr. SINNOTT. Mr. Speaker, then I move to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. 2789) for the consolidation of forest lands in the Sierra National Forest of California, and for other purposes, with House amendments thereto, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, all I ask is the courtesy of considering the minority.

Mr. SINNOTT. The gentleman who will be upon the conference committee on the minority side agreed to these amendments in the committee.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, with the indulgence of the House just for a statement, I desire to repeat what I have said two or three times on the floor of the House, that I do think the majority Members having control of bills from the respective committees owe the courtesy to the minority to at least consult with them when they ask for unanimous consent. I am going to withdraw my objection and agree that this bill shall be sent to conference, but I give notice to the majority side now that it seems to me a reasonable courtesy and a reasonable consideration that the minority Members shall be consulted when the majority Members ask unanimous consent to send a bill to conference.

Mr. SINNOTT. I will state to the gentleman that I know the attitude of the ranking minority Member upon these amendments.

Mr. GARD. What are the amendments?

Mr. SINNOTT. They are House amendments to a Senate bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oregon asks unanimous consent to take this bill from the Speaker's table, insist upon the House amendments, and agree to the conference asked. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Chair appointed the following conferees: Mr. SINNOTT, Mr. SMITH of Idaho, and Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL—CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I call up the conference report upon the bill H. R. 12272, making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa calls up the conference report, which the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 116, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 249: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 249, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed by the Senate amendment insert: "Provided, That the amendments relating to cotton provided for in section 6 of the act known as the wheat guaranty act approved March 4, 1919, are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation"; and the Senate agree to the same.

On the amendment of the Senate numbered 93 the committee of conference has been unable to agree.

STATEMENT.

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12272) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, submit the following statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conference committee and submitted in the accompanying conference report as to each of the amendments of the Senate, namely:

Amendment No. 93 strikes out an appropriation of $239,416 for the purchase and distribution of valuable seeds. The conferees have been unable to agree as to this amendment.

Amendment No. 116 decreases the appropriation for ascertaining and appraising timber on the national forests from $105,000 to $80,000 and strikes out the following proviso:

"Provided, That $25,000 may be used by the Secretary of Agriculture for the purpose of ascertaining the appraised value of pasturage upon the national forests, which appraised value, when determined, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, be made the basis of the charge for grazing permits upon such forests."

The House recedes.

Amendment No. 249 adds to the paragraph appropriating for the enforcement of the United States cotton futures act the following language:

"Provided, That the amendments relating to cotton provided for in section 6 of the act known as the wheat guaranty act, approved March 4, 1919, are hereby recognized and declared to be permanent legislation. That hereafter each lot of cotton classified as tenderable in whole or in part on a section 5 contract of said act as amended shall give to the buyer the right to demand that one half of the contract shall be delivered in the official cotton-standard grades of the United States from the grades of middling fair, strict good middling, good middling, strict middling, and middling, and that the seller shall have the option of delivering the other half of said contract from any of the official cotton-standard grades as established in said act."

The House recedes and agrees with an amendment accepting the proviso declaring the amendment relating to cotton provided for in the wheat guaranty act to be permanent legislation and eliminating the remainder of the amendment.

G. N. HAUGEN,
J. C. MCLAUGHLIN,
GORDON LEE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa if it is his purpose to ask for any debate upon this report.

Mr. HAUGEN. I have no intention of asking for it, but if any time is desired, it can be granted. My understanding is that no time is desired with respect to the report proper.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. As I understand this, the Senate receded from what is known as the "Comer amendment"?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. That goes out of the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. The House recedes with an amendment making the cotton-futures act permanent law. All of the other features are stricken from the bill.

Mr. CANDLER. The "Comer amendment" goes out of the bill?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. And the bill makes the cotton-standards law permanent law?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. On the grading proposition, I understand that the House recedes?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes.

Mr. CANDLER. Then the only question of difference now is Senate amendment No. 93, which is in reference to the distribution of seed?

Mr. HAUGEN. That is correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BLANTON. There is only one amendment in disagreement between the House conferees and the Senate conferees. At this time would not a motion to recede and concur in that Senate amendment in disagreement be in order?

The SPEAKER. The first thing in order would be to dispose of the report and then the other matter will come up.

Mr. HAUGEN. If there is no time desired, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

The question was taken, and the conference report was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to offer a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa is recognized.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment No. 93 and ask for a further conference.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion,

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will be recognized in due time. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendment and ask for a conference.

Mr. CANDLER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CANDLER. Would it be in order to move that the conferees on the part of the House be instructed to adhere to the House provision in the House bill as it passed the House?

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman from Texas wishes first to make a preferential motion.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the motion that the House recede from its position and concur in Senate amendment No. 93.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas moves that the House recede and concur in Senate amendment No. 93.

Mr. HAUGEN. Is there any request for time? If anybody desires time I would be glad to yield briefly.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Could amendment No. 93 be read for information?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is the vegetable-seed amendment, with which we are all familiar, and carries an appropriation of $239,000 for the purpose of purchasing vegetable seed.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. What was the Senate amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. The Senate amendment struck it out.

Mr. LAYTON. Mr. Speaker, what is this amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is the vegetable-seed amendment, and carries an appropriation of $239,000. The Senate struck it out.

Mr. LAYTON. And what is the gentleman's proposition?

Mr. HAUGEN. My motion is to insist upon the House's disagreement to the Senate amendment.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. If this Senate amendment striking out this provision is agreed to, will there be a provision by which the Agricultural Department may distribute seed to those who desire them?

Mr. HAUGEN. No; there will be no appropriation made for vegetable seed. It carries a small appropriation for the rare seed.

Mr. BLANTON. If the chairman will yield, it leaves in the bill all the appropriation for field seed and rare seed——

Mr. HAUGEN. I was stating that.

Mr. BLANTON. Which is quite a large item.

Mr. LANGLEY. But not for vegetable seed?

Mr. HAUGEN. No.

Mr. MILLER. Will the gentleman yield for a question? There is so much confusion we can not hear the gentleman and understand what is taking place. What about garden seed?

Mr. HAUGEN. If my motion is agreed to, we will go to conference and the matter will be in conference. If the motion of the gentleman from Texas carries, why that would dispose of the seed question and strike out the seed entirely.

Mr. CANDLER. What should be done is to vote down the motion of the gentleman from Texas and vote up the motion of the gentleman from Iowa. Those who favor the seed distribution will vote against the pending motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and when his motion is defeated, as it will be, then vote for the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] and carry it, and the result will be to continue the seed. Is that not correct?

Mr. HAUGEN. Yes; if you want the seed.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas to recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. RUBEY. Mr. Speaker, just a moment, if the gentleman will yield.

Mr. HAUGEN. I will.

Mr. RUBEY. As I understand the situation, it is this: The Agricultural bill has been agreed to in every particular except the pending amendment?

Mr. HAUGEN. Exactly.

Mr. RUBEY. The only thing now before the House is the question of garden seed, and the gentleman from Iowa has moved that the House adhere to its disagreement to the Senate amendment——

Mr. HAUGEN. And ask for a conference.

Mr. RUBEY. And ask for a further conference. The gentleman from Texas has moved as a preferential motion that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment and the only question is the seed question, and those who are in favor of seed will vote against the motion of the gentleman from Texas, and those who are against seed will vote the other way?

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. RUBEY. Just a moment. I want to get this thing clear. If you are for free seed distribution, and I believe you are, you vote against the motion of the gentleman from Texas and the Senate will recede, and the thing will be ended.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes or 10 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL]. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. JUUL. Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the gentlemen on this floor can afford to be fair with me in the matter of time. I never object to anybody speaking. [Applause.] I do not often ask for your indulgence.

Mr. Speaker, sometimes I have felt sorry for the brain children—both bills and resolutions—that are resting, forgotten and chloroformed, in the various committees, but I do not feel so sorry now.

Not long ago this House passed the Agricultural appropriation bill and we all bid it Godspeed on its way to the upper legislative branch of the Government at the other end of this building. It looked like a wonderful legislative child, its future seemed bright and cheerful, sponsored, as it was, by 21 gentlemen of the Committee on Agriculture. There were gentlemen on that committee from North and South, from East and West, even from far off Hawaii came its sponsors. After two months of daily committee work this legislative child was considered property gotten up to stand the necessary ordeal of passage or ratification in the other end of the building, but what has happened?

The other day it came back to us, not even its closest relatives, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MCLAUGHLIN], nor the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LEE], would be able to recognize their mutilated offspring. The golden curly hair of the child had been torn off, its snappy blue eyes had been blackened, it had been kicked, or amended, as the legislative term is, in 282 places. I have often seen bills amended, but this bill as it reaches us now from conference is possibly the most amended document for its size ever before a legislative body.

It is particularly remarkable for the amount of receding that was done on the part of the conferees. When I had read up to the point where the Senate conferees receded 78 times and the House conferees receded 136 times, I thought I had reached the limit of receding and grew dizzy and my sight was blurred. Then I tried to sum up to see how much the Senate had saved to the taxpayers of the country by this tremendous amount of mutilation, and I found that instead of all these Senate amendments being for the purpose of saving vast sums for the taxpayers the amendments had added approximately two and one-half million dollars to the burdens of the country.

This child of the House comes back to the House unrecognizable, patched in 282 places, arnica and sticking plaster all over it. Not a vestige of its bright cheerful countenance, as it looked when it left the House, is to be visualized. All bandages swathed and crippled this dear love child of ours, H. R. 12272, has come back to us, and the worst of it is that hitting the bill in 282 spots will cost the taxpayers two and one-half million dollars, and one is constrained to ask whether it would not be wise for the House to cease originating appropriation bills until it finds out in the other end of the building what is wanted. One would imagine that 282 straight blows on the frail body of a new bill are too many.

Now, do you gentlemen want to know what has happened to this bill?

Mr. LANGLEY. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JUUL. I will be very glad to yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. LANGLEY. I am unable to determine so far which side of the question the gentleman is on, whether he is in favor of putting another piece of plaster on this child of the House or——

Mr. JUUL. Will the gentleman state what piece of plaster he wants on?

Mr. LANGLEY. I do not want any on; I want the garden seed to remain in the bill, and——

Mr. JUUL. I want the garden seed to remain in the bill. I want to tell my friend from Kentucky that just day before yesterday I received a letter, which is simply a sample letter of a number of letters I have received from school principals through whom I distribute my seed, and they seem to think it is the best money the Government of the United States ever spends. [Applause.]

Mr. LANGLEY. I am very glad to hear that.

Mr. JUUL. One principal, Miss Agnes I. Kerns, speaking for the Schley School, in Chicago, wrote me as late as May 19, 1920:

> I wish to thank you for the consignment of seeds sent to the Schley School this spring. We gave the seeds to the children who brought notes from their parents asking for seeds. The children are happy at the prospect of having gardens.

Now, do you want to know what has happened to this bill? The bill as it left the House was the result of careful, conscientious work by a congressional committee. After spending months on hearings and deliberations it comes back as a vehicle for departmental demands. It departed from this Hall as a piece of carefully constructed congressional legislation and returns what to me looks like a piece of departmental—or, rather, bureaucratic—interference with legislative functions.

I stated in the beginning of my talk on this subject that I sometimes feel sorry for the bills and resolutions that are resting, forgotten and chloroformed, in the various committees, and I know how it feels to have the chloroforming process applied.

In the early days of the war I introduced a resolution providing:

That neutral ships having had their cargoes examined in American harbors should not again be examined by the nations at war with nations with whom we were at war.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. JUUL. Mr. Speaker, I would like one minute more.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HAUGEN] is in charge of the time.

Mr. JUUL. May I have one minute?

Mr. HAUGEN. I yield one minute more to the gentleman.

Mr. JUUL. This resolution, if passed, would have released hundreds of thousands of tons of shipping. It was chloroformed. Yet I would rather see a bill smothered and forgotten than have it come back to me so unlike its former beautiful self, as this Agricultural appropriation bill has returned to the House. [Applause.]

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, it seems fair that the other side should have a minute or so, and I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, it is true, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. JUUL], that our friends at the other end of the Capitol have added to this bill $2,500,000, and our conferees have agreed almost in every instance to those additions; but when it comes down to the only case within the knowledge of my legislative history where the Senate of the United States has knocked out an appropriation made by the House, when it comes down to where the Senate has seen fit to strike out of this bill $239,000, why, we can not agree with it. I know how hard it is for a Congressman to give up his garden seed. I know just exactly how hard it is. I know just exactly what it means to you. I know just exactly how you love to send your name out to 20,000 constituents on these packages of free garden seed. That is what you are called to stand and deliver on right now, and you are not willing to do it. There are about 20 per cent of us here going to vote for this motion. The balance of you are going to keep on holding to the free garden seed. How are you going to account to your people when you get home? What are you going to say to them? The Secretary of Agriculture has recommended that we save this $239,000. I am going to vote to cut this $239,000 out of this bill and agree to Senate amendment No. 93.

Mr. BLAND of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Washington, and then I intend to move the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I hope the House will embrace this opportunity to end this petty congressional seed distribution. Neither the time of the House nor of the Members should be used in this way. The question comes up every year. Most of those who receive the seeds in the districts are willing to forego the gift, particularly if the House will busy itself with other matters. Many misunderstand the seed distribution. I have a letter from a constituent which I wish to read:

DEAR SIR:

1. Will you please send me any set law books you have and the following:

2. 1 package of onion seed, 1 package of cabbage seed, 1 package of squash seed, 1 package of cucumbers, 7 peach trees, 6 English walnut trees, 2 snowball trees, 1 package of carrot seed, 1 package of lettuce seed, 1 package of summer squash, 5 grape cuttings, 3 sweet apple trees, 2 butternut trees, 95 strawberry plants, 3 chestnut trees, 4 lilac bushes, 8 rose cuttings.

If you have got any carpenter books and tools, send them, and any typewriter please send it, and the farm account book from the Department Agriculture, and any gasoline tractor.

Yours, truly, ——— ———.

I omit the name.

Now, my friends, in all earnestness, is it not about time to cut out a practice that leads to such misunderstandings?

Mr. LANGLEY. Has the gentleman endeavored to comply with the request? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Not yet.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], that the House recede and concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House proceeded to divide.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are demanded.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. BLANTON. I will wait until after the vote is had.

The division was completed, and there were—ayes 47, noes 60.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the House having divided, I make the point of no quorum.

The SPEAKER. Evidently no quorum is present. The Doorkeeper will close the doors, the Sergeant at Arms will notify the absentees. Those in favor of the motion of the gentleman from Texas will, as their names are called, answer "yea," and those opposed will answer "nay," and the Clerk will call the roll.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 203, not voting 116, as follows:

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendment and agree to the conference asked for by the Senate. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker announced as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. HAUGEN, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, and Mr. LEE of Georgia.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on Senate amendment No. 92.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on Senate amendment No. 92 to the Agricultural bill. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE VAN DYKE, OF MINNESOTA.

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to resolution heretofore adopted, the House of Representatives, on Sunday, May 16, 1920, convened for the purpose of having delivered eulogies upon the life, character, and conduct of our recently deceased beloved colleague, CARL CHESTER VAN DYKE, of St. Paul, Minn. On that occasion a number of Members who desired to pay tribute to Mr. VAN DYKE were unavoidably absent. Recently I have received from some of them addresses which they desire to have incorporated in the RECORD concerning Mr. VAN DYKE.

I therefore, Mr. Speaker, ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting an address of Hon. FRANKLIN F. ELLSWORTH, of Minnesota, and of Hon. EVERETT SANDERS, of Indiana.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Minnesota asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD for the purpose indicated. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Did not the RECORD contain at the time of the exercises an order that the Members had the right to extend their remarks on that subject?

Mr. DAVIS of Minnesota. It did; but I, having charge of the publication of the book, have been asked to make this request and have these addresses inserted in the RECORD. I desire to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has that right.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS—ROOSEVELT MEMORIAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, this is District day; but before making the motion that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union to consider legislation reported by the District Committee, I wish to submit a unanimous-consent request. The District Committee of the House reported a bill to incorporate the Roosevelt Memorial Association. The Senate has reported and passed a bill of similar nature, although not identical. A bill identical with the one that the Senate passed was introduced in the House by the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS]. The only difference between the Senate bill and the bill reported by the House committee is that the Senate bill contains some names among the incorporators not in the House bill and has eliminated about half a dozen of the names that were in the House bill. Those who are especially interested and who have been especially active in this proposed association desire to have the bill passed as it passed the Senate. I therefore ask, before going into committee, that when the committee takes up that legislation the Senate bill may be substituted in place of the House bill on the calendar.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that when the House goes into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose referred to, it may consider the Senate bill instead of the House bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. But, Mr. Speaker, this is not a Union Calendar bill. It is a House Calendar bill. Both would be considered in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union. As I understand the situation, the Senate bill is on the Speaker's table. I do not know what the Speaker or other Members would think, but I think it is in order to take it off the Speaker's table and take it up for consideration now, since the bill is substantially the same as the bill on the House Calendar. The change of a few names in a long list of names does not affect its being substantially similar.

The SPEAKER. Had the House committee reported before the Senate bill came over?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Michigan can call it up if he wishes; but the Chair is informed that the Senate bill has been referred to the committee. That would prevent its being considered. But the gentleman could ask unanimous consent to discharge the committee and consider the Senate bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. He had better get the bill.

The SPEAKER. That does not need to be done in the House. The Chair thinks that either bill could be considered.

Mr. MAPES. I wanted to get the unanimous consent of the House to consider the Senate bill in committee when the subject is brought up. When the House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills reported by the District Committee it considers not only bills on the Union Calendar but bills on the House Calendar also.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Oh, no.

The SPEAKER. The Chair was not aware of any such rule. Can the gentleman cite the Chair to any rule which either requires or authorizes that?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That has not been the practice, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is recognized.

Mr. MAPES. I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of bills on the calendar reported by the District Committee.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a request for a change of reference to which there is no objection?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

CERTAIN PROPERTY OF THE UNITED STATES IN SAN FRANCISCO.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, the bill (S. 3995) providing for the relinquishment of certain described property by the United States to the city and county of San Francisco, State of California, was erroneously referred to the Committee on the Public Lands. The chairman of that committee has requested me to ask that the reference be changed to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds. I have consulted him, and also the minority leader.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, there is no use of the gentleman from Kentucky getting down in front and talking quietly to make his request. We want to hear what he says.

Mr. WALSH. I make the point of order that that request is not in order at this time.

Mr. LANGLEY. There is no objection at all to it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We could not hear what the gentleman's request was.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman submits a request for unanimouse consent for a change of reference.

Mr. WALSH. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA BUSINESS.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Under the form of the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], can bills on the House Calendar be considered in Committee of the Whole?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of no rule that either requires or allows that.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The motion in the form in which it was made was not in order. The proper motion is that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of business reported from the District Committee in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Michigan, if he has any authorities on the subject.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. It will take me some time to refer to the rule, but I am certain that that is the rule.

I will change the form of my motion, so as to save time.

I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 8067, to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia, to define the duties of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and other business in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of House bill 8067 and other business in order.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LANGLEY. What was the ruling of the Chair upon my request for a change of reference?

The SPEAKER. Objection was made to the gentleman's request.

Mr. LANGLEY. I did not so understand it, but if so it is all right.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL] occupied the chair when this bill was last under consideration, but in his temporary absence the Chair will ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to take the chair.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 8067) to establish standard weights and measures for the District of Columbia, to define the duties of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets of the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, with Mr. WALSH in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, when this bill was up for consideration, before section 15 had been read and at the time the committee rose, there were two amendments pending to that section, one to strike out the entire section and one to strike out paragraph (a) of the section. The motion to strike out paragraph (a) was made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and the motion to strike out the whole section was made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN].

My understanding of the reason for the motion to strike out paragraph (a) was that this paragraph is already a national law. That is true; but the District authorities tell me that in order to make it so the corporation counsel and his office can have charge of the prosecutions under it, and in order to make it possible for the police court of the District of Columbia to have jurisdiction of the cases which arise under it we must reincorporate this provision in this bill; otherwise complaints would have to be made through the office of the United States district attorney and go into the United States district court.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GARD. Do I understand the gentleman's statement to be that it is reported to him that if we reenact this bill in this form it operates practically as a city ordinance would operate in any other city?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; practically.

Mr. GARD. Thereby taking the cases into the municipal court and not compelling them to be brought in the United States district court.

Mr. MAPES. That is the fact. By reenacting this paragraph in this bill, which applies only to the District of Columbia, the cases arising under it can be brought in the police court; otherwise they have to go to the United States district court.

Mr. BEE. May I ask the gentleman from Michigan, is there now a law similar in import to this, or is this a brand-new proposition for the District of Columbia?

Mr. MAPES. There is a national law which is in substance the same as paragraph (a) of this section.

Mr. BEE. I am speaking of the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAPES. But it does not apply specifically to the District of Columbia.

Mr. BEE. What I was seeking to ascertain was, is there now in the District of Columbia such a law as would govern and cover the matters involved in this bill, the effect of which would be merely an amendment under this bill, or is it an original and brand-new proposition?

Mr. MAPES. This is new as far as the District of Columbia is concerned.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the reasons given by the gentleman from Michigan and by the District Commissioners for putting these provisions in the bill. I think myself there ought to be an opportunity for the police officers of the District to bring to trial cases before the police court for violations of the law. But allow me to suggest to the gentleman from Michigan, although I take it that this bill was prepared by the District Commissioners, that it would have been much wiser and so much easier to have put a provision in the bill authorizing violations of the general law with reference to these matters to be tried as though they were District offenses in the District court, and I am surprised that they did not adopt that method. Here we will have in the end a general law and then a specific law for the District, and they are not the same. The definitions and descriptions are not just the same, and there will be two laws in force in the District of Columbia on the same subject which do not agree. I am sorry that the District Commissioners in preparing this bill were not wise enough to have inserted a provision authorizing offenses under the general law relating to these matters to be tried in the District court as though they were District offenses.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SANFORD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

On May 21, 1920:

H. R. 13555. An act making appropriations for fortifications and other works of defense, for the armament thereof, and for the procurement of heavy ordnance for trial and service, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES FOR THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. WINGO. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. This bill is similar to other bills which we have had from time to time before the House. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has correctly called attention to the fact that if this bill should become a law you would have one law applying to Maryand and Virginia and the adjoining territory, and another law that applies to the District of Columbia.

Now, if there is any place in the Union where that would be vicious in the practical working, it certainly is here in this small territory of the District of Columbia.

Why, gentlemen, the very argument that is made in support of the general law and fixing a Federal standard for all baskets and everything of that kind is that then you would have a uniform standard for the whole country, while now all States do not have the same standard.

What do you propose to do? You propose here at the central market for two or three States—because the District of Columbia has to depend for its fruits and vegetables on nearby States—you propose to penalize a farmer for selling goods in the District of Columbia which would be lawful in a State to sell under Federal statute. You would penalize him if he brings in fruit in a hamper or container to the District of Columbia that is the lawful container under a general statute that controls in Virginia, Maryland, and Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WINGO. Certainly.

Mr. MAPES. Is the gentleman discussing this bill, this section, or a hypothetical case?

Mr. WINGO. I am very sorry that my limited capacity is such that I can not express myself so that the gentleman can comprehend me. I believed that I was discussing this section and the whole bill. I may not be, and I am sorry that I can not express myself in language that the gentleman can comprehend as being directed to the bill and the section under discussion.

Mr. MAPES. If I understood the gentleman correctly, I do not think he is discussing the amendment before the House.

Mr. WINGO. I am discussing section 15.

Mr. MAPES. The motion is to strike out paragraph (a) of the section, which in substance is the same as a national law.

Mr. WINGO. Paragraph (a) is not the general law. You have no such provision in the general law. You have one good provision in section (a). It reads as follows:

Provided, That any barrel of a different form having a capacity of 7,056 cubic inches should be a standard barrel.

That is the only practicable provision I have seen in any of these bills, because there it undertakes to say that you are going to protect the farmer by saying that whatever may be the type of the container, how long or big the staves may be, he is protected, provided that the consumer gets the contents. In other words, he gets full measure. That is practical. If you did not have that, if a farmer had one barrel of apples coming off of a little tree, and he put them in a flour barrel or some other barrel, and brought them into town and said he wanted to sell his barrel of apples, he would be violating the law unless you have this provision in the bill. It violates section (a) if it happens to have 1 inch less or 1 inch more.

But let me get down to page 17, section 15, where you provide:

All kale, spinach, and other similar leaf vegetables shall be sold at retail by net weight.

That is thrown in for good measure in this bill. That is not fixing a standard container. It says that if I go to market, as I do, twice a week to buy turnip greens—because I am fond of hog jowl and turnip greens—I must have them weighed, although I do not want them weighed or buy them by net weight. I want to buy them in the customary way that you buy them on the curb from the old negro woman who brings them in or from the farmer. You tell me that you have to weigh up a mess of turnip greens that a farmer has, and that he must have a pair of scales! How on earth would I tell how many pounds I wanted?

Mr. LAYTON. Oh, the gentleman would soon learn.

Mr. WINGO. That is the trouble. Whenever the Federal Government—whenever Congress—undertakes to say that a man must learn how to measure his appetite and to buy his turnip greens by net weight, contrary to lifelong custom and common sense, then you present what I said once before on a bill of this kind—it is damned foolishness gone to seed.

Mr. LAYTON. I think the gentleman will find that turnip greens are being sold now by weight.

Mr. WINGO. Who ever heard of turnip greens being sold by weight? The gentleman does not know turnip greens from jimson weed.

Mr. LAYTON. Oh, we had jowl and turnip greens before the gentleman's state was settled.

Mr. MAPES. Practically every State in the Union has that requirement.

Mr. WINGO. There is not a single State in the Union that requires you to buy and sell turnip greens by weight. Name one. The gentleman's own State of Michigan does not. The gentleman would not know turnip greens if he were to see them. When you require turnip greens to be sold by weight you offer an inducement for fraud by watering them.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am very anxious to do anything that will help the District of Columbia, even though I must say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that I completely despair when I have to pay 8 cents to ride on a street car here in Washington, and I sometimes wonder whether the people are deserving of any help or not as long as it continues. I am very loath, however, to go to the length this bill contemplates and say to the farmers and other people who trade in the city of Washington that they must have baskets and containers of a certain size. I notice, for instance, on page 15, that a one-peck hamper shall contain 537.6 cubic inches. It may be that some man who has a basket hamper has one that does not contain the exact number of tenths of cubic inches, and that man is made a criminal under the laws of this land.

I differ with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] in that. Unfortunately for me I do not keep house in the city of Washington, and therefore I am not directly affected, but I am rather inclined to favor the old-time system of going to your market and taking your chance, buying from the dealer the apples or the berries or anything else that you have in mind, taking your chance that he has not filled the bottom of the basket with straw and put the strawberries on top. Gentlemen talk about these hampers. The only hamper that I see connected with this bill is in the absolute tendency of Congress to continue to hamper individual efforts, to turn into penal offenses everything on earth that a man has to do. I can not reconcile myself with a bill of this kind, constantly fixing measures and telling the people how they shall buy spinach or cabbage, and how they shall sell it, or how much shall be in an onion crate. The average man who is selling apples or onions does not know any more about a cubic inch than a hog does about side pockets. Yet the Congress of the United States, with great questions pending, in the midst of its deliberations when the people are crying out for relief, is asked to pause and send word to a lot of men and women in the Center Market that if they do not build their baskets and hampers just exactly as Congress says they shall, they shall become criminals. I do not believe there is any demand for a measure of this kind, and I do not believe any good purpose is going to be served by it. For that reason I want to register my very earnest protest against this kind of legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Everyone who has to buy anything in the District of Columbia knows that in one way or another he has to pay too much for it. He has either to pay too high a price or accept short weight or short measure. The farmer has been brought into this argument for the weight that reference to him always carries with it. Those who undertake to deceive themselves into thinking that this is a law made against the farmer are mistaken. If it were made against the farmer who is giving short weight or short measure I would still be for the bill. The farmer brings his produce into the District of Columbia in bulk, and down at the Center Market and all of the other markets, the stall masters subdivide that bulk into containers. The farmer does not make the basket or the container in which it is sold to the public. That is made by the manufacturer of those articles who engages in that business, and the stall masters buy from those manufacturers. When a manufacturer has been told that the container to be used in the District of Columbia must be of certain dimensions, then that basket or container will be made to conform to those dimensions.

If I am correctly advised, the difference between the national law and this one which is proposed as a local law is inconsequential. There can be no conflict between the two in the District of Columbia, for the reason that it is accepted by all that a special law takes precedence over a general one. In addition to that, this special act comes along later than the general one, which is national, and, therefore, would take precedence.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is it not true that every time you pass restrictive measures of this kind you add to the price of the article sold, because you put the additional burden upon the man and he comes back on the consumer at last, who must pay the additional expense?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I do not think so. I do say, however, that every time you fail to pass a bill of this kind you place additional obligations upon the consumer by permitting the dishonest merchants to cheat the consumer. I hope that all amendments to this section will be voted down. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken a very wide range. I directed my remarks to the motion to strike out paragraph (a) of this section, but the discussion has been so general that I desire to say a word in addition to what I said before. I fail to understand the attitude of mind of those who have objections to making a law that only requires a man to deliver what he receives pay for. The purpose of this bill is to provide that dealers in the District of Columbia who sell commodities shall deliver what they are paid for. That is all there is to it. There is not an honest dealer in the District who has any objection to this legislation. This bill is based upon the national law as it applies generally and upon the State laws where there is no Federal law.

It has the indorsement, I would like to say, of the Retail Dealers' Association of the District. I have in my hand here a letter written early in January by the Retail Grocers' Protective Association of the District of Columbia indorsing the bill generally, and calling attention especially to two separate provisions of the bill, and it says:

> Our association, composed of a large number of retail grocers in Washington who believe in fair dealing and upright business methods, wishes to go on record as approving the provisions of the bill in question as a whole, and we wish to emphasize our approval of what appear to be the two most important provisions of the bill.
> 2. The provision relating to the establishment of standard containers for fruits and vegetables—

And that is this section 15:

> While it may not be realized by persons not familiar with the situation it is a fact, nevertheless, that with no standardization of containers for these commodities, the retail merchant who is compelled to buy fruits and vegetables daily to supply his customers, does not have proper assurance that he will receive the quantity for which he pays. Retail merchants often purchase produce of the kind mentioned in what appear to be containers that hold definite and standard quantities only to find after the commodities have been delivered to them that containers that readily deceive the eye of even the experienced buyers have been delivered. When a merchant has thus been deceived, he must either sell at a loss or advance the price to the consumer.

And the argument they advance applies with so much greater force to the people who buy at retail, who buy only in small quantities, and who do not have the same experience as the retail dealers have. It is said that it is the practice of some dealers here in the District of Columbia to buy in containers which provide full measure and dump the products out of those containers and put them into containers which deceive the eye and appear to hold a half bushel or a bushel when they do not, and in that way they get pay for a greater quantity than they buy. Now, I do not believe there is any Member of Congress who if he understood this situation would have a particle of objection to the attempt to pass a law which enables the superintendents of weights, measures, and markets to get at this thing and control it, and that is all this legislation attempts to do.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will.

Mr. BEE. Does not the gentleman from Michigan believe that under the statement of facts just submitted by him, the general charge and indictment of theft under a false pretext would lie and obviate the necessity of this law?

Mr. MAPES. It might if you could make out a case, but why make it necessary to go to that extent. The gentleman as a lawyer knows how difficult it is to establish that a container does not hold a half bushel or a peck, and why not make it impossible to use any but standard containers? It is made impossible in almost every jurisdiction in the United States.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman says that as a lawyer the gentleman from Texas knows how difficult it is to make proof that a man is guilty on a false-pretense indictment. Would he not have to make the same identical proof on the same facts to prove a man guilty under the criminal section of this bill?

Mr. MAPES. No. The inspectors could go and see that the containers which were used were proper containers and had the proper measurements. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas these provisions are in force in almost every jurisdiction of the United States. There is nothing new about this bill. Why do we leave the people of the District of Columbia helpless——

Mr. WINGO. On that point will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAPES. Why is the thing allowed in the District of Columbia and not allowed elsewhere? They are allowed in the District of Columbia to sell potatoes in quarter-peck measures. You can not measure potatoes in a quarter-peck measure. They are allowed in the District of Columbia to use these lug baskets as hampers. They get bent out of shape and are drawn up together, and they get so they do not contain nearly the quantity they are expected to hold, but still they are allowed to use them as containers.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. Now, I do not believe the gentleman from Arkansas wants to countenance any such thing as that.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the gentleman says this is identical with the general statute——

Mr. MAPES. No; I did not say it is identical——

Mr. WINGO. Oh, it is not; all right. Now, what is the necessity for having one law for the market in Washington and another law for the market of the city of Alexandria?

Mr. MAPES. We are not applying it to the market of Alexandria.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry as to the status of any preceding amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed there is an amendment pending to strike out from line 8, page 12, down to line 5, page 13, of paragraph A, section 15, and that there is also an amendment pending to strike out the entire section 15.

Mr. GARD. The entire section?

The CHAIRMAN. The entire section.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move——

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment to see if we can reach an agreement as to time?

Mr. GARD. I will yield.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mean on this paragraph?

Mr. MAPES. On the section.

Mr. GARD. There may be some gentlemen who desire to discuss the matter, and I hope the gentleman will make it 10 minutes.

Mr. MAPES. I will modify my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his request that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in the matter of this section 15, I beg leave to bring the attention of the chairman of the committee to it so we may all understand just what this section 15 is. It seems to me that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, with reference to the general law being applied in the District of Columbia, is probably a correct statement, and yet I concede possibly there may be cases where the general law, in so far as special jurisdiction in the District of Columbia is concerned, should be supplemented by a particular statute; not adopt that method. Here we will have in the end a general law and then a specific law for the District, and they are not the same. The definitions and descriptions are not just the same, and there will be two laws in force in the District of Columbia on the same subject which do not agree. I am sorry that the District Commissioners in preparing this bill were not wise enough to have inserted a provision authorizing offenses under the general law relating to these matters to be tried in the District court as though they were District offenses.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. SANFORD having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message in writing was received from the President, by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that the President had approved and signed bill of the following title:

I may not be, and I am sorry that I can not express myself in language that the gentleman can comprehend as being directed to the bill and the section under discussion.

Mr. WINGO. I am discussing section 15.

All kale, spinach, and other similar leaf vegetables shall be sold at retail by net weight.

That is thrown in for good measure in this bill. That is not fixing a standard container. It says that if I go to market, as I do, twice a week to buy turnip greens—because I am fond of hog jowl and turnip greens—I must have them weighed, although I do not want them weighed or buy them by net weight. I want to buy them in the customary way that you buy them on the curb from the old negro woman who brings them in or from the farmer. You tell me that you have to weigh up a mess of turnip greens that a farmer has, and that he must have a pair of scales! How on earth would I tell how many pounds I wanted?

Mr. LAYTON. Oh, the gentleman would soon learn.

Mr. WINGO. That is the trouble. Whenever the Federal Government—whenever Congress—undertakes to say that a man must learn how to measure his appetite and to buy his turnip greens by net weight, contrary to lifelong custom and common sense, then you present what I said once before on a bill of this kind—it is damned foolishness gone to seed.

Mr. LAYTON. I think the gentleman will find that turnip greens are being sold now by weight.

Mr. WINGO. Who ever heard of turnip greens being sold by weight? The gentleman does not know turnip greens from jimson weed.

Mr. LAYTON. Oh, we had jowl and turnip greens before the gentleman's state was settled.

Mr. MAPES. Practically every State in the Union has that requirement.

Mr. WINGO. There is not a single State in the Union that requires you to buy and sell turnip greens by weight. Name one. The gentleman's own State of Michigan does not. The gentleman would not know turnip greens if he were to see them. When you require turnip greens to be sold by weight you offer an inducement for fraud by watering them.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am very anxious to do anything that will help the District of Columbia, even though I must say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] that I completely despair when I have to pay 8 cents to ride on a street car here in Washington, and I sometimes wonder whether the people are deserving of any help or not as long as it continues. I am very loath, however, to go to the length this bill contemplates and say to the farmers and other people who trade in the city of Washington that they must have baskets and containers of a certain size. I notice, for instance, on page 15, that a one-peck hamper shall contain 537.6 cubic inches. It may be that some man who has a basket hamper has one that does not contain the exact number of tenths of cubic inches, and that man is made a criminal under the laws of this land.

I differ with the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. WINGO] in that. Unfortunately for me I do not keep house in the city of Washington, and therefore I am not directly affected, but I am rather inclined to favor the old-time system of going to your market and taking your chance, buying from the dealer the apples or the berries or anything else that you have in mind, taking your chance that he has not filled the bottom of the basket with straw and put the strawberries on top. Gentlemen talk about these hampers. The only hamper that I see connected with this bill is in the absolute tendency of Congress to continue to hamper individual efforts, to turn into penal offenses everything on earth that a man has to do. I can not reconcile myself with a bill of this kind, constantly fixing measures and telling the people how they shall buy spinach or cabbage, and how they shall sell it, or how much shall be in an onion crate. The average man who is selling apples or onions does not know any more about a cubic inch than a hog does about side pockets. Yet the Congress of the United States, with great questions pending, in the midst of its deliberations when the people are crying out for relief, is asked to pause and send word to a lot of men and women in the Center Market that if they do not build their baskets and hampers just exactly as Congress says they shall, they shall become criminals. I do not believe there is any demand for a measure of this kind, and I do not believe any good purpose is going to be served by it. For that reason I want to register my very earnest protest against this kind of legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words. Everyone who has to buy anything in the District of Columbia knows that in one way or another he has to pay too much for it. He has either to pay too high a price or accept short weight or short measure. The farmer has been brought into this argument for the weight that reference to him always carries with it. Those who undertake to deceive themselves into thinking that this is a law made against the farmer are mistaken. If it were made against the farmer who is giving short weight or short measure I would still be for the bill. The farmer brings his produce into the District of Columbia in bulk, and down at the Center Market and all of the other markets, the stall masters subdivide that bulk into containers. The farmer does not make the basket or the container in which it is sold to the public. That is made by the manufacturer of those articles who engages in that business, and the stall masters buy from those manufacturers. When a manufacturer has been told that the container to be used in the District of Columbia must be of certain dimensions, then that basket or container will be made to conform to those dimensions.

If I am correctly advised, the difference between the national law and this one which is proposed as a local law is inconsequential. There can be no conflict between the two in the District of Columbia, for the reason that it is accepted by all that a special law takes precedence over a general one. In addition to that, this special act comes along later than the general one, which is national, and, therefore, would take precedence.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Yes.

Mr. BEE. Is it not true that every time you pass restrictive measures of this kind you add to the price of the article sold, because you put the additional burden upon the man and he comes back on the consumer at last, who must pay the additional expense?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. No; I do not think so. I do say, however, that every time you fail to pass a bill of this kind you place additional obligations upon the consumer by permitting the dishonest merchants to cheat the consumer. I hope that all amendments to this section will be voted down. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, this debate has taken a very wide range. I directed my remarks to the motion to strike out paragraph (a) of this section, but the discussion has been so general that I desire to say a word in addition to what I said before. I fail to understand the attitude of mind of those who have objections to making a law that only requires a man to deliver what he receives pay for. The purpose of this bill is to provide that dealers in the District of Columbia who sell commodities shall deliver what they are paid for. That is all there is to it. There is not an honest dealer in the District who has any objection to this legislation. This bill is based upon the national law as it applies generally and upon the State laws where there is no Federal law.

It has the indorsement, I would like to say, of the Retail Dealers' Association of the District. I have in my hand here a letter written early in January by the Retail Grocers' Protective Association of the District of Columbia indorsing the bill generally, and calling attention especially to two separate provisions of the bill, and it says:

> Our association, composed of a large number of retail grocers in Washington who believe in fair dealing and upright business methods, wishes to go on record as approving the provisions of the bill in question as a whole, and we wish to emphasize our approval of what appear to be the two most important provisions of the bill.
> 2. The provision relating to the establishment of standard containers for fruits and vegetables—

And that is this section 15:

> While it may not be realized by persons not familiar with the situation it is a fact, nevertheless, that with no standardization of containers for these commodities, the retail merchant who is compelled to buy fruits and vegetables daily to supply his customers, does not have proper assurance that he will receive the quantity for which he pays. Retail merchants often purchase produce of the kind mentioned in what appear to be containers that hold definite and standard quantities only to find after the commodities have been delivered to them that containers that readily deceive the eye of even the experienced buyers have been delivered. When a merchant has thus been deceived, he must either sell at a loss or advance the price to the consumer.

And the argument they advance applies with so much greater force to the people who buy at retail, who buy only in small quantities, and who do not have the same experience as the retail dealers have. It is said that it is the practice of some dealers here in the District of Columbia to buy in containers which provide full measure and dump the products out of those containers and put them into containers which deceive the eye and appear to hold a half bushel or a bushel when they do not, and in that way they get pay for a greater quantity than they buy. Now, I do not believe there is any Member of Congress who if he understood this situation would have a particle of objection to the attempt to pass a law which enables the superintendents of weights, measures, and markets to get at this thing and control it, and that is all this legislation attempts to do.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will.

Mr. BEE. Does not the gentleman from Michigan believe that under the statement of facts just submitted by him, the general charge and indictment of theft under a false pretext would lie and obviate the necessity of this law?

Mr. MAPES. It might if you could make out a case, but why make it necessary to go to that extent. The gentleman as a lawyer knows how difficult it is to establish that a container does not hold a half bushel or a peck, and why not make it impossible to use any but standard containers? It is made impossible in almost every jurisdiction in the United States.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will.

Mr. WINGO. The gentleman says that as a lawyer the gentleman from Texas knows how difficult it is to make proof that a man is guilty on a false-pretense indictment. Would he not have to make the same identical proof on the same facts to prove a man guilty under the criminal section of this bill?

Mr. MAPES. No. The inspectors could go and see that the containers which were used were proper containers and had the proper measurements. I will say to the gentleman from Arkansas these provisions are in force in almost every jurisdiction of the United States. There is nothing new about this bill. Why do we leave the people of the District of Columbia helpless——

Mr. WINGO. On that point will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. MAPES. Why is the thing allowed in the District of Columbia and not allowed elsewhere? They are allowed in the District of Columbia to sell potatoes in quarter-peck measures. You can not measure potatoes in a quarter-peck measure. They are allowed in the District of Columbia to use these lug baskets as hampers. They get bent out of shape and are drawn up together, and they get so they do not contain nearly the quantity they are expected to hold, but still they are allowed to use them as containers.

Mr. WINGO. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. Now, I do not believe the gentleman from Arkansas wants to countenance any such thing as that.

Mr. WINGO. As I understand, the gentleman says this is identical with the general statute——

Mr. MAPES. No; I did not say it is identical——

Mr. WINGO. Oh, it is not; all right. Now, what is the necessity for having one law for the market in Washington and another law for the market of the city of Alexandria?

Mr. MAPES. We are not applying it to the market of Alexandria.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry as to the status of any preceding amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is informed there is an amendment pending to strike out from line 8, page 12, down to line 5, page 13, of paragraph A, section 15, and that there is also an amendment pending to strike out the entire section 15.

Mr. GARD. The entire section?

The CHAIRMAN. The entire section.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move——

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman withhold that for a moment to see if we can reach an agreement as to time?

Mr. GARD. I will yield.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, does the gentleman mean on this paragraph?

Mr. MAPES. On the section.

Mr. GARD. There may be some gentlemen who desire to discuss the matter, and I hope the gentleman will make it 10 minutes.

Mr. MAPES. I will modify my request.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman modifies his request that debate on this section and all amendments thereto close in 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, in the matter of this section 15, I beg leave to bring the attention of the chairman of the committee to it so we may all understand just what this section 15 is. It seems to me that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois, with reference to the general law being applied in the District of Columbia, is probably a correct statement, and yet I concede possibly there may be cases where the general law, in so far as special jurisdiction in the District of Columbia is concerned, should be supplemented by a particular statute; therefore it seems from my observation of the bill and the comparison I make with the general law, the first part, known as section (a), is identical with section 6507, which is the standard barrel for fruit and other dried commodities. Now, if I may have the attention of the gentleman long enough to ask him this question, I made the statement that subdivision (a) is identical with the general law in section 6507. Was that correct?

Mr. MAPES. I think there are some verbal changes, but in substance it is the same.

Mr. GARD. Then I find that section (b) relates to the standardization for climax baskets, 2 quarts, 4 quarts, and 12 quarts, and is absolutely identical with section 6516 of the general law.

Mr. MAPES. The standard container act.

Mr. GARD. The standard for climax baskets. When we leave that we take up what seems new legislation, and if it be not new, I would like the gentleman to advise us, but I do not see in the general law provisions about the six-basket crate or the four-basket crate. And what about the standard box for berries, cherries, shelled peas, shelled beans, and about standard lug boxes or one-half bushel lug box, or hampers for fruits and vegetables in their proper dimensions? These all seem to me to be new.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will permit, paragraphs (c), (d), and (e) are practically the same as in the standard container act. Paragraph (f), relating to lug boxes, is new, so far as Federal legislation is concerned, but it is the same as the law in several States.

Mr. GARD. It is new in so far as the general law is concerned?

Mr. MAPES. Yes. That is true as to paragraph (f).

Mr. GARD. What is the difference in paragraph (i)? We passed a law some time ago about standard apple boxes. Is that the same law that we have here on page 16? We have apple boxes and pear boxes and onion crates.

Mr. MAPES. That is new as far as the District is concerned, although it is a very common provision in other jurisdictions.

Mr. GARD. I am in favor of having the greatest accuracy in weights and measures. I think the people that buy are entitled to that. But what I wanted particularly to have the gentleman's word about was as to whether there will be any conflict between this bill, if we enact it, and the general law which applies to Maryland, Virginia, and Pennsylvania, and the other States which send produce here?

Mr. MAPES. None at all. I am very glad to have the gentleman make that inquiry.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the officials having charge of the enforcement of this business were very earnest and insistent upon Congress providing some remedy that would give them the power to regulate the conditions dealt with by act in the District. There has been a great deal of complaint, as they tell us, in regard to fraud and deception in the sale of fruits and vegetables. And you will notice, gentlemen of the committee, that this bill is not drastically drawn, but it has for its aim the accomplishment of that which I think we ought to have in mind in trying to arrive at a standard of weights and measures—to reach the end by processes which are evolutionary rather than revolutionary. After providing what shall be the standard of a barrel, for instance, of apples, it says that any other barrel that contains the necessary number of cubic inches shall be considered as standard. I think it wise that we attempt to reach some standard, and for that reason I was in favor of the bill that was before the House some time ago, notwithstanding the fact that some of my colleagues from the South were very much opposed to it. I believe if we pass this measure we will put the enforcement of the law in the hands of those who have charge of its enforcement, who have presented to us a practical measure, and which the committee, I believe, has unanimously recommended. And I hope it will be the pleasure of the committee to vote down the proposed amendment striking out section (a).

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WALSH: Page 12, line 8, strike out lines 8 to 25, inclusive, and lines 1 to 4 on page 13.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MADDEN: Page 12, line 5, strike out all of section 15.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That nothing in this act contained shall be construed as permitting the use as a dry measure or substituting for a dry measure any of the following containers: Barrels, boxes, lug boxes, crates, hampers, baskets, or climax baskets; and the use of any such container as a measure is hereby expressly prohibited, and the user shall be fined or imprisoned as herein provided for other violations of this act.

The following committee amendment was read:

Insert a new section as follows:

"SEC. 16½. That no person shall sell, offer, or expose for sale in the District of Columbia any food in package form unless the quantity of contents is plainly and conspicuously marked on the outside of each package in terms of weight, measure, or numerical count. The commissioners are authorized to establish and allow reasonable variation, tolerances, and exemptions as to small packages."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read:

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That a cord of wood shall contain 128 cubic feet. Wood more than 8 inches in length shall be sold by the cord or fractional part thereof, and when delivered shall contain 128 cubic feet per cord when evenly and compactly stacked. Split wood, 8 inches or less in length, may be sold by such standard loads as shall be fixed by the commissioners.

That a barrel of flour shall contain 196 pounds avoirdupois, net weight, and fractional parts thereof shall contain proportionate net weight.

A standard sack or bag of potatoes shall contain 90 pounds of potatoes at the time of sale, and potatoes shall not be sold by the sack or bag in other than standard sacks or bags.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 18, lines 5 and 6, "196" and insert "200."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. MAPES: Page 18, lines 5 and 6, strike out the words "one hundred and ninety-six" and insert in lieu thereof the words "two hundred."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, that is for the purpose of making this comply with the language of the bill which was passed some time ago.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The committee just agreed to an amendment called "section 16½," which provides that the commissioners are authorized to establish and allow reasonable variation, tolerances, and exemptions as to small packages. I do not know whether that ought to be "variations" or not. In the pure-food law we provided that there should be reasonable variations allowed, and what they should be should be fixed by the Department of Agriculture. In other words, the theory of that was that Congress by legislation provides that there shall be reasonable variation, leaving the detail of fixing what the variations shall be through an administrative officer. We went on the theory that we had enacted railroad legislation, providing, for instance, that railroad rates should be reasonable, giving to the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority to say as a matter of detail what reasonable rates were. That goes to the whole question of the legislative functions of Congress, namely, how far you can confer legislative authority upon executive or administrative officials.

Courts have held that Congress can not confer or delegate its legislative authority. It could delegate to administrative officers the fixing of details under a legislative act of Congress. I am not sure whether this form of this legislation is constitutional or not. It may be held to be so. It is, in fact, legislation. I think it would have been far wiser if in drawing this bill we would say that reasonable variations, and so forth, shall be allowed. That is a legislative function allowing reasonable variations. Then the administrative officers fix the details. But here as it stands is the proposition allowing the commissioners to legislate as to whether they will allow reasonable variations or not. I thought I would not let it pass without calling attention to that fundamental distinction between legislative and administrative authority.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 25. That the commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to establish tolerances and specifications for scales, weights, measures, weighing or measuring instruments or devices, and containers used in the District of Columbia, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and such as conform thereto shall be approved.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out section 25.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 21, line 6, strike out all of section 25.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, section 25, as it appears on page 21, is going much further even than the matter to which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] very pertinently called attention a moment ago. My recollection is that in the writing of the pure-food law the question of tolerances was written in the general law. Of course, everybody realizes that there may be times when a slight variation is necessary; that it would be impossible to preserve an absolute equality of measures at all times. But the tolerance is a thing in itself. In section 25 we provide that—

The commissioners are hereby authorized and empowered to establish tolerances and specifications for scales, weights, measures, weighing or measuring instruments or devices, and containers used in the District of Columbia, not inconsistent with the provisions of this act, and such as conform thereto shall be approved.

Now, if that means anything, the ordinary acceptance of it would be that the Commissioners of the District of Columbia would be authorized and empowered to say what these baskets shall contain, what these measures shall be, what the scales shall be, what the weights are, when in reality we are legislating in this act as to what they should be in the District of Columbia. I call the attention of the chairman of the committee to this, because it really seems to me that in section 25 you are practically undoing what you are affirmatively doing in the remainder of the act.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. In section 28, on page 22 of the bill, it is provided that these powers and duties that are granted to the superintendent may be delegated to any of his assistants or inspectors, and it seems to me that that provision, taken with the one that the gentleman refers to, would leave it to the assistants to do away with this law.

Mr. GARD. Yes. I have not read that section, but it does seem to me true that when we say in the different sections what the measure shall be, and then come along in section 25 and provide that the commissioners may say that that measure shall be something else "that is not inconsistent with the provisions of this act and such as conforms thereto shall be approved," we are attempting to say, not in very accurate language, that the commissioners may make a different standard than that which Congress makes by legislative enactment.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; very gladly.

Mr. MAPES. My information is that section 25 is the same as the law to which the gentleman refers, with the addition of the words "and specifications." The existing law does take care of the tolerances, but not the specifications.

Mr. GARD. My idea is that the law would take care of tolerances. My contention in brief is, if I may make it to the gentleman, that I think it is very proper that the law should take care of tolerances, but I do not believe we should go so far as to legislate that the commissioners are empowered to make specifications.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to proceed for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for five additional minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. It seems to me that the specifications and tolerances that the commissioners make here for the District of Columbia should be the same as the Bureau of Standards or the Agricultural Department, or whatever it is that makes them under the general law. I have an amendment of that kind which I thought of offering, requiring the commissioners to make the same specifications and tolerances.

Mr. GARD. I would be very glad if the gentleman would suggest it. I have no interest except in seeing that the law is made a workable law.

Mr. MAPES. I will offer a section later.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman would at this time suggest what his amendment is, we might be able to understand the purpose of this section.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, while the gentleman is getting ready to furnish that information I suggest that the language used in the general statute might be employed. It is to this effect: "Reasonable variations may be permitted and tolerances established by rules and regulations made," and so forth. If the officials who are to make those under the general law would be different in the District of Columbia, they would be the Commissioners of the District instead of the Director of the Bureau of Standards, in connection with the Secretary of Commerce.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. If the gentleman will permit, I will offer my proposed amendment at this place.

Mr. GARD. I shall be glad if the gentleman would.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MAPES. It is to be inserted at the end of section 25.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman include all of the language in section 25 and then insert this? Is that the idea?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 21, line 11, after the word "approved," insert: "The commissioners shall prescribe and allow for barrels, containers, and packages provided for in this act the same specifications, variances, or tolerances that have been prescribed or established, or that may hereafter be prescribed or established for like barrels, containers, or packages by any official of the United States in accordance with the requirements of any act of Congress."

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman pardon me a moment?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GARD. The question was asked me by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON], a member of the committee, if it was the gentleman's intention to strike out section 25 and insert what the gentleman has offered by way of amendment? It seems to me that it would probably take care of the situation with the other language in section 25 eliminated.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that this amendment, at my suggestion, was prepared by the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets. He intended to have it inserted after section 25.

Mr. GARD. It would seem to me better if you would leave out section 25, but the gentleman knows more about the construction of the bill than I do.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, if he will permit me——

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Here is the situation. We fix a certain standard, and define what it shall be.

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The standard of a barrel, for instance. Now, two barrels that were identically the same were never made, and never will be probably, but we specify what the barrels shall contain. It is necessary to provide that there may be tolerances. I think the proper way to do is to say that reasonable tolerances shall be allowed, and then provide that somebody shall fix them. However, you can not entirely strike out section 25 without putting something in the place of it, because that is the only place where you allow tolerances.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman has offered an amendment which, I think, covers the case.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; the amendment does not say that tolerances shall be allowed. The amendment provides what they shall be, but you must first either provide that tolerances shall be allowed, which, I think, is the proper form, or else provide that the commissioners may establish tolerances. Now, the amendment only provides what those tolerances shall be. In other words, that the commissioners shall establish the same tolerances that the Agricultural Department or the Department of Commerce have established in cases covering the same matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. BEE. Mr. Chairman, I rise in support of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD]. I am going to say the last word I have got to say on this subject. I realize by the temper of the committee that they are going to pass this bill. However, I wish to suggest this thought: I think it was very unfair to the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] to put him in the chair when his amendment was up a while ago, and leave nobody to plead for his amendment when it came up.

This section 25, which we now have under consideration, presents to my judgment a curious situation. I have always understood that penal laws were to be strictly construed. Here is an act of Congress that proposes to make criminals out of men who do not build a hamper or a crate or basket of certain proportions. Yet in the same law it is intended to insert a clause that the commissioners shall sit down in their offices and say to John Smith, "We will give you a tolerance to violate the law on this subject; but you, Bill Jones, have not spoken to us in the proper way, and you get no tolerances. You must obey the law." It is the first time in my life that I have ever heard of a criminal law carrying propositions of tolerance to be decided by some individual in favor of the lawbreaker.

But, as I say, I realize that this law is going to be enacted. The temper of the committee has indicated that. But once more I want to enter my protest against the modern tendency, in Congress and elsewhere, to create offenses, to make criminals out of men for things that the law already covers, under the doctrine of theft by a false pretext, or any offense of that kind.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BEE. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, the commissioners would not make tolerances which would apply to individual cases only. They would make the tolerances apply generally and publish them so that the public would know what they were.

Mr. BEE. In other words, do I understand the gentleman from Michigan, then, to contend that a criminal statute which provides criminal punishment for the offender is also to provide that the men whose duty it is to enforce it may sit in their offices and send out notices broadcast that certain offenses against the law will be permitted and not each individual come to present his claim to the commissioners? Do I so understand the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. MAPES. Oh, no; it is similar to the law. If this bill is passed and the tolerances are provided for by the commissioners, they become an amplification of the law; then dealers and others must abide by them.

Mr. BEE. I have practiced law in a limited way in the past. If there was one doctrine of criminal law that I thought was well established it was that criminal statutes, which make criminals out of citizens of this country, should be strictly construed and that they should be enforced; but here, even under the explanation of the gentleman from Michigan, we propose to pass a law by which when people go to market, if some fellow manages to sell them a dozen strawberries less than they ought to have received, that man is made a criminal unless the commissioners give him a tolerance and say to him that he shall go ahead under such regulations as they prescribe.

I say I recognize the futility of my protest, but I want to register it.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, simply for the purpose of submitting my view to my friend, the chairman of the committee [Mr. MAPES].

Section 25, which is under consideration, authorizes tolerances, and so forth, "not inconsistent with the provisions of this act." Let us test the operation of that authorization with reference, for instance, to what is provided on page 18, lines 8 to 11, inclusive. There it is provided that—

A standard sack or bag of potatoes shall contain 90 pounds of potatoes at the time of sale, and potatoes shall not be sold by the sack or bag in other than standard sacks or bags.

Now, as I understand, under section 25 the commissioners would have no right at all to interfere with that requirement and prohibition.

Mr. MAPES. No.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. All that the commissioners can do under section 25 is to do something not inconsistent with the terms of the act.

Mr. MAPES. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. So this act would restrict the standard sack or bag of potatoes absolutely to 90 pounds, which is not a practical thing. Potato raisers who are here on the floor can tell you that. I am informed that at this time there is no potato sack which contains 90 pounds. There are potato sacks that contain less than 90 pounds and there are many sacks that contain more than 90 pounds. So if we adopt this bill as it stands, there is that limitation. We fix the potato sack at 90 pounds and section 25 does not give any opportunity to get away from it where potatoes are sold by the sack.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Yes.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman's statement is not in accord with the information which I have received when he says that there are no sacks containing 90 pounds of potatoes. My information is that that is the customary sack that is used here in the District of Columbia, and that it is in very general use. Of course, this could not apply to potatoes that are sold otherwise than in sacks, or that are shipped in interstate commerce and are sold in the original packages.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. As a matter of fact, the truckers of Maryland and Virginia bring potatoes here in sacks, in their own vehicles, and sell them in sacks, and the sacks are not 90-pound sacks.

Mr. MAPES. My colleague from Rhode Island suggests that these are sold by the sack and not in the sack. This proposed legislation is trying to remedy this situation, for example, which exists in the District to some extent: Certain men travel around in the residence portions of the District in the fall of the year representing themselves to be farmers, selling potatoes in the sack. A great many housewives buy potatoes of these men, and after the potatoes are sold the men disappear and nobody knows where they come from or where they go to.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HICKS). The time of the gentleman from Virginia has expired.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. The superintendent of weights and measures tells me that it is a frequent practice on the part of these men to take a few pounds out of each sack, so that they really sell 85 pounds or less. They are representing to the housewives that the sacks contain 90 pounds. As soon as they get their money they are gone and nobody can locate them. They go around imposing on the housewives in the District. The superintendent recommends some such legislation as this so that he can better cope with this situation and stop such practices.

Mr. WELLING. May I interrupt the gentleman to say that in the markets of this city the potatoes shipped in by carload lots from the gentleman's own State and all over the Northwest come here not in 90-pound bags but come in 150-pound bags? I do not believe that the gentleman can find anywhere in Washington, except what are sold by the farmers, a 90-pound sack.

Mr. MAPES. Does not the gentleman see that this legislation would not interfere with that in any way?

Mr. WELLING. I think it would.

Mr. MAPES. There is such a substantial difference between 90 and 150 pound sacks.

Mr. WELLING. But you make 150-pound sacks unlawful.

Mr. MAPES. Potatoes shipped in interstate commerce in 150-pound sacks can be sold, but the retailers could not sell from those sacks by the sack. Retailers could not sell potatoes by those sacks in the District of Columbia if this bill becomes a law. This is for the protection of the purchaser from the retailer, for the protection of the consuming public, and is not designed to interfere in any way with the shipment of potatoes in interstate commerce.

Mr. WELLING. I have grown potatoes all my life, and a sugar sack will hold approximately 90 pounds. A wheat sack such as the farmer has on his farm will hold 110 pounds. You forbid these men who are bringing potatoes into this market on their wagons from selling potatoes unless they put them in a 90-pound bag and do not use up the vacant space.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Let me ask the gentleman whether the weight of potatoes varies according to the season at which they are sold?

Mr. WELLING. Not so very much.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. But to some extent?

Mr. WELLING. Yes; this bill makes it mandatory on every person to put his potatoes in a 90-pound sack. I will wager that if you go into the market to-day, down into the truck regions, you can not find a container having 90 pounds of potatoes in it ready for sale. They will have 60 pounds or considerable more than 90 pounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the motion to strike out.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 21, line 10, after the word "Columbia," the comma and insert a period, and then strike out the balance of the language in lines 10 and 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 21, line 10, strike out the comma after the word "Columbia" and insert a period. Strike out the remainder of lines 10 and 11.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 27. That no person shall, within the District of Columbia, upon any freight bill, express bill, or other bill for transportation, indicate the weight of any commodity upon which weight the freight, express, or other transportation charge or charges is or are based except the true gross weight of such commodity, and every bill for freight, express, or other transportation charge or charges shall have legibly written or printed thereon the name of the person indicating such weight on same; and no person shall collect or attempt to collect in the District of Columbia any bill for freight, express, or other transportation charge or charges unless the same is prepared in accordance with the provisions of this section. The word "bill" as used in this section shall be construed to mean any printed or written or printed and written evidence of charge or charges for freight, express, or other transportation.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the section. The section does not belong in this bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, in anticipation of this motion being made, I discussed the matter with the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, who prepared the bill. He recognized the fact that this provision was somewhat foreign to the general purpose of the bill, and he has no objection to its going out.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois to strike out the section.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, may I ask the gentleman from Michigan to consider further the provisions with reference to potato sacks? I would not wish to embarrass the gentleman with respect to this legislation, even if I were able to do so, but I think this is a time when we ought to consider the producer and facilitate him as much as possible. I doubt whether there is much of the abuse in the District of Columbia referred to by the gentleman; and even if there is some abuse, on the other hand, as has been stated here by those having great practical experience, to retain this provision may hinder the producer in marketing his product here. I think, as a rule, it is rather dangerous for government to act upon mere theory, to act without the development of facts by the people who know best. There was no appearance before the committee of a single man engaged in the business of production. The only person who appeared was the official in the District of Columbia who is immediately connected with this subject, and perhaps, in addition, some of his assistants. They have their views, of course, but it seems to me we ought to know something more in a practical way about this particular provision to which I am alluding before we pass it into legislation. The theorist is all right in his way, but perhaps we would be paying for sugar to-day but 11 cents a pound instead of 20 or 25 cents if somebody had not acted upon the judgment of a theorist, a most excellent gentleman, a man of wide information, but a man whose opinion was accepted without inquiry beyond him.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman that I discussed this particular matter with the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets, and he said frankly that in his opinion it was not essential to have the 90-pound sack, as distinguished from the sack of 100 pounds or some other definite weight, but he thought it was necessary in order to properly take care of conditions here in the District to fix some standard of weight for the sale of potatoes that were sold in sacks. I have a statement here that he gave me in which he says:

> The provision regarding the weight of a bag of potatoes conforms to the general custom in the District and in Maryland among farmers who bring potatoes to the market here for sale. The bags usually contain 90 pounds, and when one buys a bag of potatoes he expects to get 90 pounds. It is the practice, however, among some unscrupulous dealers, hucksters, to take some potatoes out of each bag of a lot they buy, and in that way increase the number of bags and sell the entire lot for a certain price per bag. The purchaser believes he is getting 90 pounds when, in fact, he gets about 75 or 80 pounds.

I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that we have passed this section, as the gentleman knows, and I think it would be better for him to take the matter up with the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets and perhaps the Senate committee before the bill is finally enacted into law. I dislike to go back to this, inasmuch as we have already passed over it.

Mr. WELLING. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. I have just talked with Golden & Co., one of the largest handlers of potatoes in the Washington market, and they say they never have heard and do not now know or recognize any container for potatoes of 90 pounds. It would be an outrage on every shipper who sends potatoes into this market as well as upon the local dealers.

Mr. MAPES. It is hard to reconcile that statement with the statement of the superintendent of weights, measures, and markets that that is the common standard in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I know we are not entitled, as a matter of right, to return to the section in question, and if the gentleman is disinclined to do that I shall not further urge it.

Mr. MAPES. We have several other bills that we desire to get up this afternoon.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I think the gentleman's suggestion is fair. It gives me the opportunity to ascertain the facts and there will be a chance to modify this provision if it turns out that it would work an injustice.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in my innocence I had supposed that people bought potatoes by the bushel, the half bushel, the peck, the half peck, and that sort of thing, and by the pound. Certainly if people buy potatoes by the bag and the gentleman says that one of the chief handlers of potatoes does not know of 90-pound bags, and the sealer of weights does not know of any other sized bag of potatoes, there is a woeful lot of ignorance on the part of some one. No one can tell how much a bag of potatoes contains just by looking at it.

Mr. WELLING. I understand that there is no such sack as will hold 90 pounds. There are sacks that hold 110 pounds or 150 pounds, and they come into this market by the carload, containing 150 pounds in each sack, from all over the Northwest.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Unless the gentleman knows a great deal more about it than I do, he does not know what the size of a potato sack is.

Mr. WELLING. Oh, this is a matter that I know a great deal about.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I do not undertake to dispute the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Michigan that inasmuch as section 27 was stricken out, there should be a renumbering of the sections following.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the duty of the Clerk in engrossing the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside temporarily with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

BONUS LEGISLATION.

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an editorial from the Washington Post.

Mr. CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein an editorial. Is there objection?

Mr. DOWELL. Upon what subject?

Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi. On the subject of the bonus to ex-service men.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The editorial is as follows:

[From the Washington Post, Sunday, May 23, 1920.]

THE BONUS IN POLITICS.

If the Republicans of the House of Representatives were actually moving to impose an additional tax of $1,276,500,000 on the people at this time for the purpose of giving a bonus to soldiers and sailors, the move could not be ascribed to anything but madness. But as the House Republicans know very well that no such tax will be imposed, their proposal to impose it may be set down for what it really is—a hypocritical and disreputable attempt to hoodwink the soldier boys for purposes of political advantage in the forthcoming campaign.

The House Republicans are trying to make it appear that they favor the imposition of another billion-dollar tax upon the people; that the soldier and sailor boys must have this bonus; that the Democrats are opposing the plan, and the Democratic President is intent upon vetoing the bill, and therefore that the Republican Party is the only friend of the soldiers and sailors. Hence, if the soldiers and sailors have any gratitude they will be expected to vote the Republican ticket from President to dog catcher.

The Republicans of the House would not pass the bonus bill if they knew it would pass the Senate and be approved by the President, for they know that the people would relegate all of them to private life for incompetence in swelling the public debt at a time when the public back is bending under an excessive load. The House Republicans rely upon the Senate and the President to block the bill. Thus these "statesmen" hope to fool the soldiers and sailors and yet avoid the wrath of the taxpayers.

Such is the quality of statesmanship exhibited by the majority of the once great Committee on Ways and Means and seemingly approved by the Republican majority of the House.

No more humiliating spectacle has ever been witnessed in the Capitol than that which will occur this week if a majority of the House shall vote in favor of the bonus bill. The proposal is so offensive to decency when stripped of its hypocrisy that no individual Member of the House would dare to champion it in the presence of self-respecting soldiers and sailors of the recent war. It is an indictment of the good faith of its supporters, and the roll call will be used against them individually by their rivals in their districts. These rivals will not fail to tell the people how their Congressmen voted for an additional tax of $1,276,500,000. They will fully explain to all soldiers and sailors how the vote was cast in the knowledge that the bill could not pass—that it was, bluntly speaking, a swindle disguised as a bribe, intended to deceive them into voting the Republican ticket. How can any Congressman voting for this bill successfully cope with a rival who thrusts these deadly facts into the campaign?

The Congressmen engineering this fraudulent measure confidently count upon the ignorance of the soldiers and sailors. They seem to regard these young men as too simple to understand the intricacy of the scheme that has been hatched. They expect to convince the fighting men that a Democratic minority in Congress or the Democratic President, as the case may be, blocked the bonus which a grateful

Republican Party was anxious to give them. But the soldiers and sailors will not be misled. The truth will be conveyed to them before the bill is voted down in the Senate or vetoed by the President.

Should the House pass this bill, a storm of protest will arise from the taxpayers. They will speedily rip off all the pretense that now covers the proposal. The Senate debate, if held before the recess, will expose the hypocritical action of the House majority and will place before the two great elements concerned—taxpayers and fighters—the full truth. Thus the Congressmen who vote for the bill will be impaled upon one horn or the other.

In the meantime it behooves the soldiers and sailors to understand clearly what is being attempted in the name of patriotism and gratitude. The protests which are coming in from former soldiers and sailors reveal that many of them detect the unwisdom of imposing extra taxation upon the people for the purpose of giving the fighters a bonus. Everyone knows that a tax is not only collected from the consumer, but is usually made the excuse for an extra charge. The bonus would amount to $1,276,500,000, which is staggering enough in itself; but by the time the consumers paid the tax it would have grown to $2,000,000,000 or more. The fighters and their relatives would pay this tax and its profiteering trailer. All patriotic families have liberty bonds, and the value of these bonds would depreciate if they were dumped upon the market, as they would be if taxpayers were squeezed by a bonus bill. Thus the fighters' families would be doubly out of pocket.

But there is no danger of committing the folly of enacting the bonus bill. Congress is about to adjourn. The campaign will be on. Business conditions are changing. Extra taxes must be laid to carry on the Government. The people will know more about the Government than they know now. If the House before adjourning should pass the bonus bill, its action will have become a hissing and a byword before the Senate, next winter, will be called upon to discuss it.

WASHINGTON MARKET CO.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 9036) to repeal and annul certain parts of the charter and lease granted and made to the Washington Market Co. by act of Congress entitled "An act to incorporate the Washington Market Co.," approved May 20, 1870, and ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill H. R. 9036, and asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to delay the passage of this bill in discussing it unnecessarily. The bill was introduced in the last Congress by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JOHNSON] and passed the House of Representatives. It was reintroduced in this Congress and was gone over very thoroughly by the committee, and, as far as I know, no one, not even those interested in the market company, oppose the legislation. On the part of the Government it is purely a business proposition. We have leased property for which the lessor under the existing conditions pays a fraction of 1 per cent per year. This bill proposes to cancel or annul the lease of the Washington Market Co. and take back the property upon paying to the company the value of the buildings and improvements erected thereon by the company, as the charter provided might be done. Unless there are some questions, I ask that the bill be read for amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

No one shall be appointed on said commission if he be either a Member of Congress or an ex-Member thereof; nor if he be an officer or employee of the United States, nor if he be a stockholder in, or the owner or pledgee of any bond of the market company; nor if he be a creditor or debtor of the said market company or of any officer or stockholder thereof; nor if he be an officer or stockholder of any corporation which is either a creditor or debtor of any officer or stockholder of the market company; nor if he be, directly or indirectly, interested financially in the market company, any of its officers, stockholders or bondholders; nor if he be a tenant, lessee, bailee, or bailor of the market company; nor if he be the owner or pledgee of any bond or of any of the capital stock of the market company; nor if he be an officer, agent, employee, tenant, bailee, or bailor of any firm, copartnership or corporation which is a tenant, bailee, or bailor of the market company, nor if he be attorney for any of the aforesaid.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 6, line 10, after the word "company," strike out the comma and insert a semicolon.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

If either party be dissatisfied with the amount of the award, such dissatisfied party may take an appeal to the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia by noting in the office of the clerk of the court of appeals an appeal therefrom within 30 days after the filing of said award, and perfect the said appeal within 60 days thereafter by filing the entire record, or a copy thereof, certified by the chairman or any two members of said commission, and filing it in the office of the clerk of the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia, which court is hereby vested with jurisdiction to hear and determine such appeal, and may revise the amount of the award as shall be just; and the judgment rendered by said court shall be final.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 7, line 21, correct the spelling of the word "dissatisfied."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That if, at any time, the Secretary of Agriculture, or his successor in charge of said reservation, should become satisfied that any lessee of said reservation, or any part thereof, or any person having property stored thereon, is guilty of overcharging, extortion, profiteering, or making any unconscionable bargain or sale he is hereby empowered and directed to cause such person, together with his goods and wares, to be ejected therefrom; and, further, forever afterwards denied the privilege of trading or being employed therein in any capacity whatever. The right or authority of the Secretary of Agriculture, or his successor in control of said reservation, to summarily and forthwith eject therefrom, as aforesaid, and to cancel the lease or contract of storage—either or both—without recourse to any judicial tribunal, of any person so offending is hereby made specific and mandatory. And no contract of lease or for storage shall be made or entered into by the said Secretary, or his successor, without such a provision being incorporated therein and agreed to by the lessee or bailor. If any such offending lessee or bailor be a firm, joint-stock company, copartnership, or corporation, no member of, or stockholder in, any such concern shall be permitted thereafter to trade in said reservation or to store any article of merchandise or commerce therein.

The committee amendments were read as follows:

Page 10, line 4, after the word "copartnership," strike out the comma; and in line 11, after the word "company," strike out the comma.

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk finished the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be temporarily laid aside with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

REDISTRIBUTION OF GENERAL TAXES, ETC.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill (H. R. 8535) to provide for a redistribution of general taxes, and so forth.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 8535) to provide for the redistribution of general taxes and special assessment due and payable on real estate in the District of Columbia in cases of subdivision or sales of land therein.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That whenever application is made in writing to the assessor of the District of Columbia by the owner of any tract of land in said District not subdivided into lots and of record as a subdivision in the office of the surveyor of said District, for the redistribution of any general or special taxes or assessments then due thereon, or whenever such application is made by the owner of any parcel of such tract for such redistribution, any such general or special taxes or assessments due against the entire tract of which such parcel is a part shall be redistributed so that the owner of any such parcel may pay the proportion of such entire taxes or assessments equitably chargeable thereon.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 3, line 1, after the word "then," insert the words "levied or."
Page 3, line 4, after the word "assessments," insert the words "levied or."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the board of assistant assessors charged with the assessment of real estate in the District of Columbia is hereby authorized and directed to reassess or redistribute any such general or special assessment or tax due and unpaid in accordance with the provisions of laws for the assessment and equalizations of the valuations of real estate in the District of Columbia for taxation, after notice to owners of record of the land to be assessed, with right of appeal within 10 days to the board of equalization and review, as prescribed in section 9 of "An act to provide an immediate revision and equalization of real estate values in the District of Columbia; also to provide an assessment of real estate in said District in the year 1896 and every third year thereafter, and for other purposes," approved August 14, 1894; and the assessor of said District is hereby authorized and directed to promptly reassess or redistribute any general or special assessment of any kind due and unpaid, as hereinbefore provided.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 3, line 20, after the word "tax," insert the words "levied or."
Page 4, line 8, after the word "kind," insert the words "levied or."

The question was taken, and the amendments were agreed to.

The Clerk finished the reading of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside temporarily with a favorable recommendation.

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

WIDENING GEORGIA AVENUE.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the Committee on the District of Columbia, I call up the bill H. R. 10004.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 10004) authorizing the widening of Georgia Avenue between Fairmont Street and Gresham Place NW.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, what is this bill?

Mr. BURDICK. This bill authorizes the widening of Georgia Avenue and Fairmont Street and Gresham Place about a distance of two blocks in the city of Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I would say that this bill was submitted to the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, and it authorizes the widening of Georgia Avenue for a distance of two blocks to conform with the other portions of Georgia Avenue. I would ask the Clerk to read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That under and in accordance with the provisions of subchapter 1 of chapter 15 of the Code of Law for the District of Columbia, within six months after the passage of this act, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized and directed to institute in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia a proceeding in rem to condemn the land that may be necessary for widening of Georgia Avenue between Fairmont Street and Gresham Place NW., with a width of not less than 90 feet, in accordance with maps on file in the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia: Provided, however, That the entire amount found to be due and awarded by the jury in said proceedings as damages, for, and in respect of, the land to be condemned for said widening, plus the costs and expenses of the proceedings hereunder, shall be assessed by the jury as benefits.

The committee amendment was read as follows:

Page 2, line 8, after the word "benefits," insert the words "against the property which the jury shall find to be benefited."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk finished the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Chairman, I move that the bill be laid aside temporarily with a favorable recommendation.

The motion was agreed to.

SALE OF CERTAIN LANDS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I call up the bill H. R. 11329.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan calls up the bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11329) to provide for the sale by the Commissioners of the District of Columbia of certain land in the District of Columbia acquired for a school site, and for other purposes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan asks unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I think the bill should be read, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MAPES. Then I ask that the Clerk read the bill.

Mr. GARD. What is it—a long bill?

Mr. MAPES. No; only two pages. I will explain it in a minute.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will explain it, I will withdraw the request.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, as the report accompanying this bill shows, the property involved in this bill was included in a tract purchased in 1869 for a school site, but was never used for that purpose. The entire parcel, except the two small strips involved here, was absorbed when Twentieth and Jackson Streets were opened in the Northeast. There are two small strips between the street and the adjoining property that are still in the possession of the District, and this bill authorizes the sale of those two strips. The owner of the property abutting one of them desires to erect a building on the corner and hesitates to build until the property can be properly developed to the new street line. The Commissioners of the District recommend the enactment of this legislation, and they think it is for the public interest to have it enacted.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I do.

Mr. GARD. I have not heard what the legislation is expected to accomplish; we do not have the opportunity of knowing what bills are going to be brought up——

Mr. MAPES. It authorizes——

Mr. GARD. Does it give power to purchase anything or authorize the commissioner to sell it?

Mr. MAPES. It authorizes the commissioners to sell those two small strips of land either at public or private sale and to sell at not less than the valuation based upon the assessment.

Mr. GARD. Does it provide for any appraisement of the property before they sell it?

Mr. MAPES. No; except it can not be sold for less than the valuation as fixed by the assessor.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WOODS of Virginia. I think it might be helpful if the chairman would state that they are very small strips. He did not give the dimensions. As I recall, they are very small.

Mr. GARD. What is the value of the land?

Mr. MAPES. I really can not answer that question.

Mr. GARD. I mean as assessed.

Mr. MAPES. I can not answer that.

Mr. GARD. It says they are authorized to sell at public or private sale, at a price not less than the true value of the abutting property, based on the assessment.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman asks a very pertinent question, but I am not able to answer it.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield?

Mr. MAPES. I will yield.

Mr. PARRISH. Does that mean on the assessed value? There is no claim that they assess any property above a two-thirds value here. Does it mean that the property shall be sold at not less than two-thirds of the value?

Mr. MAPES. No. It is based upon the assessment. The commissioners explained to the committee that that meant it could not be sold for less than the valuation as found by the assessors. The valuation is based upon the assessed valuation.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. The gentleman is mistaken in saying that the true value is not ascertained in making the assessment. The true value is ascertained and two-thirds taken off for assessment purposes.

Mr. PARRISH. I did not know whether the assessed value was two-thirds of 100 per cent. Will the gentleman yield for another question?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Michigan yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. MAPES. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. PARRISH. Has the gentleman any information as to how this property is going to be sold—whether it will be sold at public or private sale?

Mr. MAPES. I have no further information than what the bill provides. The bill provides it may be sold at either public or private sale. The committee considered that proposition, but concluded that the strips were so small that it might be left to the discretion of the commissioners to sell it either at public or private sale.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. GARD. This may be a small matter; I do not know; but in this instance it seems to me to be something that the committee ought to consider, for these strips have never been assessed for taxation. There has been no order of appraisal for this sale. The sale price is based upon this language:

At a price not less than the true value of the abutting property based on the assessment.

Does not the gentleman think when we sell property or authorize the sale of it that we should authorize the appraisement of the property where there has been no assessment? My understanding, from what the gentleman has said—the chairman of the committee—is that these are strips of land and unused, I suspect, and therefore have never been assessed for taxation. But unless they are very minor in their value, unless they are of little consequence from a financial standpoint, it would seem to me we are establishing a bad precedent here when we sell property without knowing what it is worth, without appraisement or assessment to indicate what the Government ought to get for it.

Mr. MAPES. They are of small consequence, I will say to the gentleman. I have a chart here showing the strips in question, and they lie between the street and the property of certain adjoining property owners.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman knows, probably, that the men who want these strips are the people who own the abutting property, so as to make their own lots bigger?

Mr. MAPES. They are the only men, I suppose, who will desire to have the strips at all.

Mr. GARD. They are responsible for this legislation from the gentleman's committee, I have no doubt.

Mr. MAPES. I presume they requested the commissioners to recommend the legislation, although I have no information about it.

Mr. GARD. It would be natural to suspect that. But I do think that we are tending to establish a dangerous principle here when we sell property, even a very small amount, if we do not provide the determination of its value by some legally recognized procedure, so that the sale, either public or private, may be based upon an assessed appraised value found.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia be, and they are hereby, authorized to sell at public or private sale, at a price not less than the true value of the abutting property based on the assessment, all that part of the subdivision of Granby acquired by the commissioners of primary schools of Washington County by deed from George H. Baer and wife dated the 25th day of June in the year 1869, excepting that part of said land lying within the lines of Twentieth and Jackson Streets as recorded in book 52, page 174, of the records of the office of the surveyor of the District of Columbia, the land herein authorized to be so conveyed being assessed among the records of the office of the assessor of the District of Columbia as parcel 156 sub sub 38 and parcel 156 sub 39, reserving, however, so much of said land as is in the judgment of said commissioners necessary for alley purposes, the portion of land so reserved not to be included in said sale: Provided, That the entire proceeds of such sale by the said Commissioners of the District of Columbia shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of getting a little information. The bill refers to the commissioners of primary schools of Washington County. What is that?

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Washington County was all that part of the District of Columbia outside of the old city of Washington and the old city of Georgetown. There were three subdivisions of the District when this property was acquired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I made inquiry of the gentleman who was chairman of the committee, for the purpose of identification for the purpose of value, regarding the subdivision of Granby, and where and what that is, and what was the county of Washington.

Mr. MAPES. This property is out in the northeast section of the city at Twentieth and Jackson Streets. Washington County, as the gentleman knows, is the old municipal designation of that part of the District. I have a chart here which will show the location.

Mr. GARD. Is Granby an existing subdivision in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MAPES. I think not.

Mr. GARD. It still refers to it in this bill by saying:

All that part of the subdivision of Granby.

Mr. MAPES. As the gentleman knows, these old descriptions are often referred to in describing land in conveyances as a means of identification. The square number is also given. It is 156 sub 38 and parcel 156 sub 39.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to direct the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to line 6, page 2, to inquire if the word "sub" should be there twice before the word "thirty-eight"?

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that one of those be eliminated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves to amend by striking out the word "sub" where it first appears in line 6, page 2. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report to the House the several bills that have been temporarily laid aside, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bills as amended do pass.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GARD. Did the gentleman move to lay aside the last bill with the necessary recommendation?

Mr. MAPES. If that is necessary, I will make that motion first.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan moves that the bill H. R. 11329 as amended be laid aside with favorable recommendation. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

MANDATE FOR ARMENIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered to be printed:

GENTLEMEN OF THE CONGRESS:

On the fourteenth of May an official communication was received at the Executive Office from the Secretary of the Senate of the United States conveying the following preambles and resolutions:

"Whereas the testimony adduced at the hearings conducted by the subcommittee of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations have clearly established the truth of the reported massacres and other atrocities from which the Armenian people have suffered; and

"Whereas the people of the United States are deeply impressed by the deplorable conditions of insecurity, starvation, and misery now prevalent in Armenia; and

"Whereas the independence of the Republic of Armenia has been duly recognized by the Supreme Council of the Peace Conference and by the Government of the United States of America: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That the sincere congratulations of the Senate of the United States are hereby extended to the people of Armenia on the recognition of the independence of the Republic of Armenia, without prejudice respecting the territorial boundaries involved; and be it further

"Resolved, That the Senate of the United States hereby expresses the hope that stable government, proper protection of individual liberties and rights, and the full realization of nationalistic aspirations may soon be attained by the Armenian people; and be it further

"Resolved, That in order to afford necessary protection for the lives and property of citizens of the United States at the port of Batum and along the line of the railroad leading to Baku, the President is hereby requested, if not incompatible with the public interest, to cause a United States warship and a force of marines to be dispatched to such port with instructions to such marines to disembark and to protect American lives and property."

I received and read this document with great interest and with genuine gratification, not only because it embodied my own convictions and feelings with regard to Armenia and its people, but also, and more particularly, because it seemed to me the voice of the American people expressing their genuine convictions and deep Christian sympathies, and intimating the line of duty which seemed to them to lie clearly before us.

I cannot but regard it as providential, and not as a mere casual coincidence that almost at the same time I received information that the conference of statesmen now sitting at San Remo for the purpose of working out the details of peace with the Central Powers which it was not feasible to work out in the conference at Paris, had formally resolved to address a definite appeal to this Government to accept a mandate for Armenia. They were at pains to add that they did this, "not from the smallest desire to evade any obligations which they might be expected to undertake, but because the responsibilities which they are already obliged to bear in connection with the disposition of the former Ottoman Empire will strain their capacities to the uttermost, and because they believe that the appearance on the scene of a power emancipated from the prepossessions of the Old World will inspire a wider confidence and afford a firmer guarantee for stability in the future than would the selection of any European power."

Early in the conferences at Paris it was agreed that to those colonies and territories which as a consequence of the late war have ceased to be under the sovereignty of the States which formerly governed them and which are inhabited by peoples not yet able to stand by themselves under the strenuous conditions of the modern world there should be applied the principle that the well being and development of such peoples form a sacred trust of civilization, and that securities for the performance of this trust should be afforded.

It was recognized that certain communities formerly belonging to the Turkish Empire have reached a stage of development where their existence as independent nations can be provisionally recognized, subject to the rendering of administrative advice and assistance by a mandatory until such time as they are able to stand alone.

It is in pursuance of this principle and with a desire of affording Armenia such advice and assistance that the statesmen conferring at San Remo have formally requested this Government to assume the duties of mandatory in Armenia. I may add, for the information of the Congress, that at the same sitting it was resolved to request the President of the United States to undertake to arbitrate the difficult question of the boundary between Turkey and Armenia in the Vilayets of Erzerum, Trebizond, Van, and Bitlis, and it was agreed to accept his decision thereupon, as well as any stipulation he may prescribe as to access to the sea for the independent State of Armenia. In pursuance of this action, it was resolved to embody in the treaty with Turkey, now under final consideration, a provision that "Turkey and Armenia and the other high contracting parties agree to refer to the arbitration of the President of the United States of America the question of the boundary between Turkey and Armenia in the Vilayets of Erzerum, Trebizond, Van and Bitlis, and to accept his decision thereupon as well as any stipulation he may prescribe as to access to the sea for the independent State of Armenia"; pending that decision the boundaries of Turkey and Armenia to remain as at present. I have thought it my duty to accept this difficult and delicate task.

In response to the invitation of the council at San Remo, I urgently advise and request that the Congress grant the Executive power to accept for the United States a mandate over Armenia. I make this suggestion in the earnest belief that it will be the wish of the people of the United States that this should be done. The sympathy with Armenia has proceeded from no single portion of our people, but has come with extraordinary spontaneity and sincerity from the whole of the great body of Christian men and women in this country by whose free-will offerings Armenia has practically been saved at the most critical juncture of its existence. At their hearts this great and generous people have made the cause of Armenia their own. It is to this people and to their Government that the hopes and earnest expectations of the struggling people of Armenia turn as they now emerge from a period of indescribable suffering and peril, and I hope that the Congress will think it wise to meet this hope and expectation with the utmost liberality. I know from unmistakable evidences given by responsible representatives of many peoples struggling towards independence and peaceful life again that the Government of the United States is looked to with extraordinary trust and confidence, and I believe that it would do nothing less than arrest the hopeful processes of civilization if we were to refuse the request to become the helpful friends and advisers of such of these people as we may be authoritatively and formally requested to guide and assist.

I am conscious that I am urging upon the Congress a very critical choice, but I make the suggestion in the confidence that I am speaking in the spirit and in accordance with the wishes of the greatest of the Christian peoples. The sympathy for Armenia among our people has sprung from untainted consciences, pure Christian faith, and an earnest desire to see Christian people everywhere succored in their time of suffering, and lifted from their abject subjection and distress and enabled to stand upon their feet and take their place among the free nations of the world. Our recognition of the independence of Armenia will mean genuine liberty and assured happiness for her people, if we fearlessly undertake the duties of guidance and assistance involved in the functions of a mandatory. It is, therefore, with the most earnest hopefulness and with the feeling that I am giving advice from which the Congress will not willingly turn away that I urge the acceptance of the invitation now formally and solemnly extended to us by the council at San Remo, into whose hands has passed the difficult task of composing the many complexities and difficulties of government in the one-time Ottoman Empire and the maintenance of order and tolerable conditions of life in those portions of that Empire which it is no longer possible in the interest of civilization to leave under the government of the Turkish authorities themselves.

WOODROW WILSON.

Mr. WALTERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] five minutes.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman state in reference to subsection (3) on page 5 what is intended to be covered by that?

Mr. WALTERS. If the gentleman will permit, I will yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS].

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to make a little statement, I think I can clear up that point and some others.

I think the purpose of the bill is self-evident. It is to incorporate an association to perpetuate the memory of the late Theodore Roosevelt, and it has in the main three general purposes. One is to erect here in Washington a great monumental building, in which will be relics and exhibits of the life of Roosevelt. The second is to have a building or a park at his home town in Oyster Bay, where there will also be preserved relics of the late President; then, third, to have an institution which shall teach the ideals and policies for which Roosevelt stood, so that all the people of the country may have the benefit of the sterling Americanism for which Roosevelt was known not only in this country but throughout the earth. [Applause.] To properly perform this work the association will ask for funds and donations of personal articles to carry forward these three projects. There is no profit to be derived from the undertaking. By the express provisions of the act no dividends can be declared. The only money that will be expended will be expended in obtaining the fund, erecting the buildings, and in meeting such expenses as are incident to these monuments and to this institution, which will keep alive the policies and ideals with which the name of Roosevelt is forever linked in grateful, patriotic reverence. [Applause.]

This association is not incorporated for financial profit nor for the aggrandizement of those connected with it. The American people will be the beneficiaries and the glory of perpetuating the name of Roosevelt will belong to every citizen of our Republic. The purpose of the association can best be expressed in Roosevelt's own words:

I speak of the men of the past partly that they may be honored by our praise of them, but more that they may serve as examples for the future.

[Applause.]

Mr. WALSH. I wish the gentleman would give me some information with respect to subparagraph (3) of section 3.

Mr. HICKS. It states the purpose of it. It is to receive funds and hold objects of interest, relics and things of that kind, in perpetuity for the benefit and profit and interest of the people of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. It says:

To promote the development and application of the policies and ideals of Theodore Roosevelt for the benefit of the American people.

Mr. HICKS. Their idea is to have publications issued, lectures given, and so forth, so that people who read may know the things Roosevelt stood for, breathing Americanism and patriotism to his country.

Mr. WALSH. Does that mean the simple life, the big stick, and similar ideals?

Mr. HICKS. I do not know that the absolute details of every word that this institution will utter have been formulated, but in general and in large it means that the great principles which my friend from Massachusetts knows about and appreciates, and for which President Roosevelt stood, shall not die, but shall go on to future generations, teaching the sterling Americanism which my friend from Massachusetts has also always stood for.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, yes; we all understand about the sterling Americanism; but I want to know about these policies and ideals. Of course, the great President stood for political principles as well. Is there anything of that sort to be included?

Mr. HICKS. There is no idea at all to make this Federal institution a great political power in the sense of partisan politics. The only thing contemplated is to make it a broad-gauged institution which will embrace the very best of all political principles, whether it be Democratic or Republican or Progressive principles, so long as it is American.

Mr. WALSH. The purposes of this subsection (3) are to be attained through the establishment of an educational institution—is that the idea?

Mr. HICKS. That is correct, in a general way.

Mr. WALSH. Where is it intended that this educational institution is to be located?

Mr. HICKS. I do not think that has been determined upon. The other two objects are stated—one a monument in Washington and one in Oyster Bay. As far as the educational institution is concerned, I do not think that has yet been determined upon.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman think the language of subsection (3) will permit the maintenance of an educational institution?

Mr. HICKS. I should imagine it would in the sense in which I have used the term, because the men who drew it probably had that in mind and were confident of what they were doing before they drew the provision. I may say that this bill has already passed the Senate. It was drawn by able men, and I presume will cover the points that they desired to have covered.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the House bill was drawn by a Member of the House.

Mr. WALTERS. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, it has been customary in bills of this kind to insert a limitation of the amount which the corporation might raise and the value of the property which it might own. I notice that there is no such limitation in this bill. Was that left out advisedly or by inadvertence?

Mr. HICKS. That was left out advisedly, because they are unable to tell, until they get this thing under way, the amount that they will need for these purposes, and therefore they did not limit the amount to be raised.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Subsection (3) of section 3, which has already been referred to, provides for a fund to promote the development and application of the policies, and so forth, of Theodore Roosevelt. I take it that that would authorize this corporation to engage upon a political propaganda. Does the gentleman know whether that is the thought of any of the promoters of the corporation?

Mr. HICKS. I will say that I can not speak for the other incorporators; but speaking for myself, who happens to be among the number, I can say that nothing is further from my mind than that this association shall be used in promoting partisan politics.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Of course, the gentleman from New York and everyone else can readily see the danger of granting a corporation the right to raise money and expend it in supporting candidates or certain policies in a political campaign. It is bad enough as we have campaigns now, but if we start to create corporations without any limit on the amount they may raise to conduct campaigns, I do not know how much worse it might be.

Mr. HICKS. I can say to my friend from Illinois that I do not think it is contemplated for a moment that this association will be used in the sense to which he has just referred.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALTERS. I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARD. What I want to call the attention of the gentleman to in this bill is that it is provided, on page 4, lines 22 and 23, that this corporation may have offices and conduct its business affairs within or without the District of Columbia and in the several States, Territories, and possessions in the United States.

It is always customary in legislation of this kind to require that the corporation have an office in the place where the corporation is created. Here it provides that they may have offices within or without the District of Columbia and in the several States, Territories, and possessions of the United States. I call attention to this because of the inaccuracy of the legal proceedings, and especially to call attention to the fact that there is a bill drafted for a Federal incorporation which comes from a committee which has the management of the affairs of the District of Columbia. There can not be the slightest excuse for the assumption of jurisdiction by this committee except the acquiescence of the committee which really has jurisdiction. This does not belong to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAPES. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. MAPES. There is some conflict in precedents as to whether the Committee on the District of Columbia or the Committee on the Judiciary has jurisdiction of bills of this kind. Several bills incorporating corporations similar to this have been reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia in former Congresses.

Mr. GARD. I know there has been some conflict in jurisdiction, but the consensus of opinion must be that these laws creating a legal entity, creating corporations, belong to the Committee on the Judiciary and do not belong to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

To illustrate what is done by a committee of this kind: Here we have a bill brought in which permits the incorporation in the District of Columbia and does not even require an office or a representative of the corporation in the district where it is created. It would seem to me that even in the ordinary construction of corporations certainly you would have to have an office of the corporation in the place where the corporation was created. In this case they can have an office in the District of Columbia or out of the District. You could have it in Hawaii if you wanted to, or any outlying possession of the United States. I think everyone would be in accord with the provisions of the bill. The bill has for its purpose a great and noble idea, but being crowded into the committee it is not given the consideration which it should have, and now it comes with certain amendments, made by the Senate, I suspect; but, at any rate, the bill is not given the right kind of consideration. While I am not finding fault at all as to the means by which the bill got there it does seem to me that it should have gone to the committee which would have given it the consideration which a legal corporation should have.

I want to call the attention of the chairman to this matter and ask him whether it is intended to remedy this omission.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. If the gentleman will yield, I submit that it is quite customary to create a corporation without providing that it shall maintain an office in the place of its creation. Very frequently a corporation is established with a provision that an agent shall be maintained within the jurisdiction where the charter is granted, but frequently it is allowed to have its office wherever it pleases, no requirement being made that it shall be kept in any particular place, and even no requirement that an agent shall be maintained anywhere.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Is not there always a provision for the service of process?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Not a specific provision. That is a matter that falls under general statutes. It is altogether within the discretion of Congress whether anything shall be stipulated about the location and maintenance of an office or the maintenance of an agent.

Mr. GARD. I have no fault to find with what the gentleman says. It is entirely within the power of Congress to determine what are the essential elements of incorporation, and it should, to my mind, provide for an office or place of business in the place where that corporation was created. Second, you should have some representative of the corporation in the place of its creation; and third, you should provide some means for the service of process against the corporation, none of which provisions are in this bill.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio knows that the law now provides how process shall be served on this corporation or any other corporation.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman means corporations generally.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The general law would cover this. The law provides for the service on corporations. It is not in the law that authorizes the creation of the corporation at all. That is not where it belongs.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman understands that the general law of service on corporations would apply. I was referring to the fact that there is no reference to that in this bill, either of that or any other essentials.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. We ought not to deceive ourselves. It has been the policy of Congress for years not to create a Federal corporation except corporations in the District of Columbia. Sometimes that has been varied.

We provide in the District of Columbia for incorporation here under the general law, and this association could be incorporated in the District of Columbia except for the fact that the incorporation law here requires one-half of the incorporators to be residents of the District. This could be incorporated exactly as they propose the provisions now if one-half of the incorporators were residents of the District.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman appreciates why they want an incorporation in the District of Columbia, or why they want this incorporation. It is because it carries with it the prestige of having been incorporated by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I assume that is the case. That is the case with all of these incorporations that we grant.

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. WALTERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. WALTERS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the House bill of similar title be laid on the table.

The SPEAKER. Without objection the House bill will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

LIABILITY OF HOTEL PROPRIETORS IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill (H. R. 12887) establishing the liability of hotel proprietors and innkeepers in the District of Columbia, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That whenever the proprietor of any hotel or inn in the District of Columbia shall provide in such hotel or inn a suitable safe or vault for the safekeeping of any money, jewelry, or other articles of value, other than wearing apparel, belonging to or in the custody of guests, and shall notify the guests thereof by keeping conspicuously posted in the office and on the inside of the entrance door of the sleeping rooms of said hotel or inn a notice printed in distinct English type, such proprietor shall not be liable for the loss of or injury to any such property by theft or otherwise sustained by any guest unless such guest has offered to deliver the same to such proprietor for custody in such safe or vault and such proprietor has omitted or refused to receive it and deposit it in such safe or vault and to give such guest a receipt therefor: Provided, That in no case shall such proprietor be liable for the loss or injury to property so deposited in an amount exceeding the sum of $500, except by special contract in writing, stating the kind and value of property received, the kind and extent of the liability of said proprietor, and the reasonable consideration to be paid for such safekeeping, not in excess of the customary insurance charge or premium, and which said contract shall be signed by said guest and said proprietor or his clerk: Provided further, That nothing herein contained shall apply to such an amount of money and such jewelry or other articles of value as is usual, common, or prudent for guests to retain in their rooms.

SEC. 2. That whenever the proprietor of any hotel or inn shall keep posted in a conspicuous manner on the inside of the entrance door to the sleeping rooms of said hotel or inn a notice printed in distinct English type requiring the guests occupying said rooms to lock or bolt the door of said room and upon leaving said rooms to lock the door and deposit the key at the office, the proprietor shall not be liable for any baggage stolen from said room if it shall appear that said room was left by the guest unlocked or unbolted, or that the key was not so deposited at the office at the time of the loss of said baggage, unless the loss is directly or indirectly caused by or attributable to the proprietor or his employee or employees.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, this bill is the committee's substitute for a bill introduced by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY], and it seeks to limit the liability of hotel proprietors within the District of Columbia. In substance, it follows the law that is in force in about every other State in the Union, with possibly six exceptions. The committee had a hearing upon the bill and the bill was indorsed by all of the hotel proprietors within the District. The reasons urged by the proponents of the bill appealed very strongly to the committee. The bill limits the common-law liability in just two respects. First, it provides that if the proprietor of a hotel shall provide a safe or vault for safe-keeping of money or valuables and shall give notice to his guests that such is the fact, he shall not be liable for loss of such money or valuables if they are not deposited in the safe. In other words, when he takes them into his possession he becomes liable, but if the guest does not see fit to take advantage of the offer that he had made to care for them and the guest leaves them in his room, the proprietor is not responsible if they are stolen.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BURDICK. I yield.

Mr. GARD. I do not desire to interrupt the gentleman's statement. I have been reading with much interest the two provisos. Is it intended in the first proviso on page 2 to limit the liability of the innkeeper in any event to the sum of $500 unless a special contract is signed?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes; that is what we find is the law in most of the States.

Mr. GARD. In other words, if a man had property valued at $1,000 and goes into a hotel late at night and wants to put that property in a supposedly burglar-proof safe, and he does put it in the safe, in the event it is lost in any way the hotel keeper is responsible for only $500, unless the guest can wake up the hotel keeper and get him to sign a contract to pay him the full thousand dollars in case of loss. Is that right?

Mr. BURDICK. It is right in part; yes. The limitation is $500 unless there is an agreement with the hotel proprietor or his clerk.

Mr. GARD. In this particular it says that the limitation is $500 except where a special contract is signed.

Mr. BURDICK. Yes.

Mr. GARD. It would impose upon anyone having any amount of money in his possession—assuming that some people have more than $500 at one time, which is a violent assumption on my part—who goes to a hotel and who wants to put it in the hotel safe, to wake up the hotel proprietor and get him to sign a special contract, if he went there late at night, if he wanted to be sure of getting the $1,000 back in case it was lost.

Mr. BURDICK. He would have to offer it for deposit either to the proprietor or his clerk.

Mr. GARD. He would have to offer it for deposit and have a special contract in writing.

Mr. BURDICK. That is correct.

Mr. GARD. This seems to be a very ingenious insertion by some hotel proprietor.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, right there, does not the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] think it is a reasonable provision for a man who seeks to have a hotel proprietor take charge of more than $500 and safely keep it and be responsible for its loss, to pay a reasonable insurance charge? I think that is very reasonable.

Mr. GARD. Oh, yes; that would give some of these Washington hotel keepers an insurance business.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think many guests in Washington hotels will have more than $500——

Mr. GARD. Not when they go out. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURDICK. Cases were illustrated before us where guests had $10,000 worth of jewelry in their rooms, in trunks unlocked.

Mr. GARD. Of course, that would be a great risk. Is it the intention of this bill to limit the liability to $500 in any event, unless there be a special contract in writing?

Mr. BURDICK. Yes; that is with respect to money and jewelry, but not for wearing apparel. It is for articles of value other than wearing apparel.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Rhode Island permit me to explain to the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. BURDICK. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, there has come about everywhere in hotels a very great abuse of the privilege secured by guests other than the providing of room and board. This very feature is intended to cover that point in connection with valuables. As a guest at a hotel, you pay for your room, meals, and service. There are many other things that have gradually crept into the dealings between a hotel and guest furnished without charge. One is that hotels are to-day expected to provide safe-deposit boxes and become responsible either for large sums of money, securities, or jewelry.

I could call the attention of the gentleman to a case in New York a few months ago where very valuable jewelry was stolen from the hotel vault—afterwards recovered—but which had been left there by the owner, not a guest of the hotel at the time of the loss. The hotel was obliged to offer a reward of $10,000 to endeavor to secure the return of that jewelry. This item to which the gentleman refers in this bill is intended simply to protect the hotel to the extent when the guest asks the hotel to assume an undue liability. If the gentleman will read the first paragraph he will see there is no limit to the clothing and the actual traveling and wearing apparel which the guest at a hotel can have.

Mr. GARD. A man in a hotel would not have very much of that. The gentleman, I know, is the proprietor of a magnificent hotel and, of course, conversant with all the needs of hotels and the relations with their guests, and their business relations as well; but it seems to me that this is entirely new, to write in that the hotel having a safe-deposit vault or burglar-proof safe, and that there is no liability unless the guest deposits the valuables in that safe, and then we can limit the liability, except for clothing and traveling essentials, which, of course, do not amount to a great deal to the average person, to $500 of money and expensive jewelry unless the man can get a special contract with the hotel keeper that he will take these valuables and be accountable for more than $500.

Mr. BURDICK. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio, in Arkansas there is a provision for $300, in California for $250, in Louisiana for $100, and in Ohio for $500.

Mr. GARD. Well, I know these provisions relate to the general liability of the innkeeper, but there is no provision about a special contract.

Mr. BURDICK. Yes; there is a special contract in those cases to which I have called attention under existing law, and I believe I have 25 States that have this provision with reference to a special contract.

Mr. TREADWAY. I think, if the gentleman will permit me to interject this remark, the gentleman from Ohio will agree with me that there is no occasion to expect the hotel to provide undue protection for something not necessary in the transaction between the guest and the hotel. In other words, where the guests are carrying large sums of money about, the hotel should not be liable. We had an illustration in the hearings before the committee of a man carrying $10,000 in bonds around in his trunk and expecting that the hotel would assume the liability for the loss, whereas the real agreement between the hotel and guest merely covered the room and food.

Mr. GARD. Well, suppose this case: Suppose a man comes from New York, say, for illustration, to the New Willard Hotel in Washington. He comes with a thousand dollars in his pockets for the purpose of buying something here in Washington. He lands at the New Willard at 11 or 12 o'clock at night. He wants to put that $1,000 in the safe in the office. He tenders it to the clerk, and the clerk says that they could not take any liability for that unless there is a special contract. He says, "We will pay $500 if it is lost or we will pay nothing."

Mr. TREADWAY. The assumption the gentleman is going on is impossible. The fact is that at no time would a hotel in this city or any other be without some responsible representative of the proprietor in the office, and when a guest arrives with a thousand dollars and deposits $500 of it in the safe, or the whole $1,000 for that matter, the representative of the proprietor will receive it and give a receipt for it, the hotel itself making no profit out of it but simply asking you as a guest to pay for the protection the hotel itself must pay. There can not be anything unfair about such a contract as that.

Mr. GARD. But when they accept that $1,000 under this bill they accept it with the liability for $500 and not for the $1,000?

Mr. TREADWAY. It is expected that a person would have probably on a tour or traveling $500 in value in currency or in jewelry or other form of security. The hotel should assume that responsibility without charge; but when it comes into these large sums which ladies traveling with little jewelry boxes, as the gentleman is well aware, containing thousands and thousands of dollars in value, why should the hotel be asked to assume the responsibility of keeping that package when it has nothing whatever to do with the rate the guests are paying for their board or their room? It is an unfair request, and one which I say has gone beyond the limit, putting an additional burden on the hotel beyond the point of what the guest is expected to pay for accommodations.

Mr. GARD. None of these hotels are compelled to take large bunches of jewelry of which the gentleman speaks or park a Pomeranian or anything of that kind.

Mr. BURDICK. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio I have the Ohio law here, and it provides a limit of $500:

> Innkeepers shall not be obliged to receive from the guest for deposit in such safe or vault property described in the preceding section exceeding the value of $500, and shall not be liable for such value, whether received or not. Such innkeepers, by special arrangement with the guest, may receive for deposit upon written terms, as agreed upon——

Mr. GARD. Now, you go beyond that. We make no liability except by a special contract in writing.

Mr. BURDICK. Oh, no; I do not so understand it at all.

Mr. GARD. That is in the bill—making the liability $500.

Mr. BURDICK. The same way in Ohio and in 25 other States.

Mr. GARD. I am not familiar just at this time with what the Ohio enactment is, and I will not state advisedly. Doubtless the gentleman is more familiar than I am, having recently studied this matter, but I question if it is drawn in reference to how the innkeeper should get paid.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman will yield, I think the gentleman from Ohio has found a bugaboo in this bill that does not amount to so much. Is it not a fact, I will ask the gentleman, that these hotels, under such a law as he proposes—that the man they have in the office is prepared to sign this contract, which is printed, and he can sign it in half a minute, if a guest has valuables and wants to put them in the safe, and when the guest leaves he charges him this little premium?

Mr. TREADWAY. What the hotel itself has paid.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. And the hotel is thereby helped to pay the kind of a man they have to have in order to take care of the business of protecting these valuables. It is not a great, big business transaction, where you would have to hunt the proprietor up and get him out of bed and bring him down in his night clothes to sign the contract. The man is in the office who has authority to sign the contract.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I understand that this bill is to limit the liability of the hotel keeper. I suppose there is no way to limit the liability of the hotel guest?

Mr. BURDICK. None at all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. There are some people who have put up at hotels in the last few years, or even the last few days, who would like to have some method of limiting their liability to hotels.

Mr. GARD. I will state there is such liability, if the gentleman will yield. It is all that the man who comes in has. It is everything he has.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is not that matter in the Attorney General's hands?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I was not sure. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] says there is a limit to liability; that they take all he has. I have been told by some gentlemen who are more experienced in hotels than I am, that they were not even satisfied with taking all they have.

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WALSH. Division, Mr. Speaker.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 23, noes 13.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BURDICK, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

CHANGE OF NAME OF DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA CORPORATIONS.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I call up the bill H. R. 5416, a bill to authorize corporations organized in the District of Columbia to change their names.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan calls up a bill which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 5416) to authorize corporations organized in the District of Columbia to change their names.

Be it enacted, etc., That the Code of Law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting another section, to be known as section 639a, which shall read as follows:

"SEC. 639a. That any corporation organized under the laws of the District of Columbia may change its name in the manner following:

"The board of directors shall pass a resolution declaring that such change is advisable and calling a meeting of the stockholders to take action thereon. Such a meeting shall be called upon such notice as the by-laws provide, and in the absence of such provision upon 10 days' notice given personally to each stockholder as his address is contained in the records of such corporation, a notice deposited in the United States mail, postage prepaid, at least 10 days prior to such meeting to be considered sufficient notice under this act. If two-thirds in interest of each class of stockholders having voting powers and of other persons having like powers shall vote in favor of such a change, a certificate thereof shall be signed by the president and secretary, under the corporate seal, and acknowledged as in the case of deeds of real estate, and such certificate shall be filed in the office of the recorder of deeds of the District of Columbia, and upon the filing of the same the certificate of incorporation shall be deemed to be amended and the name changed accordingly; and the filing of said certificate in conformity with this act shall have the same force and effect as to all future proceedings as if said certificate of incorporation or organization had been originally drafted in conformity with the amendment so made.

"That a certified copy of such certificate shall be taken and accepted as evidence in all courts and places of all matters legally stated therein; and the recorder of deeds shall keep an index in his office showing the new name and the change from the old name, and the old name showing the change to the new name; and no fees shall be required by the recorder of deeds for filing and recording any such certificate, except that ordinarily required for deeds of real estate of like length.

"That a corporation under its new name shall have the same rights, powers, and privileges, and shall be subject to the same duties, obligations, and liabilities as before, and may sue and be sued by its new name, but no action brought against it or by it under its former name shall be abated on that account, and on motion of either party the new name may be substituted therefor in the action.

"That upon the filing of said certificate for record a copy thereof shall be inserted, by the corporation whose name has been changed as hereinabove provided, once each week for four consecutive weeks, in two daily papers published in the District of Columbia."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, there is no law in the District of Columbia now authorizing corporations to change their names. I think that is a very unusual condition. The stockholders or those interested in corporations in most of the States, if not all, I believe have the right to amend their charters so as to change the names of their corporations at any time they see fit.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman advise me where the Committee on the District of Columbia acquires jurisdiction to amend the code of law for the District of Columbia? This is a bill providing:

That the code of law for the District of Columbia be, and the same is hereby, amended by inserting another section, to be known as section 639a, which will read as follows:

And it is reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAPES. I think, if the gentleman will permit, that the Committee on the District of Columbia has jurisdiction of this legislation. I have not contested, so far as I am concerned, the right of the Committee on the Judiciary, of which the gentleman is a member, to recommend certain legislation which I have had some question about that committee having jurisdiction of. It is true that it reported a bill to revise the code in the District of Columbia. Those who were interested in that proposed legislation consulted with me about it before it was introduced. It contained some things, I will say to the gentleman, which I think the Committee on the Judiciary ought not to have reported, and which should have come to the District Committee. However, I think there is no question about the right of the District Committee to report this legislation.

Mr. GARD. I have no desire to abridge the jurisdiction of the Committee on the District of Columbia, but when it had authority given to it to amend codes of law I do not know.

Mr. MAPES. Of course this only applies to the code in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What committee would have jurisdiction over it?

Mr. GARD. The Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Where does the Committee on the Judiciary get its jurisdiction over the revision of codes of law, and since when have they exercised it?

Mr. GARD. Any committee gets jurisdiction by reason of assignments, of course.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. They never have had that jurisdiction; the rules do not confer it, and practice has not conferred it, and they do not have such bills referred to it.

Mr. GARD. Oh, yes. They reported out the District Code bill the other day from the Committee on the Judiciary, a new District Code.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I know, but the codification of the law does not go to the Committee on the Judiciary. That bill belonged to the Committee on the District of Columbia. It has not been the practice of the Judiciary Committee to have these bills.

Mr. GARD. I do not desire to dispute the gentleman. It seems to me it has always been the practice, not only with bills of this kind but all incorporation bills, to go to the Judiciary Committee, at least since I have been connected with it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Some of them.

Mr. GARD. No; all.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. No; I beg the gentleman's pardon. Probably it has been about half and half in the incorporations in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman contend that this District of Columbia Committee has jurisdiction to amend the Code of the District of Columbia?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Certainly it has. It is a District matter. The rules specifically confer the jurisdiction, and the practice has followed the rule.

Mr. GARD. This is the first evidence I have seen coming from the committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. The gentleman has not been watching bills so closely until recently. There have not been bills coming from the committee recently. I have been watching them for a long time. I am glad those gentlemen are doing that work so efficiently. As a matter of fact the District of Columbia Committee does have the jurisdiction, in my opinion, of bills of this class, and not the Committee on the Judiciary, and that has been the practice.

Mr. GARD. My observation was that not only the complete bill that we passed the other day on the last calendar day that the Committee on the Judiciary had—not only did not that complete code come from the District of Columbia, but practically every other law, including the code law of the District of Columbia, had been submitted to the Committee on the Judiciary for its action.

Mr. WALSH. The only uniformity about this whole business of reference of bills, the only thing that has been uniform, has been the lack of uniformity in the references. It has been a uniform lack of——

Mr. GARD. Uniformity. [Laughter.]

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Michigan yield to me for another question?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. WALSH. Do I understand this will not permit a corporation, such as the measure we passed recently provided for, to change its name, as outlined in this bill, but only corporations formed under the general laws of the District?

Mr. MAPES. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. WALSH. If that is so, why could not the association that wanted to be incorporated and which was provided for in this bill a little while ago have been incorporated under the general laws of the District?

Mr. MAPES. I do not know.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I have never been able to get hold of the code of the District of Columbia. It is not contained in the two sets of statutes that I have. I want to ask a question about it. Is there any provision in the code of the District of Columbia forbidding or regulating the adoption by a corporation of a name similar to or identical with that of another corporation of either the District or some State? Is there any law of the District forbidding that sort of thing?

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that I do not know any statutory law forbidding that. I do not know whether there is any such law in the District of Columbia or not. Does not the general law prevent it, without an express statutory provision?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. No; it does not.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, in reply to the gentleman's inquiry, I have in my hand a code of the laws of the District of Columbia. If the gentleman from Indiana would like to see it, he can.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I would like to get it, but let us go ahead. This bill ought not to permit a corporation to change its name without some restriction in the bill to the effect that the name shall not be similar to or identical with that of some other corporation of the District of Columbia or the State of Maryland or the State of Virginia or any other State.

Mr. MAPES. I will say to the gentleman that I do not recall whether there is anything in the statute prohibiting that or not.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield to me two or three minutes?

Mr. MAPES. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Illinois five minutes.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I do not think we are in a great hurry. Gentlemen were discussing the code of the District of Columbia. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. MOORES] said he had not seen a copy of it recently.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. And I tried mighty hard to get it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. My reference to that is only incidental and just an excuse. I have a copy of the code, and a copy of the laws of the District of Columbia besides, and this morning, picking up a bill reported from the Committee on the Public Lands relating to some land in the District of Columbia, I found a reference in the bill to a statute said to have been passed in 1822, and the bill recited it as having been printed in volume 21 of the statutes, page 45, or whatever it was. I turned to my cpoy of the laws of the District of Columbia, thinking I would find the statute, but did not find it. I went to the law library on the floor above and found that they knew nothing about it. I went to the law library of the Supreme Court of the United States and could get no information there. I telephoned to the Library of Congress and got the man at the head of the law department there, and he looked up everything he could find, and he said there was no such thing. I do not know whether there is or not, and I wonder where the Committee on the Public Lands got the information upon which they drew the bill. I do not see any member of that committee here, but I wish some brilliant genius on that committee would tell us where we could find this citation, Twenty-first Statutes, covering the acts of the Seventeenth Congress.

Mr. MAPES. I would like to say to the gentleman from Illinois that that is one of the bills that I think was improperly taken away from the District Committee.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I think myself that it belongs to the District Committee.

Mr. MAPES. And I have been watching for the report. I had not noticed that the bill had been reported.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will examine the bill. He will see that there may be some interesting inquiries to be made concerning it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill to the final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

On motion of Mr. MAPES, the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

REQUEST TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. EMERSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a short letter written to me by the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors—a letter about five lines long.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a letter from the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors writes a great many letters. What is this one about?

Mr. EMERSON. I will read it to the gentleman.

Mr. WALSH. What is it about?

Mr. EMERSON. It is just a letter written to me stating the order of seniority in the assignments to that committee in the next Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. GARD. I did not hear what the gentleman said.

Mr. EMERSON. It is a letter written to me by Chairman KENNEDY, of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, stating that I would be the second man on the Rivers and Harbors Committee in the next Congress.

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman desire to inform his constituents?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I object.

Mr. EMERSON. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I certainly shall object. It is a purely personal matter.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MOORES of Indiana. I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 41 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until Tuesday, May 25, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.
